The battle was now plainly begun—upon the chosen ground of the enemy—and gladly did our troops meet the issue. With our one twelve-pounder and two six-pounders, (all smooth-bores,) under the command of Capt. Wallace and Lieuts. Jenks and Nixon, we returned the enemy's fire with very marked effect, though their rifled gun and prior acquaintance with the ground gave them a great advantage, and for the period of half an hour or more our troops were exposed to a most terrific fire of shell and canister from their guns. It was from this fire that all of our loss—amounting to one killed, and ten severely, and about twenty slightly wounded—occurred; and it is a matter of astonishment to all that our loss was not vastly greater, as the enemy's guns were served with remarkable skill and precision.

Many were the shots that passed just over our heads, to expend their force and perform their work of destruction in the wooded mountain side on our left, and but a few feet from the road occupied by our troops. Yet, in the face of all this fire, our untried but patriotic soldiers stood like veterans in their ranks, calmly awaiting the movement which should give their rifles and bayonets an opportunity to retaliate upon the enemy for the injury he was inflicting upon them.

Nor were their desires long ungratified, for Gen. Kelley, who had with great bravery advanced to the front and most exposed positions at the beginning of the battle, and whose quick perceptions enabled him at once to fully comprehend the enemy's position, and devise the most feasible plan of attack, soon gave the welcome command to charge upon their batteries and intrenchments, when, with shouts, our little force of cavalry, under the lead of the gallant Captains Keys and McGhee, dashed across the river, (which was fordable at this point,) while our equally enthusiastic infantry, under the command of Cols. Mason and De Puy, Lieut.-Col. Kelley, and Major Swearingen, rushed over the bridge to encounter the foe, at the very muzzles of their guns. No sooner did the enemy perceive this movement, however, than (with their usual repugnance to any intimate acquaintance with the "Lincoln men") they immediately abandoned their carefully-selected positions, and commenced a precipitate retreat, rushing "pell mell" through the town, and directing their flight toward Winchester.

In this retreat they were, however, so hotly pursued by our cavalry, that their two guns, and all their baggage wagons—about thirty in number—were captured before they had advanced two miles, while our exhausted and foot-sore infantry rushed into the town, thus restoring it once more to the legitimate dominion of that Government from which it has been so long arrested by the hands of secession. Most of the enemy's troops escaped us, however, owing to the circumstance that a large portion were cavalry, who were too fresh to be overtaken by our own, while his infantry effected their escape by scattering in the woods, and over the mountain sides, thus precluding the possibility of capture by troops so exhausted as were ours, after the fatigues of a battle, preceded by those of a long march of twenty-five miles.

The enemy's loss cannot be definitely ascertained, though it is known to have been considerably larger than our own.

A REBEL ACCOUNT.

A letter in the Richmond Enquirer, dated Winchester, Va., Oct. 27, gives the rebel account of the skirmish at Romney on the 26th. The writer says the fight was between four hundred Confederates, and a Federal force variously estimated at from three thousand to five thousand. He continues:

Our little force was obliged to retreat before superior numbers. The fight commenced three or four miles from Romney, whither our troops had gone to meet the enemy. After fighting some time, it was found that they could not keep back the Federals, and a retreat toward Romney followed, the enemy pursuing. Our army wagons blocked up the road, and the artillery could not pass, and it was consequently captured, with wagons, tents, baggage, &c., and we regret to add that Col. Angus McDonald, the commander of the Confederate forces, it is believed fell into the hands of the pursuers. When last seen, he was on horseback, with the enemy but a short distance in the rear. Some of his friends fear that he has been killed, as the Federals, it has been stated, exhibited no disposition to take prisoners, but rode up to teamsters and killed them with their sabres. Major O. R. Funsten escaped. He was thrown from a horse, but was carried off in a carriage, and has reached this place in a bruised condition. Some twenty or thirty of the cavalry have reached Winchester, from whom we obtain these particulars.

Although directly from the scene of the engagement, they bring reports containing discrepancies as to the details. I aim to give what I believe to be the most reliable. It is believed we had about twenty men killed and a number wounded. A large number of the enemy were killed, the artillery making roads through them. Some of the escaped cavalry fear that the greater part of the cavalry and also the militia force fell into the hands of the enemy before the pursuit was abandoned, while others think that but few, except the wounded, were taken prisoners. I am of opinion that the latter will prove correct. The enemy had about three hundred cavalry.

The enemy are, no doubt, once more in Romney; and some of our citizens fear they may extend their visit to Winchester—forty-two miles being the distance—but I have no such fears.

A militia force left there this morning in the direction of Romney, to check them if they should have the temerity to advance in this direction. The cars have gone to Charlestown to bring some troops from that place to go also toward Romney. Of course our people regret that the enemy have for once "stolen a march on our men," and given the invaders some cause to "crow;" but I predict that, when we shall be in possession of full details, it will be found that they have but little to rejoice over.

The Richmond Enquirer, of the 30th of October, says that a letter from Jackson's River to a gentleman in that city, written on Saturday evening, the 26th, says a report had reached that place to the effect that Gen. Floyd had attacked the Federal forces at the mouth of the Coal River, killing some five or six hundred of them, and taking a number of prisoners. Floyd is said to have lost three hundred in killed and wounded. The writer of the letter referred to does not vouch for the truth of the report, or any part of it, but says it was credited in the main at Jackson's River on Saturday.

The same letter speaks of the passage of Loring's command through Lewisburgh on Wednesday, upon a forced march, to reinforce Gen. Jackson at Greenbriar River. This is said to have been in consequence of a despatch received by Gen. Lee from Gen. Jackson, giving an account of the movements of the enemy in the locality of the latter.

BROWNLOW'S ADDRESS.

THE Knoxville Whig, of October 26th, contained the following:

This issue of the Whig must necessarily be the last for some time to come—I am unable to say how long. The Confederate authorities have determined upon my arrest, and I am to be indicted before the Grand Jury of the Confederate Court, which commenced its session in Nashville on Monday last. I would have awaited the indictment and arrest before announcing the remarkable event to the world, but, as I only publish a weekly paper, my hurried removal to Nashville would deprive me of the privilege of saying to my subscribers what is alike due to myself and them. I have the fact of my indictment and consequent arrest, having been agreed upon for this week, from distinguished citizens, legislators, and lawyers at Nashville of both parties. Gentlemen of high position and members of the secession party say that the indictment will be made because of "some treasonable articles in late numbers of the Whig." I have reproduced those two "treasonable articles" on the first page of this issue, that the unbiased people may "read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest" the treason. They relate to the culpable remissness of these Knoxville leaders in failing to volunteer in the cause of the Confederacy.

According to the usages of the Court, as heretofore established, I presume I could go free by taking the oath these authorities are administering to other Union men, but my settled purpose is not to do any such thing. I can doubtless be allowed my personal liberty by entering into bonds to keep the peace, and to demean myself toward the leaders of secession in Knoxville, who have been seeking to have me assassinated all summer and fall, as they desire me to do, for this is really the import of the thing, and one of the leading objects sought to be attained. Although I could give a bond for my good behavior, for one hundred thousand dollars, signed by fifty as good men as the county affords, I shall obstinately refuse to do even that; and, if such a bond is drawn up and signed by others, I will render it null and void by refusing to sign it. In default of both, I expect to go to jail, and I am ready to start upon one moment's warning. Not only so, but there I am prepared to lie, in solitary confinement, until I waste away because of imprisonment, or die from old age. Stimulated by a consciousness of innocent uprightness, I will submit to imprisonment for life, or die at the end of a rope, before I will make any humiliating concession to any power on earth!

I have committed no offence—I have not shouldered arms against the Confederate Government, or the State, or encouraged others to do so—I have discouraged rebellion, publicly and privately—I have not assumed a hostile attitude toward the civil or military authorities of this new Government. But I have committed grave, and, I really fear, unpardonable offences. I have refused to make war upon the Government of the United States; I have refused to publish to the world false and exaggerated accounts of the several engagements had between the contending armies; I have refused to write out and publish false versions of the origin of this war, and of the breaking up of the best government the world ever knew; and all this I will continue to do, if it cost me my life. Nay, when I agree to do such things, may a righteous God palsy my right arm, and may the earth open and close in upon me forever.

The real object of my arrest, and contemplated imprisonment, is, to dry up, break down, silence, and destroy the last and only Union paper left in the eleven seceded States, and thereby to keep from the people of East Tennessee the facts which are daily transpiring in the country. After the Hon. Jeff. Davis had stated in Richmond, in a conversation relative to my paper, that he would not live in a Government that did not tolerate the freedom of the press; after the judges, attorneys, jurors, and all others filling positions of honor and trust under the "Permanent Constitution," which guarantees freedom of the press; and, after the entire press of the South had come down in their thunder tones upon the Federal Government for suppressing the Louisville Courier, and the New York Daybook, and other secession journals, I did expect the utmost liberty to be allowed to one small sheet, whose errors could be combated by the entire Southern press! It is not enough that my paper has been denied a circulation through the ordinary channels of conveyance in the country, but it must be discontinued altogether, or its editor must write and select only such articles as meet the approval of a pack of scoundrels in Knoxville, when their superiors in all qualities that adorn human nature are in the Penitentiary of our State! And this is the boasted liberty of the press in the Southern Confederacy.

I shall in no degree feel humbled by being cast into prison, whenever it is the will and pleasure of this august Government to put me there; but, on the contrary, I shall feel proud of my confinement. I shall go to jail, as John Rogers went to the stake—for my principles. I shall go, because I have failed to recognize the hand of God in the work of breaking up the American Government, and the inauguration of the most wicked, cruel, unnatural, and uncalled-for war, ever recorded in history. I go, because I have refused to laud to the skies the acts of tyranny, usurpation, and oppression, inflicted upon the people of East Tennessee, because of their devotion to the Constitution and laws of the Government, handed down to them by their fathers, and the liberties secured to them by a war of seven long years of gloom, poverty, and trial! I repeat, I am proud of my position and of my principles, and shall leave them to my children as a legacy, far more valuable than a princely fortune, had I the latter to bestow!

With me, life has lost some of its energy—having passed six annual posts on the western slope of half a century—something of the fire of youth is exhausted—but I stand forth, with the eloquence and energy of right to sustain and stimulate me in the maintenance of my principles. I am encouraged to firmness, when I look back to the fate of Him "whose power was righteousness," while the infuriated mob cried out, "crucify him, crucify him!"

I owe to my numerous list of subscribers the filling out of their respective terms, for which they have made advance payments, and if circumstances ever place it in my power to discharge these obligations, I will do it most certainly. But if I am denied the liberty of doing so, they must regard their small losses as so many contributions to the cause in which I have fallen! I feel that I can, with confidence, rely upon the magnanimity and forbearance of my patrons, under this state of things. They will bear me witness that I have held out as long as I am allowed to, and that I have yielded to a military despotism that I could not avert the horrors of, or successfully oppose.

I will only say, in conclusion—for I am not allowed the privilege to write—that the people of this country are unaccustomed to such wrongs; they can yet scarcely realize them. They are astounded, for the time being, with the quick succession of outrages that have come upon them, and they stand horror-stricken, like men expecting ruin and annihilation. I may not live to see the day, but thousands of my readers will, when the people of this once prosperous country will see that they are marching, by "double-quick time," from freedom to bondage. They will then look these wanton outrages upon right and liberty full in the face, and my prediction is, they will "stir the stones of Rome to rise and mutiny." Wrongs less wanton and outrageous precipitated the French Revolution. Citizens cast into dungeons without charges of crime against them, and without the formalities of a trial by jury; private property confiscated at the beck of those in power; the Press humbled, muzzled, and suppressed, or prostituted to serve the ends of tyranny!—the crimes of Louis XVI. fell short of all this, and yet he lost his head! The people of this country, downtrodden and oppressed, still have the resolution of their illustrious forefathers, who asserted their rights at Lexington and Bunker Hill!

Exchanging, with proud satisfaction, the editorial chair and the sweet endearments of home for a cell in the prison, or the lot of an exile, I have the honor to be, &c.,

WILLIAM G. BROWNLOW,
Editor of the Knoxville Whig.

REBEL SEQUESTRATION ACT.

JUDGE MAGRATH'S OPINION.

In the Confederate Court, at Charleston, S. C., the following proceedings were had on the 24th of October:

Judge Magrath delivered the opinion of the Court with regard to the questions raised by Messrs. J. L. Pettigru, Nelson Mitchell, and Wm. Whaley, Esqrs., as to the constitutionality of the Sequestration Act.

The Judge, before giving his opinion, in some preliminary remarks, alluded to the great ability with which the questions raised had been discussed, and said that in the decision he was about to render he had been assisted by the labor and impressed by the zeal which had been exhibited in the arguments. While he entertained no doubt that he had reached a conclusion altogether reconcilable with and supported by authority and reason, it was competent for the parties to refer to another tribunal the correctness of this decision.

The Judge then proceeded with his opinion, which was listened to with the closest attention. The main point decided in the case was that the Sequestration Act was the constitutional exercise by Congress of the power given to it under the Constitution of the Confederate States to declare war and to make rules concerning captures on land or water. The power to confiscate, or otherwise deal with the property of enemies, within the territories of the belligerents, in time of war, belongs to every nation; and that power, in these Confederate States, was given to the Confederate States under that portion of the Constitution which gave it the power to regulate captures. In this general power of confiscation, debts are not to be excluded, but are to be regarded as another species of property. There was no foundation for the argument that the power to confiscate in time of war was in the States and not in the Confederate States.

The exercise of that power in the States—if it could be supposed to be there—would be so controlled by the treaty-making power, and other powers which belong to the Congress of the Confederate States, that its exercise by the States would be subject to control, and, perhaps, prohibition, as would be inconsistent with the idea of the sovereign power of the State or nation.

The Sequestration Act operates directly upon the property mentioned in the first section of that act. By the terms of the act the sequestration of all such property was complete, and such property by that Act of Sequestration becomes as absolutely and lawfully the property of the Confederate States as if the title to it had passed from its former owner for a valuable consideration.

The duties, therefore, which the act declares to affect the citizens of the Confederate States in relation to such property, were duties in relation to property which belongs to the Confederate States, and could not be considered as duties which at all existed in connection with the property in which alien enemies had any interest remaining. By the operation of that act the interest of such alien enemies had become completely extinguished, and their title instantly divested. The proceedings which were contemplated by that act were proceedings contemplated for the purpose of enabling the Government to recover the possession of that to which it had thus established a perfect right of property.

The demurrers, therefore, in all the cases were overruled.

SOUTHERN FOREIGN POLICY.

OPINION OF THE "CHARLESTON MERCURY,"
OCTOBER 26, 1861.

No one will dispute the gravity of the questions which attach to our foreign relations. But these questions have been, so far, and very naturally, subordinated to the great question of our very existence, which the fierce threats and enormous preparation of the Government at Washington might well put in doubt. But, although the threats are as loud as ever, the great army which was to have put them in execution has broken its ranks forever—no trumpet will call them to battle again; and, however new forces may be mustered and new generals commissioned, the decree of Manassas cannot be reserved. There may yet be much bloodshed and much suffering, but our independence is assured. It is time, therefore, even in the press and hurry of the war, to consider what our relations with the world are to be.

Very soon after the establishment of the Government at Montgomery, three commissioners were sent to Europe. The character of their instructions the public does not know. We only know who they are, and, from a brief reference in the President's message, that they were sent to England, France, Russia, and Belgium. The mission, we now fear, was premature. Whatever may be the final result, it is certain that neither Southern politics, Southern statesmen, nor Southern resources were sufficiently well understood in Europe to secure an early confidence in our success. Europe knew the United States, one or two great Northern cities, a few, very few, eminent Northern names, and nothing else. It did not know that this issue had been preparing for years, and did not understand how it happened now. It saw only, and to all appearance it saw correctly—a great people, rejoicing in its unfettered strength, in the richest and most magnificent field ever opened to human labor—an unlimited and illimitable commerce, a flourishing and civilized agriculture, so marvellously active and successful that as you looked you could almost see the great primeval forests roll like a mist from the western wilderness, revealing the prospect of towns and villages, and fruitful fields, and happy homesteads; a mental activity, no less unwearied, building churches and colleges, and scattering schools and newspapers broadcast over the continent; a flag honored on every sea and welcomed in every harbor of the world; a history growing every day richer in achievement and prouder in its triumphant record. And yet, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, this is all changed. What, in other countries and in other times, it has taken centuries of oppression to provoke, and a long succession of martyrs to accomplish, is here effected in a few months. The functions of the Government cease; the great organs of industry are paralyzed; men, old in honor, famous in the field and the Senate, shrink from the disgrace of service under the national authority, with the glory of which their lives were incorporate; and millions of people, intelligent, prosperous and free, stand in arms, willing to confront any peril, rather than remain one hour longer subject to that Government under which all this prosperity was achieved.

Surely the statesmen of Europe might well stand amazed and confused at such a spectacle; and although they would very soon reach the conclusion that there could be nothing less than the most powerful cause for so prodigious an effect—although recent events have contributed largely to their instruction—yet it is certain that for the first months of our new career, we had nothing to expect but the utmost wariness, the consequence of a very natural perplexity. At such a time it was not likely that we would be listened to at all, and, if heard, we were sure to be heard with mistrust. Indeed, before we could be understood, Europe had to unlearn a great deal; and in this new political education time was the only teacher. Under these circumstances our commissioners could do no good, unless they went not as ministers, but as missionaries—not to make treaties, but converts. As the Government, however, determined to send them, it is very much to be regretted that they were sent as a commission. Everybody knows that, for purposes of confidence, one agent is better than three; and in so delicate a matter, the personal character and temper of the agent was the most important element. Now a commission is always a stiff, official instrument; it wants the flexibility and the adaptability necessary for negotiation, and excludes that personal confidence, that, once obtained, almost insures success. Besides, all our experience was against it. We tried it during the Revolution; we tried it after the Revolution, in our difficulties with France; we tried it in 1813, at the peace of Ghent, and always with the same result—dissatisfaction at home, embarrassment in the negotiation, and ill-feeling among the commissioners. So far, we have not had these results, but simply because we have had no results at all. The commissioners might here have been recalled. As to what has been done, we have no information; but the Government has recently taken a very grave step, from which it may be inferred, according to one's temperament, either that our three commissioners have had no success at all, or that they have had a great success. Congress has passed an act authorizing the President to appoint two additional commissioners, and specify the countries to which they and their elder colleagues shall be sent, separately or unitedly, giving him also the power to appoint secretaries to such separate missions. This, evidently, looks to the development of our embryo commissioners into full-feathered ministers, and must mean either that the three having failed, we will try to succeed with five, as in the multitude of counsellors there is wisdom: or, as we prefer believing, that the three have prepared the way for the five, to go each in his special capacity to his special court. For if we are still to be waiters on Providence and Earl Russell, it is difficult to see why we should not be content with our original three, especially as they have the advantage of considerable experience in that line of practice. What, then, is the prospect of success?

In the first place, events have travelled very fast and very far. At the North, the whole history of its tyrannical and imbecile civil administration, from Lincoln's inaugural to the last ukase of Mr. Seward, putting in force, of his own mere will, that most obnoxious of all "European tyrannies," the passport system—the whole history of its war administration, from the haughty threats of Scott to the insolent vaporings of Butler—from the sullen lowering of its flag at Sumter, to its ignominious trailing in the dust at Manassas—all prove the truth of our denunciation; while at the South, the steady and orderly development of our new political life, the earnest and ready sacrifices of all classes of our people, the continuous and triumphant success of our arms, the temperate wisdom of our Government—all prove the truth of our assertions. Facts which the Herald cannot suppress, nor the Tribune distort, are teaching Europe what to unlearn; and the words South and Southerner are fast becoming realities to the European mind. We are rapidly reaching that point where we will be heard and understood. And once understood, the cause may be considered as decided; for, carrying out our legal phraseology, we have brought our case within the strictest precedents of international law. In the Italian despatches of Lord John Russell, the principle upon which we claim recognition will be found laid down in the strongest and most emphatic manner, and our readers have only to substitute the word "South" for Italy, and "Southern States" for the special Italian Powers named, to see how complete is the application.

FIGHT ON THE TENNESSEE RIVER.

CAPTAIN FOOTE'S REPORT.

St. Louis, October 30, 1861.

Sir: The "Conestoga," Lieut. Com. Phelps, has again been up the Tennessee River as far as Eddyville, sixty-two miles distant from Paducah, with three companies of the Illinois regiment, under command of Major Phillips, and conjointly they have had a handsome and successful skirmish, in which the rebels broke and fled in every direction, leaving seven dead on the field. Our casualties consist of two severely wounded and a few slightly so—among them a captain of a company. Forty-four prisoners were taken from the enemy; also seven negroes and thirty-one horses, eleven mules, two transportation wagons, a large number of saddles, muskets, rifles, shot-guns, sabres, knives, &c.

Lieut. Com. Phelps, and the officers and crew of the "Conestoga," as well as Major Phillips and his men, are deserving of the highest credit for their bearing in this expedition.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
your obedient servant,
A. H. FOOTE,
Captain U. S. Navy, &c.

A correspondent of the Chicago Tribune gives the following account of this affair:

ON BOARD STEAMER LAKE ERIE No. 2 }
EDDYVILLE, KY., OCT. 26, 1861. }

Last evening, Major Phillips, with three hundred of the Ninth Illinois regiment, started on an expedition from Paducah. Stopping at Smithland, your correspondent determined to make one of the party.

After getting a pilot and guide, and steaming up the Ohio a short distance, we returned and went up to what is called the Old Forge, where we left the boats for a march of nine miles into the country to attack an encampment of rebels. The brave boys marched the whole distance in the night, without a murmur—Major Phillips, ever active and watchful, giving his orders with promptness and decision, which the soldiers obeyed as promptly.

A little after daylight we wheeled into column by companies about twenty rods from the camp of the rebels, who first took us for friends, but quickly perceiving their mistake, formed across the road and commenced firing. Major Phillips ordered a charge, which the boys executed at a double-quick, but the enemy broke and fled in every direction. When the major ordered the men to fire, then began the fun. The enemy rushed to the roadside and hills, and turned and fired upon our troops. Buckshot and balls flew thick and fast. Wherever the shot fell thickest, there was the major, cheering on his men. Capt. Keiffner, of Company B, Ninth Illinois regiment, led the advance, and truly may he be said to have led, for he was the first to reach the encampment. He was slightly wounded by a pistol-ball, which your correspondent quickly avenged by sending one of Colt's pills through the head of his assailant. Too much cannot be said in praise of Capt. Armstrong and Capt. Robinson, and the officers and men under them. They were mostly raw troops, but behaved like veterans. And I feel proud to belong to the same brigade. Gen. Paine's son accompanied the expedition, and was under fire, cheering the men, and pointing out to our sharpshooters the flying rebels.

It is impossible to say how many are killed. I saw six, and heard of more than three times that number. We had three men wounded slightly, besides Captain Keiffner, before spoken of. Private Grubbing, of Company B, was shot in the groin; a private of Company K in the arm, just as he had brought down his man. Several sharpshooters of the enemy tried their hands on the major, but I am pleased to say he came out unharmed. We took all the horses, tents, and camp equipage of the enemy.

REBEL ACCOUNT OF THE SURPRISE.

On Saturday morning last, October 26th, a Lincoln gun-boat from the Ohio, supposed to be the Conestoga, with three hundred abolition troops, came up the Cumberland, and landed at West Eddyville. The troops were disembarked and proceeded to Saratoga, a few miles from Eddyville, where a fine cavalry company of Kentuckians, just formed by Captain Wilcox, were encamped, completely surprising and putting them to rout, and killing and wounding, it is supposed, some twenty-five or thirty of their number. The others fled, and several of them had arrived at Hopkinsville, where our informant saw them. Some of them had their clothes actually riddled with balls, while their persons miraculously escaped injury. The pursuit was continued by the Yankees about two miles.

Captain Wilcox was hit with a ball on the forehead, and although believed to be seriously, if not mortally, wounded, managed to ride two miles on his horse, and it is thought escaped the enemy.

There were only about seventy-five of Capt. Wilcox's men in camp. They were surprised while the pickets had come in for breakfast, and before others had gone out to take their places.

How long are these murderous, thieving Yankees to be permitted to thus infest our rivers, depredate upon our property, and murder our people? Let the Kentuckians rise in their majesty and strike such a blow against these mercenary soldiers of King Lincoln as will make them a little more careful how they venture on our borders, and will give them a lesson that they will never forget.

PROCLAMATION OF GENERAL KELLEY.

The following Proclamation was issued by Gen. Kelley to the people of Hampshire County and the Upper Potomac:

My object in addressing you is to give you assurance that I come among you not for the purpose of destroying you, but for your protection in all your rights, civil, social, and political. I am here, backed by the forces of the United States, to protect you in the rights of property as well as person, so long as you are peaceful citizens and loyal to the Government of the United States, the flag of which has so long and so well protected you, and under the folds of which you have lived long, happily, and prosperously. But if you attempt to carry on a guerilla warfare against my troops, by attacking my wagon-trains or messengers, or shooting my guards or pickets, you will be considered as enemies of your country, and treated accordingly. I shall put as few restrictions upon the ordinary business of the people as possible, and will give as free ingress and egress to and from Romney as the safety of my troops will admit. Citizens who have fled, under the erroneous belief that they would be imprisoned or killed, are invited to return to their homes and families, assured that they shall be protected whenever they can give evidence that they will be loyal, peaceful, and quiet citizens. Every reasonable facility will be given the people to seek a market on the railroad for their surplus produce, and to obtain supplies of merchandise, groceries, &c.

All persons who have taken up arms against the Government are required to lay them down, return to their homes, and take an oath of allegiance to support the Government of the United States; by so doing they will receive all the protection due to an American citizen.

Brigadier-General.

FIGHT AT WOODBURY, KY.,

OCTOBER 29, 1861.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Louisville Journal gives the subjoined account of this affair:

OWENSBORO, KY., Nov. 6, 1861.

Our arms have recently won a victory at Woodbury, Butler County, decided in its character, and significant in the fact that it was a contest between Kentuckians and the invaders. On Saturday night, the 26th ultimo, Colonel Burbridge, of the infantry at Camp Silas Miller, (Colonel Jackson being absent,) received a despatch from Colonel McHenry, at Hartford, stating that he anticipated an attack upon that point, and asking for reinforcements.

Colonel Burbridge, with one hundred and twenty-five of his infantry, one hundred of Jackson's cavalry, and two six-pounders and one artillery squad under Captain Somerby, left here Sunday morning at nine o'clock, and encamped at Hartford that night. Next morning, being joined by eighty men of Colonel McHenry's command, under Captain Morton, they took up the line of march for Born's Ferry, on Green River, which they reached before night, and sent out scouts to ascertain the strength and position of the enemy on the other side of the river, who returned about one o'clock with the desired information. Captain Morton, of McHenry's regiment, and Lieutenant Ashford, of Jackson's cavalry, were ordered across the river, it then being the intention to throw the whole force over and attack the enemy in the rear; but, the facilities for crossing being so limited, it was discovered this could not be done with sufficient despatch. So this project was abandoned, and the main force, under Colonel Burbridge, proceeded to Woodbury, on this side the river, by a circuitous and mountainous route, on nothing but a cracker breakfast.

Colonel McHenry, with one hundred and twenty-five men, learning there was a scouting party in the vicinity of Morgantown for the purpose of committing depredations on the property of Union men, advanced and engaged and routed them near Morgantown, with a loss of one of his men. Captain Netter, with twenty men of Colonel B.'s regiment, came down for the support of McHenry, and a short distance beyond Morgantown engaged a body of the enemy, sixty or seventy strong, who were returning to renew the attack on McHenry, and completely routed them, killing six, and losing not a man of his brave little band. Colonel McH., hearing the engagement, hastened to his support. This occurred on the south side of the river—on the enemy's side.

In the mean time Colonel B. was advancing to Woodbury, on this side of the river, and, reaching a point opposite the town, detailed Lieutenants Roberts and Ashford, of Jackson's cavalry, with ten men, as an advance guard. They appeared in view of the enemy's pickets, who were in possession of the ferry on the opposite side of the river. These were fired upon, many of them killed, the balance routed, and the ferry captured. The main body by this time came up, and saw the enemy formed in line of battle on a hill on the south side of the river—a position that commanded all the surrounding country. They were engaged by our sharpshooters, armed with Colt's revolving rifles, and at the same time one of our six-pounders, under Captain Somerby, was brought to bear upon them, sending destruction into their ranks, while Captain Belt, with eighty-five infantry, Lieutenant Crosby, with twenty, supported by Captain Porter, of Butler County, with twenty-five gallant Home Guards, were ordered over the river with one piece of artillery to take the enemy's position by storm.

This crossing was effected with one small boat, under the fire of the enemy. They charged up the hill in a most gallant and soldierly style, completely routing the enemy, destroyed their camp and equipage, (for the want of transportation to bring them away,) blew up their magazines, burned their wagons, and brought away various trophies in the way of fine pistols, guns, &c. The enemy lost between fifty and seventy killed, without a man lost on our side. The enemy fled precipitately in the direction of Bowling Green. At this juncture a messenger arrived from McHenry's camp, stating he was about to be surrounded by a superior force, when Colonel Burbridge's forces, infantry, artillery, and cavalry, took up their line of march on the other side, at double quick, after having marched fifty miles with nothing to eat, and fell back upon Colonel McHenry's forces near Morgantown. Hearing their approach in the night, and thinking them the enemy, he fell back a short distance and took a position for battle; but the mistake was soon explained. The force that had not crossed the river at Woodbury, consisting of cavalry under Captain Breathitt, were ordered back by the route they came, and joined the main force near Cromwell.

Captain Belt, Captain Breathitt, Captain Somerby, Lieutenant Crosby, Lieutenant Roberts, Lieutenants Ashford and Porter, acted with courage and coolness during the entire engagement. It is due to all the soldiers and officers to state that they acted the part of veterans.

Colonel Pegram, of Owensboro, and a near relative of the distinguished Confederate officer of the same name, voluntarily tendered his services as aid to Colonel Burbridge, and rendered most efficient service in the attack upon the pickets, in capturing the ferry, crossing the men and artillery over, and charging up the hill to the enemy's encampment. He was constantly exposed to the greatest danger, evinced the skill and coolness of an experienced general; and I am happy to say his services are most highly appreciated by the officers in command.

MINNIE.

LOUISVILLE "DEMOCRAT" ACCOUNT.

On Sunday last, (Oct. 27,) Col. Burbridge, who is in command at Owensboro, received a call from Colonel McHenry, at or near Morgantown, for help, as he anticipated an attack by a heavy force of the enemy. That same evening, Col. Burbridge left Owensboro with two hundred and fifty or three hundred men, and two cannon—about one hundred of his men being cavalry from Colonel Jackson's regiment; the rest was infantry, with their supplies in their knapsacks. This little band made a forced march to the bank of the river opposite Woodbury, which they reached Tuesday afternoon.

The ferryboat was on the Woodbury side, in charge of two rebel sentries and a black man. The sentries were picked off by rifle shots across the river, a distance of nearly three hundred yards, and Col. Burbridge then ordered the negro to take the boat across. Into the boat he put one of his cannon and a portion of his forces, while the balance of his rifles and the second gun protected his advance against the rebels, who had formed on the river bank. Making a landing with his squad, he charged upon the enemy, driving them back into the town. Meanwhile the balance of his forces were crossing as rapidly as possible. They were all over before it became dusk, and they made a charge through the town, driving the enemy before them. On the way through, they were fired upon with several shots from houses, which they instantly riddled. Unfortunately, and to the regret of all our men, a woman thrust her head out of one of the windows, and, in the dusk of the evening, was not distinguished as a woman. She was shot in the forehead and killed. The surgeon who attended the expedition, reported six or seven killed in the houses.

The enemy retreated to his camp in the rear of the town, which Col. Burbridge immediately attacked, utterly routing the entire force, some four or five hundred in number; he took possession of the camp with equipage for five hundred men, and all their camp utensils; but as he had no means of transportation, the entire camp was burned. Two prisoners were taken, named Ives and Lewis, and brought to this city this morning; one of them from Alabama, one from Mississippi. One of them is reported to be a captain, the other a private. About the same time, Col. McHenry, with some two hundred men, made an attack on a camp of the enemy at or near Morgantown, and took five or six prisoners—how many were killed and wounded we did not learn. Col. McHenry lost one man, but drove the enemy off. About the same time, Capt. Neerer, who is stationed with a party of twenty men at Rochester, his men all armed with Colt's revolving rifles, had a skirmish with a largely superior force of the enemy in the vicinity of Rochester, but with what result we have not yet learned. Col. Burbridge, in his attack, had one man wounded, but lost none. We believe these particulars to be entirely reliable, and think that further reports will only confirm last Tuesday's work as a day of glorious achievements. The marching, as Col. Burbridge did, with about three hundred men from Owensboro to Woodbury, a distance of sixty or seventy miles, in two days—attacking and utterly routing a force of five hundred of the enemy within less than eighteen miles of Buckner's head-quarters at Bowling Green, where he is reported to have a very heavy force, destroying the entire camp and camp equipage, driving the enemy off with a loss of fifty or sixty in killed, an unknown number in wounded, and recrossing the river in safety, with only one of his own men wounded and none killed; and doing all this, too, with raw troops who had never smelled powder before, is one of the most brilliant exploits of the entire campaign.

SIR: I have the honor to communicate to the General commanding the division, the facts and events connected with my brigade, in the advance across the Potomac, made under his order. make a hasty return within their breastworks near Leesburg, suffering a loss of sixty killed and wounded, as ascertained from their wounded and from citizens in the vicinity. The loss in my brigade is one killed and one severely wounded, both belonging to Company I, First regiment Minnesota Volunteers. On the 23d, by the General's order, I directed further intrenchments around the white house, near the enemy's works. I also had the fences, yards, and lane barricaded and strengthened with logs, rails, old plows, wagons, and lumber. On the night of the 23d, about seven o'clock, the General ordered me again to proceed to the Maryland side and take charge of the crossing of artillery and more troops. On arriving, I started across four more pieces of artillery. A storm of wind, which had been prevailing nearly all day, seemed to forbid the possibility of further reinforcing from this side. Provisions were getting short; the artillery on the Virginia side were short of ammunition; the wind was settling strongly from the Virginia shore; the means of transportation were heavy scows and clumsy canal boats, managed by poles—when at 8 o'clock P. M., I received notice from Major-Gen. Banks, that Gen. McClellan had ordered the withdrawal of the whole force from the Virginia to the Maryland side—and orders to proceed with all energy, but quietly, to make necessary arrangements on the Maryland side—and directed me to call to this work the boatmen and lumbermen of the First regiment of Minnesota Volunteers, as it was now evident that every thing depended on the energy, courage, and muscle of the boatmen to contend against the adverse wind-storm. This detail was made, to which were added one hundred men from Colonel Kenly's Maryland regiment, one hundred more from the Thirty-fourth New York Volunteers, and one hundred and fifty from the Seventh Michigan regiment. The plan being matured, the seemingly impossible enterprise was entered upon with a spirit and energy that knew "no such word as fail," and between 9 o'clock P. M. of the 23d, and five o'clock A. M. of the 24th, every man, horse, and piece of artillery was safely withdrawn from the Virginia shore and landed on this side again without an accident or the loss of a man or horse, save the casualty of the fight. The fortitude, endurance, and energy displayed by the men detailed to perform this work, deserve the highest commendation. The Minnesota lumbermen performed their part with such skill as to merit special notice.

The courage and coolness of the officers and men of my brigade, in most part, as exhibited in their crossing the river, engaging the enemy, and their orderly withdrawal across again, give reliable assurance of their efficiency. It may not be improper here to say, that the result of this movement, as a reconnoissance, must prove highly beneficial to any future movement in that direction. Each order was strictly followed, and the desired result accomplished. Trusting that I have performed satisfactorily the somewhat difficult and responsible duty to which Gen. Stone and Gen. Banks assigned me,

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
 W. A. GORMAN,
 Brigadier-General.

SPEECH OF FRANCIS THOMAS

AT THE FRONT STREET THEATRE, IN BALTIMORE, MD., OCTOBER 29, 1861.

MY FELLOW-CITIZENS: I do not think, on any occasion of my life, I have felt so great cause for asking the indulgence of my hearers as I do to-night.

Fifteen years of my life have been passed in seclusion and retirement. During that time events have transpired that have brought about the terrible calamity with which the country is now afflicted. Old party associations have been broken up and the people have come out under new organizations, formed under motives and inducements that I have had no opportunity to understand and properly judge of.

When the preliminary measures for disrupting the Union were consummated in the Democratic Convention at Charleston and Baltimore—for that is the cause—it came on me like a clap of thunder. I did not suppose that there was any possibility of its consummation even then.

Yes, fellow-citizens, it was here, in this hall, that the first step in that terrific drama in which we are all called upon to take a part was taken, and which is attracting the attention of the civilized world.

Without arrogating to myself the ability that these men claimed to possess, I could not have been deceived as to the motive that governed the ruling demagogues in that body. Their purpose was too transparent. I never could have been made a blind tool in their hands to demoralize the great Democratic party, and thus open the way for their terrific conspiracy, having for its purpose the destruction of our great and glorious nation. (Cheers.)

I will advert to some few facts now palpable and well known to the public mind. All their clamor about Southern rights and the protection of slavery in the territories was the most shallow and miserable pretence in the world. We were told that the enforcement of the fugitive slave law was the essential element of Southern rights, without which a dissolution was inevitable. What has been the result? Now it is annulled, so far as these Southern States are concerned, by their own act. It no longer has an existence for the protection of those States which have joined this rebellion; and if consummated how will the institution obtain protection?

We must have room for the expansion of our peculiar institution we were told, and Mr. Jeff.

Davis told us that the bayonets of the Government must uphold this institution. Still they abandoned every position, every safeguard in the Government that had been thrown around this institution, by deserting their posts in the Senate and in the House of Representatives. The very men who clamored most against the contraction of the limits of slavery, have themselves destroyed all those safeguards.

During ten years' service in Congress I never joined in any debate on the subject of slavery. I always shunned it as a subject for demagogues, and clearly foresaw that it was introduced for the purpose of bringing about the designs of disloyal ambition—(cheers)—a war of plunder—a war for the destruction of the very institution that we are called upon to draw our swords to defend. (Cheers.)

What is transpiring now? Commissioners after Commissioners, Ministers after Ministers, are sent across the ocean to establish commercial relations with Great Britain, the very country that we have been so long told had furnished gold to destroy the institution of slavery.

Have they not proclaimed that Republicanism is a failure? that there are but two natural classes of society—the aristocracy of birth and wealth, and the dependence of poverty and labor? This is the groundwork of this great rebellion. It is a war to establish a Government based upon but two grades of society. But, my fellow-citizens, I contend that Republicanism is not a failure.

When they ask me to sympathize in their rebellion because those engaged in it are slaveholders, I loathe with contempt the imputation of pecuniary motive conveyed by the plea. They might as well ask me to sympathize with them because they own horses. (Laughter.) I am a Marylander and a slaveholder, but whilst I glory in being a Marylander I also glory in the revolutionary renown of our ancestors. I glory in the result of their labors, because I am a citizen of this great nation, with no sectional affinities, and no local animosities. My proudest title is to be considered an American citizen. I am at home everywhere in this great Republic, with freedom's soil beneath my feet and freedom's banner floating over me. (Cheers.)

Although prepared myself for this rebellion, I ought not to be surprised that many Marylanders could not foresee the catastrophe. Being able to stand at the stand-point I have now reached, and looking down through the vista of the past, I hope it will not be tiresome to my hearers for me to repeat some of the reasons that impelled me long since to look forward to the consummation of the unholy purposes of these demagogues.

Full twenty years since, when occupying my seat in the House of Representatives, I was surprised one morning after the assembling of the House to observe that all the members from the slaveholding States were absent. Whilst reflecting on this strange occurrence, I was asked why I was not in attendance on the Southern caucus assembled in the room of the Committee of Claims? I replied that I had received no invitation.

I then proposed to go to the committee room to see what was being done. When I entered I found that little cock-sparrow, Governor Pickens, of South Carolina, addressing the meeting, and strutting about like a rooster around a barn yard coop, discussing the following resolution, which he was urging on the favorable consideration of the meeting:

"Resolved, That no member of Congress representing a Southern constituency shall again take his seat until a resolution is passed satisfactory to the South on the subject of slavery."

I listened to his harangue, and when he had finished I obtained the floor, asking to be permitted to take part in the discussion. I determined at once to kill their treasonable plot, hatched by John C. Calhoun, the Catiline of America, by asking questions. I felt then that it was my duty to stand by my country in opposition to these conspirators, as I now feel it my duty to bare my breast in its defence. Why, Baltimoreans, do you stand idle when your country is in danger, and your very city is threatened with invasion by the embittered foes of republican institutions?

I said to Mr. Pickens, "What next do you propose we shall do? Are we to tell the people that Republicanism is a failure? If you are for that, I am not. I came here to sustain and uphold American institutions—to defend the rights of the North as well as the South—to secure harmony and good fellowship between all sections of our common country."

They dared not answer these questions. The Southern temper had not then been gotten up. As my questions were not answered, I moved an adjournment of the caucus sine die. Mr Craig, of Virginia, seconded the motion, and the company was broken up.

We returned to the house, and Mr. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania—a glorious patriot then, as now—introduced a resolution which temporarily calmed the excitement.

After this John Quincy Adams introduced a petition said to be signed by four negroes of Fredericksburg. The Representative from that district proved it to be a hoax; that no such persons lived in that vicinity. But even this trifling hoax was seized upon as a pretext or a means of disrupting the Union.

I am not afraid to address a Maryland audience, and to express my peculiar views on this exciting subject, even here in Baltimore. I but repeat here what I have said to the people of Western Maryland, who, after hearing my sentiments, sent me to represent them in Congress by ten thousand majority. (Cheers.) In all this question of slavery I boldly assert that the South has been the aggressor; not the people of the South, but the demagogues of the South.

In this connection allow me to allude to what has been said by the man who is now styled Vice-President of the Southern Confederacy. This little cock-sparrow, who is now repudiating the whole record of his life—Mr. Stephens—in one of his last speeches agreed with Washington, Madison, Jefferson, and Monroe, that slavery was an evil, and should not be introduced in any territory where it does not exist. He says, in the same speech, that those men of the North who cling to the sentiments of abolition must be regarded as fanatics, or as lunatics on this particular subject.

The Democratic party had been required to frame resolutions, as indicative of their national views, that the North and the South could both stand upon. They have required of the party from year to year more than Northern men could submit to, even for the purpose of harmony. If the South had been content to change their own opinions, and to practise their opinions in their own section, there would have been no trouble. But they were constantly making encroachments, and demanding concessions, hatched in the brain of men who had a purpose devilish to the existence of the Union. Make it a sine qua non that all shall agree on the controverted texts of the Bible, as a condition of remaining together in one religious organization, and what would be the result? It is an aggression on the part of the demagogues of the South to ask the citizens of the North to throw open the free territory of the nation to the blight of slavery.

My object in this branch of my discussion is to prepare my audience for the admission of the fact that there is nothing in the result of a Presidential election to warrant a dissolution of the Union—nothing in the defeat of a political party to warrant the overthrow of our political fabric, and nothing in the present revolt but the unholy aspirations of personal ambition.

In 1835, the friends of Mr. Calhoun in Washington City made an effort to induce the Democratic party to adopt a resolution to declare that the Congress of the United States had no power to legislate on the subject of slavery in the territories. I protested then against the opening of this Pandora's box. But it has ever since been forced upon the Democratic party by the South.

In this connection Governor Thomas quoted Mr. Clay's declaration: "So help me God, I will never vote for the introduction of slavery in territory where it does not exist." I stand now where Mr. Clay then stood, and will ever stand so long as I have power to give utterance to my sentiments. I may be called a Black Republican, an Abolitionist, but I care not. When I was charged in Western Maryland as being unsafe, as being an Abolitionist, I was the owner of sixteen slaves. Why, sir, the puny fellows who thus assailed me, if blacked, would not have sold for as much as some of my little black boys. (Cheers and laughter.)

There are doubtless some in Baltimore who could be valued at the same price. (Laughter.) You may stand in awe of them, but I do not. I never shall stand in awe of any but my Maker. I stand in no awe of their denunciation and defamation. This little clique of Southern demagogues has had no terror for me. You may stand in awe of them, but I do not. I never have and never shall stand in awe of aught except my Maker. My sentiments are based on conscientious convictions, and cannot be controlled and governed by the fear of being stigmatized as unsound to my section.

The Southern men at the head of the rebellious movement, as well as those of that part of the country sanctioning it, entirely ignore the great principle of our country—to abide the decision of the ballot-box, and, if defeated, try it again. Instead of such a course they resorted to arms with a view of overturning the Government. Such a sight as this arouses all the manly feelings in my nature, and rouses my very soul to arms. It is not a liking for the government of President Lincoln that induces all of us to stand up for the Union, but because we are a law-abiding people. (Applause.)

Throughout my entire life I have always entertained an opinion that Congress has power to control slavery, and also that it was the duty of that body to exercise such control. It was not on the principle that Congress should set forth that slavery is immoral, or that it should interfere with the institution as it exists in the Southern States; but it was that, if the whole country was given up to slavery, they would not be honored in the non-slaveholding States as a land which was the home of the brave and free. With the natural order of events flowing smoothly, as previous to the reopening of the slavery agitation, the institution would continue, as established, two hundred years to come. While in Congress, Southern men came to me and said that, if it was confined to the States in which it is at present, it would soon die. Take the census of 1840 and that of 1850, and observe the rates of increase of both sections.

Then compare it with the territory not yet settled, and you will readily exclaim, Why fight about territory—why brue your hands in blood about territory not needed by either side? The principles on which I placed myself have been sanctioned in Western Maryland, and even from my boyhood have I maintained them. They have been vindicated by the people selecting me as their representative in Congress by ten thousand majority, given by a generous and confiding people, who, on the same enunciation of these opinions, chose me as the Chief Magistrate of Maryland. Why it is that the Northern section of our country increases in population more than the Southern section, I will not dwell, but only refer to one cause, and from which, as a natural result, it will always increase more rapidly.

I allude to foreign emigration—persons arriving in the Northern section, who, from not being indoctrinated into the institution in their native land, have an inborn hatred of slavery, and therefore seek that part of the land where the laboring class is free. They are right in this, and if thereby the North has the preponderance, we should submit to it. Five-and-twenty years ago I assumed the opinion which I now hold, but would not wish to controvert the opinion as expressed by Chief Justice Taney in the Dred Scott decision, and therefore abide by it. The remarks which I have expressed, my friends, are made with a view to allay the prejudices which unfortunately exist among the citizens of Baltimore in this great crisis of our country. Prejudices and passions they are; and never have more unjust and unwarranted allegations been made than what a number of your citizens generally receive as truths. Chief among these is an assertion that President Lincoln, who for the time being is our Chief Magistrate, is a political abolitionist.

I hold in my hand the Inaugural Address of President Lincoln, a portion of which I will read. It is the same position occupied by Mr. Van Buren in 1832, when he received the vote of Maryland for Vice-President. It is the position of Henry Clay (tremendous applause) in his whole career—a favorite of old Maryland; of Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, through a long period of the country's early history. Mr. Lincoln declares that "he has no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery where it exists." The votes and resolutions in the convention that formed the Chicago Platform expressly declare the same doctrine. Expressly did that platform recognize the right of the South to a maintenance of the inviolable right to the control of her domestic institution as necessary to the just administration of the Government. It is true, however, that it was also a great principle to resist the extension of slavery where it did not exist.

Born in Maryland, a son of a slaveholder, living among slaveholders, serving in the position of Chief Magistrate of the State, I have always held these opinions, and avowed that I would exclude slavery from any new State, but where it was established as a vested right I would defend the right with my blood. But if I was going to lay the foundations of a new State, I would never sanction the incorporation of slavery as an institution.

Mr. Thomas distinctly avowed that there was nothing in the designs of the Chief Magistrate, or of any of his Cabinet, to lead any person in Maryland to believe that they purposed interfering with the institution of slavery.

In New York and Ohio the Democratic party had lost power by showing more sympathy with Southern rights in years gone by than was right. At the present time, however, as if to show that the design of the Republican party was not to interfere with the institution in the Southern States, the party had invited the Democratic party into a union with them on the only true ground of supporting the Union as it is. They had elected a Democratic Governor in Ohio, as well as representatives in Congress, by large majorities, and in New York they had also elected Democrats by triumphant majorities.

Thus in two populous States they had abandoned the principles of the party, and made combinations with the Democrats in order to cherish the Union. In this State he regretted to see men claiming to be Democrats organizing an opposition to Government, and giving evidence of sympathy with traitors.

Mr. Thomas referred to the assistance rendered by the leading Whigs of 1832 to General Jackson, when South Carolina raised the nullification banner. Then Clay, Webster, and Adams, forgetting all that had induced them to oppose Jackson in his course toward the United States Bank, the National Road, and other prominent measures, readily rallied to his support. They knew the great distinction between the persons administering the Government and the Government itself, and gave all their powers to sustain the latter. President Lincoln now claims from all citizens the same loyalty as was evidenced in 1832, when the Government was wantonly assailed by rebellious men.

The speaker alluded to the expressions made use of by secessionists in reference to subjugating and coercing States, and that it was unlawful to imprison persons who were wanting in loyalty. He dissented in toto from the opinion of Chief-Justice Taney in the case of John Merryman, though having the utmost respect for the distinguished jurist.

He referred to General Jackson's course in New Orleans, where, a large portion of the inhabitants being of French descent, he was apprehensive that they would not be as loyal as they should be, and had occasion to arrest one of them. After the retirement of the old hero to the Hermitage, all the leading men who previously had abused him without stint acknowledged that he had done right. So will it be with President Lincoln when the present crisis is past.

He then referred to the efforts made in this State by the secessionists to control the Legislature, with a view of crippling the General Government, and expressed himself as being favorable to the utmost exercise of all the powers of Government to prevent such aims.

If they were desirous of ending these difficulties, he would suggest to them, as well as to the State prisoners in Fort Lafayette, that if they would take the oath of allegiance and become loyal citizens, they could regain and retain their liberty.

Mr. Thomas continued to urge these views at length, and passed on to the questions of tariff and other measures, which were sometimes urged by those friendly to the South as inducing their present position. He referred to the present attitude of England and France as not being calculated to create any alarm, and then rapidly alluded to the position of affairs even if the independence of the Confederate States should be acknowledged, and generally referred to the position which Baltimore would be placed in as a commercial city.

He concluded his address at ten o'clock, being listened to by the great throng with eagerness. During the delivery of his impassioned words the utmost quietude prevailed, while again the most enthusiastic applause greeted some of his remarks.

Doc. 117.

ADDRESS OF JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE
TO THE PEOPLE OF KENTUCKY.

By your representatives in the last Legislature you conferred on me the commission of Senator in the Congress of the United States. In March last, when my term of service began, the Union had been dissolved by the withdrawal of seven States, which the policy of coercion has since increased to twelve States. At that time a majority of the people of Kentucky still cherished the hope of a peaceful reunion. Soon afterward, when the Government at Washington commenced that series of usurpations which has now left nothing of the Federal Constitution, and resolved on a war of subjugation against the withdrawing States to secure union and brotherhood, you determined to take no part in the war, but to protect your liberties by a position of armed neutrality. This decision was expressed by a large majority of the people at the election in May.

I had opposed this policy before the election, but afterward, in common with the great mass of those with whom I had acted, I acquiesced in your expressed will, and have maintained it as the fixed attitude of Kentucky. In obedience, as I suppose, to your wishes, I proceeded to Washington, and at the special session of Congress, in July, spoke and voted against the whole war policy of the President and Congress; demanding, in addition, for Kentucky, the right to refuse not men only but money also to the war, for I would have blushed to meet you with the confession that I had purchased for you exemption from the perils of the battlefield and the shame of waging war against your Southern brethren by hiring others to do the work you shrank from performing. During that memorable session a very small body of Senators and representatives, even beneath the shadow of a military despotism, resisted the usurpations of the Executive, and with what degree of dignity and firmness they willingly submit to the judgment of the world.

Their efforts were unavailing, yet they may prove valuable hereafter as another added to former examples of manly protest against the progress of tyranny.

On my return to Kentucky, at the close of the late special session of Congress, it was my purpose immediately to resign the office of Senator. The verbal and written remonstrances of many friends in different parts of the State induced me to postpone the execution of my purpose; but the time has arrived to carry it into effect, and accordingly I now hereby return the trust into your hands.

And in this connection, since the Government at Washington has thrown a drag-net over the whole surface of society, to collect proof against individuals of connection with the Government of the Confederate States, and since a portion of the Northern press has charged that certain private correspondence, recently seized at Philadelphia by the Federal authorities, will convict me of political crimes, I deem it due to you and to myself to declare that I have not done or said any thing inconsistent with the relations I have borne to the State and to the Federal Government, or which could reflect a stain upon the commission which I now surrender.

I do not resign because I think I have misrepresented you. On the contrary, I believe that my votes and speeches in the Senate have expressed your deliberate will as attested through the ballot-box. I resign because there is no place left where a Southern Senator may sit in council with the Senators of the North. In truth, there is no longer a Senate of the United States within the meaning and spirit of the Constitution.

The United States no longer exists. The Union is dissolved. For a time after the withdrawal of the Southern States, and while there was a hope that the rupture might be healed, it might be assumed that the Union was not yet dissolved, and such was the position of Kentucky in declaring her neutrality and offering her mediation between the contending parties. But time has now elapsed, and mighty events have occurred, which banish from the minds of reasonable men all expectation of restoring the Union. Coercion has been tried and has failed. The South has mustered in the field nearly as many combatants as the North, and has been far more victorious. The fields of Manassas and Bethel, of Springfield and Lexington, have marked with a terrible and sanguinary line the division between the old order of things and the new.

It is the right of Kentucky and her peculiar duty to recognize these great facts and to act on them. The Constitution compact which created and upheld the old Union is at an end. A large number of the original and additional parties have withdrawn from it—so large a number that its stipulations can no longer be executed, and under such circumstances no court has ever decided a contract to be binding between the remaining parties, or attempted to enforce its execution. The Constitution requires positively that each State shall have at least one representative in Congress, but now twelve States have none; that each State shall have two Senators, but now twelve States have none; that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States, but now in more than one-third of them none are or can be collected. Commerce cannot be regulated between the respective States. Uniform rules of naturalization and bankruptcy cannot be adopted. Post-offices and post-roads, in nearly half the States, have been given up, and a preference is given to the ports of one State over those of another. Even the election of a President has become impossible. The Constitution is mandatory on all the States to appoint electors, and requires a majority of the latter to elect; but more than one-third of the States refuse to appoint, and hence no election can be made by the people. If the election goes to the House of Representatives, the Constitution requires that at least two-thirds of the States shall be represented in that body. The Constitution can no longer be amended; for it requires three-fourths of the States to concur, and more than one-third of the States have withdrawn from the Confederacy. All the safeguards provided for by the States in the instrument, still farther to secure public and personal liberty, have been destroyed. The three departments of the Federal Government, which were carefully separated and their boundaries defined, have been merged into one, and the President, sustained by a great army, wields unlimited power.

The exemption of persons from arrest without judicial warrant, the right of a citizen to have his body brought before a judge to determine the legality of his imprisonment, the security provided against searches and seizure without warrant of law, the sanctity of the home, the trial by jury, the freedom of speech and of the press—these and every other precious right which our fathers supposed they had locked up in the Constitution, have been torn from it and buried beneath the heel of military power. The States made the Constitution, placed rigid boundaries around that Government, and expressly reserved to themselves all powers not delegated. They did not delegate to the Federal Government the power to destroy them—yet the creature has set itself above the creator. The atrocious doctrine is announced by the President, and acted upon, that the States derive their power from the Federal Government, and may be suppressed on any pretence of military necessity. The gallant little State of Maryland has been utterly abolished. Missouri is engaged in a heroic struggle to preserve her existence and to throw off the horrors of martial law proclaimed by a subordinate military commander. Everywhere the civil has given way to the military power.

The fortresses of the country are filled with victims seized without warrant of law, and ignorant of the cause of their imprisonment.

The legislators of States and other public officers are seized while in the discharge of their official duties, taken beyond the limits of their respective States, and imprisoned in the forts of the Federal Government. A subservient Congress ratifies the usurpations of the President, and proceeds to complete the destruction of the Constitution. History will declare that the annals of legislation do not contain laws so infamous as those enacted at the last session. They sweep away every vestige of public and personal liberty, while they confiscate the property of a nation containing ten millions of people. In the House of Representatives it was declared that the South should be reduced to "abject submission," or their institutions be overthrown. In the Senate it was said that, if necessary, the South should be depopulated and re-peopled from the North, and an eminent Senator expressed a desire that the President should be made a dictator. This was superfluous, since they had already clothed him with dictatorial powers. In the midst of these proceedings, no plea for the Constitution is listened to in the North; here and there a few heroic voices are feebly heard protesting against the progress of despotism, but for the most part, beyond the military lines, mobs and anarchy rule the hour.

The great mass of the Northern people seem anxious to sunder every safeguard of freedom; they eagerly offer to the Government what no European monarch would dare to demand. The President and his generals are unable to pick up the liberties of the people as rapidly as they are thrown at their feet. The world will view with amazement this sudden and total overthrow of a Constitution which, if respected, might have been the boast and safeguard of the United States for many generations. When the historian comes to investigate the cause of this result he will record the fact that no department of the Federal Government has ever exhibited a case of aggression by the Southern States upon their Northern associates, and he will trace the dismemberment to the ignorance or disregard, upon the part of the latter, of the true principles of a Confederacy, to long continued and flagrant violations of the Constitution, to avarice, fanaticism, and general corruption. Against all these usurpations I protested in your name, in the presence of their authors, and at the seat of their powers. I protested in vain, and never again will I meet in council with the usurpers.

And now, fellow-citizens, I am sure you will pardon me if I add a few words in reference to the condition of our State and my own course. The Constitution of the United States has been destroyed, and by no act of Kentucky. The power she delegated in that instrument to the Federal Government had vested to her, and any exercise of power over her by that Government, without her consent, is usurpation. In the wreck of the Federal system she exists an independent Commonwealth, with the right to choose her own destiny. She may join the North. She may join the South. She may poise herself on her own centre, and be neutral. In every form by which you could give direct expression to your will, you declared for neutrality. A large majority of the people at the May and August elections voted for the neutrality and peace of Kentucky. The press, the public speakers, the candidates—with exceptions in favor of the Government at Washington so rare as not to need mention—planted themselves on this position. You voted for it, and you meant it. You were promised it, and you expected it. The minority acquiesced in good faith, and at home and abroad this was recognized as the fixed position of the State. It was taken at the beginning of hostilities, and it is but reasonable to infer that every subsequent act of outrage by the Washington Government has confirmed your original purpose. Look, now, at the condition of Kentucky, and see how your expectations have been realized—how these promises have been redeemed.

First, by the aid of some citizens of the State, arms belonging to the whole people were illegally and secretly introduced by order of the President, and distributed to one class of our people upon the false pretence that they needed them for protection against their own fellow-citizens. This was the first violation.

Next, Federal military officers began to recruit soldiers and establish camps in our midst, and Federal money was lavishly expended, in the hope to demoralize and corrupt the people. A studied system of deception was practised as long as possible on the people. For a time it was denied that they were Federal camps, and it was said that they were merely voluntary assemblages of Kentuckians for their own protection and that of the State. These monstrous falsehoods have since been freely exposed. This was the second violation.

Previous to these events the State was in a condition of tranquillity and peace. No indications existed anywhere of internal disorder. But now the people, becoming alarmed at these proofs of a purpose to force Kentucky into the war, began to assemble in great mass meetings and to demand loudly the promised neutrality. The Washington Government, however, and its abettors in Kentucky, supposing their schemes to be ripe for execution, now resolved to have what they called "active loyalty." About this time the Legislature met, and the drama then moved rapidly on. The camps were avowed to be Federal camps. The guns which had been clandestinely and illegally introduced, now called out to maintain "active loyalty." Federal officers began to swarm among us. Every appliance of corruption, every allurement of ambition, was brought into play.

Presently a Federal army was in possession of large portions of the State, and the conspiracy stood fully revealed, while the people, whose only error had been their generous credulity, stood thoroughly betrayed. It is known to citizens of Louisville, of all parties, that just before that meeting of the Legislature a member of the Washington Cabinet said to a prominent citizen of Kentucky that the position of the State should not be maintained, that the Government preferred hostility to neutrality, and that Kentucky must be compelled to support the Federal Government in the war. Your wishes, fellow-citizens, had been spurned, and you have been thrown into this vortex by the Government at Washington, aided by their Kentucky sympathizers.

The pretended reason for the military occupation of the State, founded on the occupation of Columbus by Confederate troops, is uncan-did and false. For, besides the fact that the invasion of Kentucky was a foregone conclusion at Washington, and that camps of soldiers were under arms in our midst to invade Tennessee, it is notorious that General Grant left Cairo to seize Paducah before the occupation of Columbus, while, in taking the latter place, the Confederate troops anticipated the Federal troops by less than an hour. For further proof of the insincerity of the false clamor about the invasion from Tennessee, the Confederate commander announced to your authorities that he occupied Columbus purely in self-defence, and stood ready at any moment to withdraw simultaneously with the Federal forces. To say that the Washington Government had a right to invade the State, is to say that you had no right to be neutral; and to submit to the invasion from a power which has effaced every vestige of the Constitution, would be to bow in the dust and surrender to a simple despotism.

It is not necessary to say much about the Legislature. A majority of them, instead of protecting the rights and persons of the citizens, have, either voluntarily or under duress, been engaged in sustaining the usurpations of the Federal Government, in passing bills of pains and penalties to terrify a spirited people into servitude, in depriving the Governor of his just constitutional authority, and in abdicating their share of the Government by formally inviting a Federal military force to take possession of the State, well knowing, as they did, that this military force would supersede the State Government. Of that body nearly one-fourth have retired because of the military occupation of the State, and the seizure, imprisonment, pursuit, and exile of many of the most eminent and patriotic citizens of the State by that military force. The voices of these members can no longer be heard in the councils of the State, nor their votes be taken. The Legislature is thus, to say the least of it, a mutilated department of the State Government.

It is true that there remains a sufficient number for a quorum; but are they free? For, when the Federal Government takes military possession of a State, its Legislature must conform to the will of the military chief or be suppressed, as we have recently seen in the case of Missouri, whose State Government was dispersed and martial law proclaimed; and, still later, in the case of Maryland, when thirty-eight members of the Legislature were seized and imprisoned on the mere suspicion of intending to legislate at variance with the will of the military government. We cannot, therefore, know that the public resolutions, or pretended laws of the two bodies, are the declarations of their active will, because we have the strongest reason to believe that, if not in accordance with the will of the Government at Washington, they would meet the fate of the Legislatures of Missouri and Maryland. On the other hand, we know that these resolutions and laws are in conflict with their public pledge, and with the expectations of the people.

It is more charitable to believe that the members at Frankfort, or a majority of them, are actuated by a fear of the military power rather than by a perverse design to violate the will of their constituents, and degrade the State to the condition which it is attempted to bring down Missouri and Maryland. If any thing were wanting to strengthen this view, it will be found in attendant events. The resolutions they adopted on the 8th of September, sanctioning the entrance of General Anderson's forces, were accompanied by one declaring that no person should be touched in his life, liberty, or property on account of his political opinions. Yet, on the very day, I believe, that these resolutions passed, the agents of the Federal Government seized the printing establishment of the Louisville Courier, the only offence of whose proprietor was that he criticized with freedom the usurpations of the Government at Washington. At the same time, and ever since, citizens of Kentucky have been imprisoned or compelled to fly from their homes and families, against whom there was no accusation but of holding opinions either unfriendly to Mr. Lincoln's Government or friendly to neutrality. It is impossible to suppose that a free Kentucky Legislature, in view of recent proceedings in other States, would have turned this State over to the possession of a Federal military force, or betrayed the people by throwing the State into the arms of Mr. Lincoln, to be used for Southern subjugation, or consented to the suppression of the press, or suffered, without an outcry that would have pierced the skies, the indignities and outrages which have been inflicted upon the people by Federal soldiers. Fellow-citizens, you have to do now, not with this fragment of a Legislature, with its treason bills and tax bills, with its woeful subserviency to every demand of the Federal despotism, and its woeful neglect of every right of the Kentucky citizen; but you have to deal with a power which respects neither Constitution nor laws, and which, if successful, will reduce you to the condition of prostrate and bleeding Maryland. General Anderson, the military dictator of Kentucky, announces in one of his proclamations that he will arrest no one who does not act, write, or speak in opposition to Mr. Lincoln's Government. It would have completed the idea if he had added, or think in opposition to it. Look at the condition of our State under the rule of our new protectors. They have suppressed the freedom of speech and of the press. They seize people by military force upon mere suspicion, and impose on them oaths unknown to the laws. Other citizens they imprison without warrant, and carry them out of the State, so that the writ of habeas corpus cannot reach them.

Every day foreign armed bands are making seizures among the people. Hundreds of citizens, old and young, venerable magistrates, whose lives have been distinguished by the love of the people, have been compelled to fly from their homes and families to escape imprisonment and exile at the hands of Northern and German soldiers, under the orders of Mr. Lincoln and his military subordinates. While yet holding an important political trust, confided by Kentucky, I was compelled to leave my home and family, and suffer imprisonment and exile. If it is asked why I did not meet the arrest and seek a trial, my answer is, that I would have welcomed an arrest to be followed by a judge and jury; but you well know that I could not have secured these constitutional rights. I would have been transported beyond the State, to languish in some Federal fortress during the pleasure of the oppressor. Witness the fate of Morehead and his Kentucky associates in their distant and gloomy prison.

The case of the gentleman just mentioned is an example of many others, and it meets every element in a definition of despotism. If it should occur in England it would be righted, or it would overturn the British empire. He is a citizen and native of Kentucky. As a member of the Legislature, Speaker of the House, Representative in Congress from the Ashland district, and Governor of the State, you have known, trusted, and honored him, during a public service of a quarter of a century. He is eminent for his ability, his amiable character, and his blameless life. Yet this man, without indictment, without warrant, without accusation, but by the order of President Lincoln, was seized at midnight, in his own house, and in the midst of his family, was led through the streets of Louisville, as I am informed, with his hands crossed and pinioned before him—was carried out of the State and district, and now lies a prisoner in a fortress in New York harbor, a thousand miles away. Do you think that any free Legislature ever assembled in Kentucky since the days of Charles Scott and Isaac Shelby, until now, would have permitted such a spectacle to dishonor the State? No! fellow-citizens, the Legislature could not have been free!

I would speak of these things with the simple solemnity which their magnitude demands, yet it is difficult to restrain the expression of a just indignation while we smart under such enormities. Mr. Lincoln has thousands of soldiers on our soil, nearly all from the North, and most of them foreigners, whom he employs as his instruments to do these things. But few Kentuckians have enlisted under his standard, for we are not yet accustomed to his peculiar form of liberty.

I will not pursue the disgraceful subject. Has Kentucky passed out of the control of her own people? Shall hirelings of the pen, recently imported from the North, sitting in grand security at the Capitol, force public opinion to approve these usurpations and point out victims? Shall Mr. Lincoln, through his German mercenaries, imprison or exile the children of the men who laid the foundations of the Commonwealth, and compel our noble people to exhaust themselves in furnishing the money to destroy their own freedom? Never, while Kentucky remains the Kentucky of old—never, while thousands of her gallant sons have the will and the nerve to make the State sing to the music of their rifles.

The Constitution of the United States, which these invaders unconstitutionally swear every citizen whom they unconstitutionally seize to support, has been wholly abolished. It is as much forgotten as if it lay away back in the twilight of history. The facts I have enumerated show that the very rights most carefully reserved by it to States and to individuals have been most conspicuously violated. And this destruction has been accomplished, not by the President alone, but by the Congress also, and with the approval of the Northern States and people. They have deliberately made the contest a constitutional struggle between so many millions on one side and so many on the other—one party fighting for subjugation, the other in self-defence and for independence. Whatever may be the future relations of the two Confederacies, the idea of the restoration of the Union under the old Constitution is wholly visionary and delusive. If the North should conquer the South, (which it will perceive to be impossible after a few hundred millions more shall be expended and a few hundred thousand lives lost,) the character of the Government would be radically changed. It would probably not take the form even of a mixed Government, but would soon end in a military despotism. It must soon become apparent to all thoughtful men that the last hope of constitutional liberty lies in the early recognition of these great truths—in an honorable peace and friendly intercourse.

You declared your purpose not to engage in the war to subdue the South, and that you would be neutral and mediate in the interests of peace when an opportunity should offer. This is the recorded will of the State as expressed by the people. But those to represent you have violated that will. They have attempted to burden you with enormous taxes to prosecute a war you abhor, and to sustain a Government which has trampled under foot every safeguard of a Constitution which was the only bond of our political connection with it, while they have allowed that Government to cut you off from the only avenues of trade which would enable you to pay these taxes. They have invited a military force of that Government to take possession of the State, and practically to supersede the State Government, and they have seen, with complacency, these foreign soldiers seize, imprison, and pursue hundreds of your fellow-citizens—fugitives, without a crime, over the plains and mountains of Kentucky. In a word, they have attempted, without consulting you, and against your recorded wishes, to place you in active hostility to your Southern brethren, and to fix your political destiny with the North.

Whatever may be the condition or motives of the members at Frankfort, they have exceeded their authority. No legislative assembly or other body, other than one elected by your sovereign voice for that purpose, has the right, in this great revolution, to determine finally your political future. The people, although taken by surprise, and almost unarmed, have risen to vindicate their wishes and expel the Northern invaders. The eagerness with which their aid has been invoked by those who have plunged the State into her present unhappy condition, is the strongest proof of their conviction that, but for the presence of these soldiers, the action of the members at Frankfort would be repudiated by the people. When the Northern invaders shall be sent back across the Ohio River; when the State shall be relieved of all troops from abroad, and the people of Kentucky, by a fair election, shall determine their destiny, it will be the clear duty of every citizen to acquiesce or to retire from the State.

For those who, denied by the Legislature the protection due to the humblest citizen, have been delivered over to the tender mercies of foreign mercenaries, and hunted like partridges on the mountains, what remains but imprisonment, exile, or resistance? As one of them, I intend to resist. I will avoid conflict with Kentuckians, except in necessary self-defence, but I will unite with my fellow-citizens to resist the invaders who have driven us from our homes. To this course we are impelled by the highest sense of duty and the irresistible instincts of manhood. To defend your birthright and mine, which is more precious than domestic ease, or property, or life, I exchange, with proud satisfaction, a term of six years in the Senate of the United States for the musket of a soldier.

This letter is written at the first moment since my expulsion from home that I could place my feet upon the soil of Kentucky. I have not been able to see or communicate with my friend and colleague, Governor Powell, nor do I know what course he will think it proper to take. But this you and I know—that his conduct will be controlled by pure motives.

Your fellow-citizen,

JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Conference met at three o'clock P. M.

George W. Johnson, from the select committee, reported the following resolutions, which were, without debate, unanimously adopted by the Conference.

Whereas the majority of the Legislature of Kentucky have violated their most solemn pledges made before the election, and deceived and betrayed the people; have abandoned the position of neutrality assumed by themselves and the people, and invited into the State the organized armies of Lincoln; have abdicated the government in favor of the military despotism which they have placed around themselves, but cannot control; and have abandoned the duty of shielding the citizen with their protection; have thrown upon our people and the State the horrors and ravages of war, instead of attempting to preserve the peace, and have voted men and money for the war waged by the North for the destruction of our constitutional rights; have violated the express words of the Constitution by borrowing five millions of money for the support of the war without a vote of the people; have permitted the arrest and imprisonment of our citizens, and transferred the constitutional prerogatives of the executive to a military commission of partisans; have seen the writ of habeas corpus suspended without an effort for its preservation, and permitted our people to be driven in exile from their homes; have subjected our property to confiscation, and our persons to confinement in the penitentiary as felons, because we may choose to take part in a contest for civil liberty and constitutional government, against a sectional majority waging war against the people and institutions of fifteen independent States of the old Federal Union, and have done all these things deliberately against the warnings and vetoes of the Governor, and the solemn remonstrances of the minority in Senate and House of Representatives; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the unconstitutional edicts of a factious majority of a Legislature thus false to their pledges, their honor and their interests, are not law, and that such government is unworthy of the support of a brave and free people, and we therefore denounce their unconstitutional acts and usurpations, and bid defiance both to the Federal and State Governments.

Resolved, That abandoned and betrayed as we have been by the Lincolnite majority of the Legislature of Kentucky, and proscribed by the abolition party who have usurped the Federal Government and broken down the Constitution of the Federal Union, and being as yet no part of the Southern Confederacy, and therefore altogether without the protection of law, the people have, by the laws of God and the express letter of the Constitution of Kentucky, "at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their government, in such manner as they may think proper;" and, in the language of the same Constitution, we

Resolved, That we do hereby declare that the majority of the Legislature, by their acts, have abandoned, betrayed, and abdicated the government, and that the people have now a right to a fair representation of their will, and that the Governor be and is hereby invited to convene a Legislature to meet outside of the lines of the Lincoln army, to be composed of such members as are now elected and may attend, or new members to be chosen by the people.

And whereas, we have reason to believe that the Governor is unable to convene the Legislature outside the lines of the Lincoln army; therefore,

Resolved, That we recommend a Convention, to be chosen, elected, or appointed in any manner now possible by the people of the several counties of the State, to meet at Russellville on the 18th of November, and we recommend to them the passage of an ordinance severing forever our connection with the Federal Government, and to adopt such measures, either by the adoption of a provisional government or otherwise, as in their judgment will give full and ample protection to the citizens in their persons and property, and secure to them the blessings of constitutional government.

Resolved, That we recommend to the people in every county where they have the power so to do, to organize at once a County Guard of at least one hundred men, to be armed by the people in every county, and mounted if possible, to be paid as Confederate troops, and subject to duty in their own and adjoining counties, and subject also to the rules and regulations of the Confederate States, and to the orders of the commanding general.

Resolved, That we will never pay one cent of the unconstitutional loan of five millions of dollars obtained by the Legislature from the banks for the prosecution of this war, instituted for the coercion and subjugation of the slaveholding States, and that we will resist by force of arms, if necessary, the collection by the sheriffs of all taxes intended to be paid over to the Lincoln party in the Legislature, and that we denounce as enemies to their country and constitutional government, all those who may advocate the payment of the same to the sheriffs for the purpose aforesaid.

Resolved, That each one of us will go to work actively and energetically, to secure a full representation in such Convention, and that we will urge upon our friends everywhere to take such steps as will secure such a result.

Resolved, * * * * *

Resolved, That Robert McKee, John C. Breckinridge, Humphrey Marshall, George W. Ewing, H. W. Bruce, G. B. Hodge, Wm. Preston, G. W. Johnston, Blanton Duncan, and P. B. Thompson be, and they are hereby appointed a committee to carry out the above resolutions.

A motion offered by B. Duncan, in reference to the publication of the proceedings of the Conference, was adopted.

On motion, the thanks of the Conference were tendered to the Odd Fellows of Russellville, for the use of their hall.

And then the Conference adjourned sine die.

THE PURSUIT OF THE SUMTER.

THE following letter, written on board the United States steamer Powhatan, gives an account of the vigorous pursuit of the Sumter, and of her dodges, escapes, and deprivations:

UNITED STATES SHIP POWHATAN, {
ST. THOMAS, October 9, 1861. }

SIR: As every thing relating to the privateer steamer Sumter is at this moment particularly interesting to the mercantile community, some intelligence of the doings of that vessel and her supposed movements at present may be welcome to those who have vessels and property on the ocean.

It may not be known to you that, while lying at the Southwest Pass, (mouth of the Mississippi,) on the 13th of August, the look-out at the mast-head descried the masts of a vessel, about twenty miles off, bearing N.W. It being late in the evening, nothing could be done; but at early daylight the captain sent off an armed boat, under command of Lieutenant Queen, with orders to steer N.W. until he made a vessel under sail or at anchor. After steering the direction indicated for five or six hours, with a fresh breeze under sail, Lieutenant Queen discovered a large schooner getting under way. A heavy squall came up at the time, and she was for a short period lost to view; but, coming in sight again, the boat gave chase under oars and sails. When she got within range of the schooner, (which was crowding all sail and trying to escape,) a discharge of rifles was fired at her, and, after a close shot or two at the man at the wheel, the schooner hove to and surrendered. She proved to be the "Abbie Bradford," of Boston, a prize to the Sumter. Her papers were secured, and by evening she was lying at anchor near the Powhatan.

Among the papers were letters from the commander of the Sumter and her officers, giving some idea of her future movements, and indicating that her cruising ground was to be down on the Spanish Main. In two or three hours the schooner had a prize crew on board, and the Powhatan was off for Pensacola to notify the flag-officer of the Sumter's whereabouts, the Niagara remaining to blockade the Southwest Pass. On the 14th August, at sunset, we arrived at Pensacola. The captain communicated with Flag-officer Mervine, and in half an hour we were steering south after the Sumter. Rather a lame duck the old Powhatan, in her present condition, to send after a clipper-steamer; but it will be seen that lame ducks on occasions get along as well as some that are not lame. There was, I assure you, a high state of excitement on board the Powhatan at the idea of going after the Sumter, and a great deal of satisfaction expressed at getting away from the mouth of the Mississippi, where the ship had laid at anchor three months, all hands nearly starving for a fight.

On the 17th we boarded some American vessels off Cape St. Antonio, and heard that the Sumter had sent another prize, the "Joseph Maxwell," into Cienfuegos on the 7th of August. In consequence of this intelligence we sailed for Cienfuegos, keeping close into the land, and communicating with all the vessels we met. On the 19th arrived at Cienfuegos; sent a boat in to communicate with the consul; found the Joseph Maxwell in his possession; obtained all the information required; and coasted along the southeastern shore of Cuba, chasing and communicating with all the vessels we saw. Some of these were Americans, and were sure that the Sumter had them, until they saw the stripes and stars. On the 21st we put into Jamaica to coal; heard many contradictory reports about the Sumter, none of which could be relied on, and sailed again on the 25th for Curaçoa—so it was supposed. We arrived in Curaçoa on the 29th, and found that the Sumter had left there on the 24th of July, and had (owing to the facilities she received there) been enabled to capture the Joseph Maxwell and Abbie Bradford off Porto Cabello. A good deal of dissatisfaction existed in Curaçoa amongst the citizens, owing to the course pursued by the Governor in recognizing the Sumter as a vessel of war, and giving her coals, without which she would not have been able to leave that port, and would finally have been captured by some of our ships of war. A long correspondence ensued between the commander of this ship and the Governor of Curaçoa, in which the former, in behalf of his Government, expressed the great dissatisfaction that would be felt by the United States at the course pursued by the Dutch Governor, who seemed to be under the impression that the Union was broken up, and the Sumter was the embodiment of Southern rights and chivalry. It is to be hoped that some of these days the Dutch Governor may be hauled over the coals for giving aid and assistance to a rebel privateer to capture American commerce. Before leaving Curaçoa we heard that the Sumter had been at Trinidad, and had left there steering west. We left Curaçoa on the 2d September, steering northeast, and arrived in St. Thomas on the 5th of the same month, chasing and boarding vessels on the way, by which we found that the Sumter had not been heard of for some time on the Spanish Main. At St. Thomas we heard that the Sumter had gone into Surinam (Dutch Guayana) on the 20th of August. We hustled three hundred and fifty tons of coal on board, and sailed immediately in chase. On the 10th September we communicated with the American consul at Barbadoes, and learned by a mail (that day received) that the Sumter had sailed from Surinam on the 31st August for parts unknown. We remained only an hour at Barbadoes, and shaped our course for Demarara, to see if the Sumter had stopped there, or had turned n her track and gone back to the Caribbean Sea. On the 12th of September communicated with the light-boat at Demarara, and obtained no news of importance; struck out for Surinam, where we arrived on the morning of the 13th. Here we were informed that the Sumter had left that port on the 31st of August, having remained there ten days trying to get coal, which the Governor and merchants were very much opposed to giving.

The Governor of Surinam ordered the Sumter to leave the port in twenty-four hours, but, as she was entirely out of coal, the captain refused to go until he was supplied, and the Governor had not the means to make him go, although there was a Dutch and French steamer of war at the time in port.

Previous to entering the port of Surinam the Sumter had gone to Cayenne, (French Guayana;) but the Governor of that place would not permit her to enter or receive supplies of any kind; in consequence of which the Sumter was obliged to proceed to Surinam under sail. Had vessels been sent in pursuit of her at once after her escape from the Brooklyn, or had the Niagara followed her up, instead of stopping the pursuit at Cienfuegos, the Sumter would long before this have been captured; but there was a great want of intelligence displayed in this matter, for which those concerned have no cause to congratulate themselves.

When the Sumter left Surinam, which she was enabled to do by getting coals from an Englishman, (who else would have supplied her?) she anchored outside, lowered her pipe, made all sail, and, under canvas alone, stood to the northwest. This proceeding was intended to humbug us, but it deceived very few. The Powhatan's head was put to the southeast, and, after various mishaps to our boilers, having to run under low steam against strong head winds, we arrived on the 21st September in Maranh, in the Empire of Brazil, some six hundred miles to the east of the great Amazon, and two degrees south of the Equator. It was a thick and mucky day when we arrived off the mouth of this dangerous river, and there was no prospect of getting a pilot. Our charts were of no account, and there was a prospect of our bringing up on a mud bank; but fortunately we got in by all the dangers, and toward evening picked up a fisherman pilot, who, after a fashion, took us to anchorage, where at low water we found ourselves high and dry, (almost,) the tide rising and falling here eighteen feet.

The American Consul came on board at once, though it was dark, and informed us that the Sumter had only left the port of Maranh five days ago, having cruised off the mouth of the river until three days previous to our arrival, to capture an American brig that was daily expected—the Maria, from New York. For the information of the owners of said vessel, I beg leave to mention that she went into Maranh under the protection of our guns, and the Sumter was for that time disappointed.

You may suppose there was no little excitement on board the Powhatan at finding how close we had run the Sumter with our damaged old boilers, and five hundred sheets of copper off the bottom; but there was considerable dejection when it was ascertained that the bird had flown, and we could not follow her for want of coal, having only a supply on board for six days.

Orders were, however, issued from headquarters to go ahead and coal up, which, being a slow business in Maranh, we did not get through until six days, the Sumter thus having nine days start of us again.

The limits of this communication will not permit me to give an account of Maranh and all our doings, sayings, and hearings at that place; my object is to keep the run of the Sumter, and let the merchants and those concerned know what she has been about, and where she is now likely to be.

We found a curious state of affairs existing in Maranh; the people, from the Governor down, being Sumter-mad, and politics running as high as they ever did in the South—the Brazilians sympathizing almost to a man with the secessionists, under the impression that the South was fighting the battle of Brazil, fighting to protect their property in slaves.

Addresses were made by Capt. Semmes to the Governor and people of Maranh, in which he used the most specious arguments to prove that after the North had abolished slavery in the Southern States she would turn her attention to abolishing slavery in the Brazilian Empire. Of course, the arrival of the Powhatan was looked upon with distrust, and a reward of five hundred dollars (made by an American) to any one who would knock a hole in her bottom, so that she could not follow the Sumter, was received with great favor, the Government taking no steps to stop such proceedings.

In all communities there are weak-minded people who cannot keep a secret intrusted to them; there were some such in Maranh. Capt. Semmes' particular friends let out many facts in relation to his movements which he would much rather have kept secret. We found out all we wanted to know about the Sumter, what coal she could stow, what was her speed, what number of men and what kind of crew she had, and where she would likely turn her attention to capture prizes.

Her cruise to Maranh was rather a barren one, having captured no prizes since she fell in with the "Abbie Bradford" and the "Joseph Maxwell;" the former recaptured by the Powhatan, the latter given up to the American consul at Cienfuegos.

It was said in Maranham that the captain of the Sumter had made arrangements with the Governor by which he could bring his prizes into that port and dispose of them, and there does not seem to exist much doubt on this subject; at all events, Capt. Semmes asserted such to be the case, and his friends and admirers repeated it to show in what high esteem the Sumter and her marauding crew were held.

It would take up too much time to tell all that relates to the reception of the Sumter in Maranham; suffice it to say that her reception was in direct violation of our treaty with Brazil, and in opposition to the views of the Minister of Foreign Relations expressed in the House of Deputies in Rio Janeiro.

So irregular, indeed, did the actions of the Governor appear, that the commander of the Powhatan addressed him on the subject, and in such plain terms that he was not left in doubt as to the opinion entertained of his conduct by those on board this ship, or what would be the course of the Government of the United States when it was made acquainted with the actions of the Maranham authorities.

No courtesies passed between the ship and shore; the commander refused to call on the Governor. The party opposed to his Excellency were in high glee at the mistakes he had committed, and were confident that he would be removed by the Brazilian Government the moment the matter was laid before them.

In a certain degree the United States merit all the indignity shown toward them by these pitiful South American States; they will learn hereafter the value of a navy, for heretofore the miserable politicians who have had this matter in charge have been too mean and short-sighted to provide means even for the protection of our commerce in a small portion of the globe. It is not too late to remedy some of these defects. Our flag officer commanding the West India squadron should be on his station with a dozen effective vessels, and let these small colonies know that they cannot violate treaties with impunity.

It was a great misfortune that the Powhatan did not find the Sumter in the port of Maranham, for then she would have taken her despite the ships and batteries of Brazil, and would have demonstrated to the violators of neutrality that there is a law of nature which does not prohibit nations from relieving themselves from a grievous annoyance in any manner they may think proper.

We waited until the mail steamer came in from the south, and the one from "Para," in the Amazon. From all the accounts gained from these steamers the Sumter could not (without being seen) have gone east, west, or south; and it was supposed by the commander that she had gone to the northeast to lie in wait for vessels bound home from India, the Pacific, and

Brazil, all of which pass the Equator between the longitude of 32° and 40°, and follow one beaten track to the north and west.

Having taken in all the coal we could, (without losing time,) the Powhatan left Maranham on the 27th of September, and steered to get into the track of homeward-bound Indiamen; all hands hoping that we might find the Sumter somewhere about those regions. But it is a wide belt of water, and it would be a mere chance hitting the precise spot she would go to.

The visit of the Powhatan to Maranham happened at a moment when the interests of the United States were being jeopardized by the stupidity of the Governor of the province, the fanatical and ignorant people acting in accordance with the example set them by their superior.

The arrival of so large a ship, (the largest that had ever been seen in that port,) the discipline and good order on board, the drill at great guns, and a sharp shrapnel exercise with the boat guns which took place in the harbor, impressed the citizens with the idea that such a vessel was fully capable of enforcing respect to American rights in that ill-fortified harbor. Her presence was very gratifying to the American Consul, who had seen his flag overshadowed by the ridiculous banner adopted by the so-called Confederate navy. If the Powhatan did not change the secession sentiment, she at least taught the Brazilians that their ports were accessible to our largest ships of war, and they could not allow prizes to Confederate privateers to be held with impunity in that port. They were in no way surprised when informed by the captain and officers that the Sumter would have been taken at all hazards, under the guns of their ships and batteries, and many there were, who, under the circumstances, thought this course perfectly just and proper. These, however, were anti-secessionists, of whom there was a party, (opposed to the Governor,) and the most influential people in the province.

The action of the Governor in regard to the Sumter makes a strong ground for his removal on the demand of the United States Government, and there is an influential party in Maranham who will take advantage of the late disgraceful affair to have him put out of office. Independent of a violation of treaty obligations, he has gone in direct opposition to the views expressed (in the Camera Dos Deputados) by the Minister of Foreign Relations, who expressly denies any intention on the part of the Brazilian Government to permit privateers or their prizes to enter Brazilian ports.

A description of the Sumter, taken from a faithful photograph, may not be uninteresting to merchant captains who may wish to avoid her. She is an awkwardly-rigged bark—half man-of-war, half merchantman. Her mizzenmast is a long way off from her mainmast, and her sails bear a great disproportion to her hull, being too little canvas for so long a vessel. She carries three trysails, all being larger than those carried by a sailing vessel. She carries a fore-staysail and jib, and her bowsprit and head-booms have no steeve. She has two large quarter boats, and one hanging at the stern. She carries topgallantsails, and has a seven feet royal pole without stays. Her courses are deep, (particularly the mainsail,) and her topsails look as if they had a reef in them, being short. She carries no guns on the spar deck, and her pivot gun being nearly in the middle of the ship, it cannot be used in chasing without yawing the ship six points.

Any smart sailing vessel can run away from her on an easy bowline, for on a wind, under sail, she can do nothing of consequence, and she cannot carry her sail on that course without its shaking or getting aback. The range of her largest gun is only twenty hundred yards at high elevation, and she could not hit any thing at a greater distance than fifteen hundred yards, and could not carry her ports out with a heavy sea on.

I trust that, with the above description, (which may be relied on,) merchant ships may be able to avoid her.

My own opinion is that the Sumter will finally turn pirate against all commerce. She has a crew composed of all nations, the greater portion being Portuguese, Spaniards, and English.

The discipline is severe, and though it might be tolerated on board a regular ship of war, it will not be borne by the pirates on board the Sumter, who are already getting discontented, and are only kept in good humor by the anticipation of getting eight hundred dollars each for the prizes they have already captured. When they find that all their prizes have been restored to the owners thereof, bitter will be the disappointment and curses in consequence. Capt. Semmes is not yet aware that all his prizes have been recaptured, or, if he does know it, he does not let his crew into the secret. He sailed from Maranham with fifteen of his men in irons. It would not improve their temper to know that they had worked so long without prize-money, on short rations and hard treatment. It would be a "denouement" worthy of the cause in which the Sumter is engaged to have the crew rise upon the officers, and swing them up to the yard-arm they held in terrorem over American citizens who were guilty of no crime, and such will likely be the end of this wicked enterprise.

From the cruise of the Powhatan one thing has resulted—a conviction that foreign Governments are disposed to consider the power of the United States so far crippled that she cannot give protection to her commerce abroad, and that an attempt is being made to place the privateers of the rebel States on a footing with our ships of war. Our merchant ships are no longer safe in what we generally have considered as friendly ports, for it has been seen that the Sumter has replenished her coal in neutral ports, has threatened American vessels lying in port at the time with capture when caught outside, and has cruised after such vessels, being enabled to do so by the aid of neutrals.

The French are the only people who have acted honorably in this matter. The Sumter was ignominiously turned away from the only French port (Cayenne) she tried to enter; the Governor would not permit him to go in on any terms, though entirely out of coal.

There is but one remedy for such a state of things—an order to capture, sink, or destroy any vessels cruising against United States commerce, let them be overtaken where they may. This protection to privateers is a one-sided business altogether, and the United States had better at once show her dissatisfaction in terms that cannot be misunderstood.

As things stand at present, Brazil will be open to privateers, and the sale of prizes allowed. It is well understood in Maranham that the Governor gave permission to the captain of the Sumter to bring the brig Maria into port and dispose of her cargo, which vessel fortunately escaped, though the Sumter cruised two days off the port for her.

Much disappointment was felt on board the Powhatan at the non-capture of the Sumter. It was confidently anticipated that we should find her in Maranham, when her fate would have been sealed. We lost her only by three days; and had the ship been in a condition to run, or could she have made even seven knots an hour, we would have caught the Sumter and three or four days to spare. The sooner the Government takes steps to capture her the better; twenty vessels would not be too many to send after her. The moral effect of a Confederate privateer wandering over the ocean, (unmolested,) destroying our commerce, is very bad indeed. We must remedy it without delay.

Having returned to the north, taking the track of China traders, and looking out carefully for vessels, we arrived in St. Thomas on the 9th of October.

Respectfully yours, Q. E. D.

THE U. S. SANITARY COMMISSION.

REPORT ON THE CONDITION OF REBEL PRISONERS.

The following is the report of the United States Sanitary Commission upon the condition of the prisoners in the forts at New York:

NEW YORK, October 31, 1861.

SIR: With your permission I visited the prisoners of war and of State at Governor's Island on Monday last.

I should have extended my visit the next day to Fort Lafayette and Ellis Island, where smaller portions were placed, had I not learned that they were all to be removed the next day to Boston harbor. I suppose, however, that none of the prisoners could be badly off if those crowded in the casemates of Castle William were not, and therefore a report of the condition in which I found them may properly serve as a sufficient reply to all the complaints which have appeared in the New York papers.

No doubt the circumstances under which these men were brought to Governor's Island made their condition for a week or two very trying, and almost inhuman. Ill clothed, already sick from the voyage and previous exposure, they were suddenly precipitated upon a post not prepared to receive them, when there was neither adequate room, clothing, nor medical force; but these unavoidable deficiencies were supplied with all the expedition possible. All alacrity was shown, it appears, by the commandant and his surgeon and other officers to meet the case. In a very short time bedding, blankets, sufficient food, and suitable medical attention were furnished to all. As I saw them they were in a better condition in all respects than half our own men in the field—not so crowded as most soldiers in tent, with as abundant food, as good blankets, and more devoted medical attention. There was nothing to complain of, except the unavoidable fact that casemates—although here quite roomy—furnish very poor ventilation, and are in no case comfortable quarters.

The men complained of nothing, (although I gave them ample opportunities to do so,) except the loss of liberty. They spoke kindly of their physicians, and the officers in command. The climate seemed their chief objection to this region. It went sore with them to be sent still further north. They wanted to stay where they had made friends—knew their prison and their keepers, and where they were nearer to sympathizers and to home.

The casemates were singularly clean. I purposely went unannounced, and found the floors bright and sweet. Every man had his own bed and adequate blankets. In addition to the Government supplies, the State of North Carolina had been permitted to send some comforts to the prisoners, and disinterested beneficence in New York had done something more. I could really find no room to add any thing from the stores of the Sanitary Commission.

The hospitals were humanely and tenderly administered by Surgeon Swain and Assistant Surgeon Peters. The sick men looked perfectly comfortable in the regular hospital, and in the temporary hospitals as comfortable as casemates permitted. Medicines of the best kinds, in unlimited quantities, and necessary stimulants in abundance, were supplied to the sick. Several very desperate cases of typhoid had been saved by the assiduity of the physicians. The low spirits of all prisoners are, of course, highly unfavorable to convalescence, and doubtless the sick list and the bill of mortality (seventeen had died) were both larger than they would have been had not home sickness very much prevailed.

Vol. III.—Doc. 22

The men were usually reluctant either to wash or to exercise. They had to be driven to both. Pains were taken to compel them to be in the open air several hours each day. They were not confined within narrow bounds, but had many acres for a play-ground.

The surgeon told me he had seen only one tooth-brush in use among the rank and file. They were evidently careless in personal habits, dirty, and sluggish. The officers were perfectly comfortable for prisoners, and complained of nothing. I saw on the whole abundant evidence of the unreasonableness of the complaints made of the treatment of these men.

It would be a source of great consolation to believe that our prisoners were treated by the rebels half as well.

Very respectfully, yours,

HENRY W. BELLOWS,

President of the U. S. Sanitary Commission.

HON. W. H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State.

GOV. ANDREW'S PROCLAMATION

FOR A DAY OF PUBLIC THANKSGIVING AND PRAISE, NOV. 21, 1861.

THE example of the Fathers, and the dictates of piety and gratitude, summon the people of Massachusetts, at this, the harvest season, crowning the year with the rich proofs of the Wisdom and Love of God, to join in a solemn and joyful act of united Praise and Thanksgiving to the Bountiful Giver of every good and perfect gift.

I do, therefore, with the advice and consent of the Council, appoint THURSDAY, the 21st day of November next, the same being the anniversary of that day, in the year of our Lord sixteen hundred and twenty, on which the Pilgrims of Massachusetts, on board the Mayflower, united themselves in a solemn and written compact of government, to be observed by the people of Massachusetts as a day of Public Thanksgiving and Praise. And I invoke its observance by all people with devout and religious joy.

"Sing aloud unto God, our strength: make a joyful noise unto the God of Jacob.

"Take a psalm, and bring hither the timbrel, the pleasant harp with the psaltery.

"Blow up the trumpet in the new moon, in the time appointed, on our solemn feast day.

"For this was a statute for Israel, and a law of the God of Jacob."—Psalm 81, vs. 1 to 4.

"O bless our God, ye people, and make the voice of his praise be heard:

"Which holdeth our soul in life, and suffereth not our feet to be moved.

"For thou, O God, hast proved us: thou hast tried us, as silver is tried."—Psalm 66, vs. 8, 9.

Let us rejoice in God and be thankful; for the fulness with which He has blessed us in our basket and in our store, giving large reward to the toil of the husbandman, so that "our paths drop fatness:"—

For the many and gentle alleviations of the hardships which, in the present time of public disorder, have afflicted the various pursuits of industry:—

For the early evidences of the reviving energies of the business of the people:—

For the measure of success which has attended the enterprise of those who go down to the sea in ships, of those who search the depth of the ocean to add to the food of man, and of those whose busy skill and handicraft combine to prepare for various use the crops of the earth and the sea:—

For the advantages of sound learning, placed within the reach of all children of the people, and the freedom and alacrity with which these advantages are embraced and improved:—

For the opportunities of religious instruction and worship, universally enjoyed by consciences untrammelled by any human authority:—

For "the redemption of the world by Jesus Christ, for the means of grace, and the hope of glory."

And with one accord, let us bless and praise God for the oneness of heart, mind, and purpose in which He has united the people of this ancient Commonwealth for the defence of the rights, liberties, and honor of our beloved country:—

May we stand forever in the same mind, remembering the devoted lives of our fathers, the precious inheritance of Freedom received at their hands, the weight of glory which awaits the faithful, and the infinity of blessing which it is our privilege, if we will, to transmit to the countless generations of the Future.

And, while our tears flow in a stream of cordial sympathy with the daughters of our people, just now bereft, by the violence of the wicked and rebellious, of the fathers and husbands and brothers and sons, whose heroic blood has made verily sacred the soil of Virginia, and, mingling with the waters of the Potomac, has made the river now and forever ours,—let our souls arise to God on the wings of Praise, in thanksgiving that He has again granted to us the privilege of living unselfishly and of dying nobly, in a grand and righteous cause;

For the precious and rare possession of so much devoted valor and manly heroism;

For the sentiment of pious duty which distinguished our fallen in the camp and in the field;

And for the sweet and blessed consolations which accompany the memories of these dear sons of Massachusetts on to immortality.

And in our praise let us also be penitent. Let us "seek the truth and ensue it," and prepare our minds for whatever duty shall be manifested hereafter.

May the controversy in which we stand be found worthy, in its consummation, of the heroic sacrifices of the people and the precious blood of their sons, of the doctrine and faith of the fathers, and consistent with the honor of God and with justice to all men. And,

"Let God arise, let his enemies be scattered: let them also that hate him flee before him."—
"As smoke is driven away, so drive them away."
—Psalm 68. vs. 1 and 2.

"Scatter them by thy power, and bring them down, O Lord, our shield."—Psalm 69, v. 11.

Given at the Council Chamber, this thirty-first day of October in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, and the eighty-sixth of the Independence of the United States of America.

JOHN A. ANDREW.

By His Excellency the Governor with the advice and consent of the Council.

OLIVER WARNER, Secretary.

GOD SAVE THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

RETIREMENT OF LIEUT.-GEN. SCOTT.

THE following letter, from Lieut.-Gen. Scott, was received by the President on Thursday afternoon, Oct. 31:

HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE ARMY, }
WASHINGTON, D. C., Oct. 31, 1861. }

The Hon. S. Cameron, Secretary of War:

SIR: For more than three years I have been unable, from a hurt, to mount a horse or walk more than a few paces at a time, and that with much pain. Other and new infirmities, dropsy and vertigo, admonish me that a repose of mind and body, with the appliances of surgery and medicine, are necessary to add a little more to a life already protracted much beyond the usual span of man.

It is under such circumstances made doubly painful by the unnatural and unjust rebellion now raging in the Southern States of our so late prosperous and happy Union, that I am compelled to request that my name be placed on the list of army officers retired from active service.

As this request is founded on an absolute right granted by a recent act of Congress, I am entirely at liberty to say that it is with deep regret that I withdraw myself, in these momentous times, from the orders of a President who has treated me with distinguished kindness and courtesy—whom I know, upon much personal intercourse, to be patriotic without sectional partialities or prejudices, to be highly conscientious in the performance of every duty, and of unrivalled activity and perseverance.

And to you, Mr. Secretary, whom I now officially address for the last time, I beg to acknowledge my many obligations for the uniform high consideration I have received at your hands, and have the honor to remain, sir,

With high respect, your obedient servant,

WINFIELD SCOTT.

A special Cabinet council was convened on Friday morning, Nov. 1, at 9 o'clock, to take the subject into consideration.

It was decided that Gen. Scott's request, under the circumstances of his advanced age and infirmities, could not be declined.

Gen. McClellan was thereupon, with the unanimous agreement of the Cabinet, notified that the command of the army would be devolved upon him.

At four o'clock in the afternoon the Cabinet again waited upon the President and attended him to the residence of General Scott. On being seated, the President read to the General the following order:

"On the 1st day of November, A. D. 1861, upon his own application to the President of the United States, Brevet Lieutenant-General Winfield Scott is ordered to be placed, and hereby is placed, upon the list of retired officers of the army of the United States, without reduction in his current pay, subsistence, or allowances.

"The American people will hear with sadness and deep emotion that General Scott has withdrawn from the active control of the army, while the President and the unanimous Cabinet express their own and the nation's sympathy in his personal affliction, and their profound sense of the important public services rendered by him to his country during his long and brilliant career, among which will ever be gratefully distinguished his faithful devotion to the Constitution, the Union, and the flag, when assailed by a parricidal rebellion.

"ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

General Scott thereupon rose and addressed the President and Cabinet, who had also risen, as follows:

PRESIDENT: This honor overwhelms me. It overpays all services I have attempted to render to my country. If I had any claims before, they are all obliterated by this expression of approval by the President, with the unanimous support of his Cabinet. I know the President and this Cabinet well—I know that the country has placed its interests, in this trying crisis, in safe keeping. Their counsels are wise. Their labors are untiring as they are loyal, and their course is the right one.

President, you must excuse me; I am unable to stand longer to give utterance to the feelings of gratitude which oppress me. In my retirement I shall offer up my prayer to God for this Administration, and for my country. I shall pray for it with confidence in its success over its enemies, and that speedily.

The President then took leave of General Scott, giving him his hand, and saying he hoped soon to write him a private letter expressive of his gratitude and affection. The President added:

GENERAL: You will naturally feel solicitude about the gentlemen of your staff, who have rendered you and their country such faithful service. I have taken that subject into consideration. I understand that they go with you to New York. I shall desire them, at their earliest convenience, after their return, to make their wishes known to me. I desire you, however, to be satisfied that, except the unavoidable privation of your counsel and society, which they have so long enjoyed, the provision which will be made for them will be such as to render their situation as agreeable hereafter as it has been heretofore.

Each member of the Administration then gave his hand to the veteran, and retired in profound silence.

The following is the response of the Secretary of War to the letter of General Scott:

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, Nov. 1, 1861.

GENERAL: It was my duty to lay before the President your letter of yesterday, asking to be relieved, under the recent act of Congress.

In separating from you, I cannot refrain from expressing my deep regret that your health, shattered by long service and repeated wounds, received in your country's defence, should render it necessary for you to retire from your high position at this momentous period of our history.

Although you are not to remain in active service, I yet hope that while I continue in charge of the Department over which I now preside, I shall at times be permitted to avail myself of the benefits of your counsels and sage experience. It has been my good fortune to enjoy a personal acquaintance with you for over thirty years, and the pleasant relations of that long time have been greatly strengthened by your cordial and entire coöperation in all the great questions which have occupied the Department and convulsed the country for the last six months.

In parting from you I can only express the hope that a merciful Providence, which has protected you amidst so many trials, will improve your health and continue your life long after the people of the country shall have been restored to their former happiness and prosperity.

I am, General, very sincerely, your friend and servant,
SIMON CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

To Lieut.-Gen. WINFIELD SCOTT, present.

The following is the official announcement to the army of the retirement of General Scott, and the assumption of the command of the army by General McClellan:

General Order No. 94.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJ'T-GEN.'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, Nov. 1, 1861.

The following order from the President of the United States, announcing the retirement from active command of the honored veteran, Lieutenant-General Winfield Scott, will be read by the army with profound regret:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, NOV. 1, 1861.

On the first day of November, A. D. 1861, upon his own application to the President of the United States, Brevet Lieutenant-General Winfield Scott is ordered to be placed, and hereby is placed, upon the list of retired officers of the army of the United States, without reduction of his current pay, subsistence, or allowance. The American people will hear with sadness and deep emotion that General Scott has withdrawn from the active control of the army, while the President and a unanimous Cabinet express their own and the nation's sympathy in his personal affliction, and their profound sense of the important public services rendered by him to his country during his long and brilliant career, among which will ever be gratefully distinguished his faithful devotion to the Constitution, the Union, and the flag, when assailed by parricidal rebellion.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The President is pleased to direct that Major-General George B. McClellan assume the command of the army of the United States.

The head-quarters of the army will be established in the city of Washington. All communications intended for the Commanding General will hereafter be addressed direct to the Adjutant-General. The duplicate returns, orders, and other papers heretofore sent to the Assistant Adjutant-General's headquarters of the army, will be discontinued.

By order of the Secretary of War,
L. THOMAS, Adjutant-General.

Immediately on the publication of this order, Major-General McClellan issued the

General Order No. 19.

HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE ARMY, }
WASHINGTON, D. C., NOV. 1, 1861. }

In accordance with General Order No. 94, from the War Department, I hereby assume command of the armies of the United States.

In the midst of the difficulties which encompass and divide the nation, hesitation and self-distrust may well accompany the assumption of so vast a responsibility; but confiding, as I do, in the loyalty, discipline, and courage of our troops, and believing, as I do, that Providence will favor ours as the just cause, I cannot doubt that success will crown our efforts and sacrifices.

The army will unite with me in the feeling of regret that the weight of many years, and the effect of increasing infirmities, contracted and intensified in his country's service, should just now remove from our head the great soldier of our nation—the hero who, in his youth, raised high the reputation of his country in the fields of Canada, which he sanctified with his blood; who, in more mature years, proved to the world that American skill and valor could repeat, if not eclipse, the exploits of Cortez in the land of the Montezumas; whose whole life has been devoted to the service of his country;

whose whole efforts have been directed to uphold our honor at the smallest sacrifice of life;—a warrior who scorned the selfish glories of the battle-field, when his great qualities as a statesman could be employed more profitably for his country; a citizen who, in his declining years, has given to the world the most shining instances of loyalty in disregarding all ties of birth, and clinging to the cause of truth and honor. Such has been the career of Winfield Scott, whom it has long been the delight of the nation to honor as a man and a soldier.

While we regret his loss, there is one thing we cannot regret—the bright example he has left for our emulation. Let us all hope and pray that his declining years may be passed in peace and happiness, and that they may be cheered by the success of the country and the cause he has fought for and loved so well. Beyond all that, let us do nothing that can cause him to blush for us. Let no defeat of the army he has so long commanded embitter his last years, but let our victories illuminate the close of a life so grand.

GEO. B. MCCLELLAN,
Major-General Commanding U. S. A.

SURPRISE NEAR RENICK, MO.

THE Hannibal Messenger gives the following particulars of this affair:

We have additional intelligence from various sources of Lieut.-Col. Morso's expedition south from Macon City. It appears that he left Macon the latter part of last week with 450 cavalry and infantry, took the enemy, reported to be 800 strong, under Sweeny, completely by surprise near Renick, in Randolph County, captured all their pickets, and was pouring a murderous fire into their ranks before they were aware of his presence.

The consternation is said to have been great in the rebel camp, the occupants flying in every direction for dear life. One of the fugitives is said to have passed through New London a few mornings since with nothing but his shirt and pants on.

Augustus Columbus Appler, late of the Democrat and News of this city, is said to have been taken prisoner. When he was found, it is said he was lying in the grass, feigning death; but on being pricked in the "rear" with a bayonet, he bounded with the agility of an acrobat, and was immediately restored to life.

If it be true that Appler was found in the camp and taken prisoner, it will be apt to go hard with him, as he took the oath while retained a prisoner by the Illinois Sixteenth, in Camp Hays, last summer.

We understand that the rebel prisoners who were taken in the surprise near Renick, say the Federals had fourteen wounded, but make no mention of their own loss, which must have been much heavier.

Col. Morse left his infantry at Renick, and with his cavalry went in pursuit of the enemy, since which nothing has been heard of him. We learn that considerable uneasiness is felt for his safety at head-quarters in Macon City.

PROCLAMATION BY GENERAL DIX,

IN REFERENCE TO THE MARYLAND ELECTION.

HEAD-QUARTERS, BALTIMORE, {
November 1, 1861. }

To the United States Marshal of Maryland and the Provost Marshal of the City of Baltimore:

Information has come to my knowledge that certain individuals who formerly resided in this State, and are known to have been recently in Virginia bearing arms against the authority and the forces of the United States, have returned to their former homes with the intention of taking part in the election of the 6th of November inst., thus carrying out at the polls the treason they have committed in the field.

There is reason also to believe that other individuals, lately residents of Maryland, who have been engaged in similar acts of hostility to the United States, or in actively aiding and abetting those in arms against the United States, are about to participate in the election for the same treacherous purpose, with the hope of carrying over the State by disloyal votes to the cause of rebellion and treason. I, therefore, by virtue of the authority vested in me to arrest all persons in rebellion against the United States, require you to take into custody all such persons in any of the election districts or precincts in which they may appear at the polls, to effect their criminal attempt to convert their elective franchise into an engine for the subversion of the Government and for the encouragement and support of its enemies.

In furtherance of this object, I request the judges of elections in the several precincts of the State, in case any such person shall present himself and offer his vote, to commit him until he can be taken into custody by the authority of the United States; and I call on all good and loyal citizens to support the judges of elections, the United States Marshal and his deputies, and the Provost Marshal of Baltimore and police, in their efforts to secure a free and fair expression of the voice of the people of Maryland, and at the same time to prevent the ballot-box from being polluted by treasonable votes.

JOHN A. DIX,
Major-General Commanding.

THE PEACE OF MISSOURI.

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN GENERALS FREMONT AND PRICE.

Whereas Maj.-Gen. Sterling Price, commanding the Missouri State Guard, by letter dated at his head-quarters near Neosho, Missouri, October 26, 1861, has expressed a desire to enter into some arrangement with Maj.-Gen. John C. Fremont, commanding the forces of the United States, to facilitate the future exchange of prisoners of war released on parole; also, that all persons heretofore arrested for the mere expression of political opinions may be released from confinement or parole; also, that in future the war be confined exclusively to the armies in the field, and has authorized and empowered Major Henry W. Williams and D. Robert Barclay, Esq., to enter into such an arrangement in his behalf;

And whereas Major-General John C. Fremont concurs with Major-General Price;

Now, therefore, It is hereby stipulated and agreed by and between Maj.-Gen. John C. Fremont and Maj.-Gen. Sterling Price, as follows, to wit:

First.—A joint proclamation shall be issued, signed by Maj.-Gen. Fremont and Maj.-Gen. Price, in proper person, in the following language, to wit:

PROCLAMATION.

To all peaceably disposed citizens of the State of Missouri greeting:

Whereas A solemn agreement has been entered into by Major-Generals Fremont and Price, respectively commanding antagonistic forces in the State of Missouri, to the effect, that in future arrests or forcible interference by armed or unarmed parties of citizens within the limits of said State for the mere entertainment or expression of political opinions, shall hereafter cease; that families now broken up for such causes may be reunited, and that the war now progressing shall be exclusively confined to armies in the field; therefore, be it known to all whom it may concern—

1. No arrests whatever on account of political opinions, or for the merely private expression of the same, shall hereafter be made within the limits of the State of Missouri, and all persons who may have been arrested and are now held to answer upon such charges only, shall be forthwith released. But it is expressly declared that nothing in this proclamation shall be construed to bar or interfere with any of the usual and regular proceedings of the established courts and statutes and orders made and provided for such offences.

2. All peaceably-disposed citizens who may have been driven from their homes because of their political opinions, or who may have left them from fear of force and violence, are hereby advised and permitted to return, upon the faith of our positive assurances that while so returning they shall receive protection from both armies in the field, whenever it can be given.

3. All bodies of armed men acting without the authority or recognition of the Major-General before named, and not legitimately connected with the armies in the field, are hereby ordered at once to disband.

4. Any violation of either of the foregoing articles shall subject the offender to the penalty of military law, according to the nature of the offence.

In testimony whereof, the aforesaid John Charles Fremont, at Springfield, Mo., on the first day of November, A. D. 1861, and Major-General Sterling Price, at —, on this — day of November, A. D. 1861, have hereunto set their hands, and hereby mutually pledge their earnest efforts to the enforcement of the above articles of agreement, according to their full tenor and effect, to the best of their ability.

Second.—Brig.-Gen. Samuel R. Curtis, or the officer in command at Benton barracks, is hereby authorized and empowered to represent Major-General Fremont; and Col. D. H. Armstrong, Hon. J. Richard Barrett, and Col. Robert M. Renick, or either of them, are hereby authorized and empowered to represent Major-General Price; and the parties so named are hereby authorized, whenever applied to for that purpose, to negotiate for the exchange of any and all persons who may hereafter be taken prisoners of war and released on parole; such exchanges to be made upon the plan heretofore approved and acted upon, to wit: grade for grade, or two officers of lower grade as an equivalent in rank for one of a higher grade, as shall be thought just and equitable.

Thus done and agreed at Springfield, Missouri, this first day of November, 1861.

By order of Major-General Fremont,

J. H. EATON, A. A. A. G.

Major-Gen. Sterling Price.

D. ROBERT BARCLAY, Commissioners.

FREMONT'S ADDRESS TO HIS ARMY.

HEAD-QUARTERS WESTERN DEPARTMENT, }
SPRINGFIELD, Mo., November 2, 1861. }

SOLDIERS OF THE MISSISSIPPI ARMY: Agreeably to orders received this day, I take leave of you. Although our army has been of sudden growth, we have grown up together, and I have become familiar with the brave and generous spirits which you bring to the defence of your country, and which makes me anticipate for you a brilliant career. Continue as you have begun, and give to my successor the same cordial and enthusiastic support with which you have encouraged me. Emulate the splendid example which you have already before you, and let me remain as I am, proud of the noble army which I have thus far labored to bring together.

Soldiers, I regret to leave you. Most sincerely I thank you for the regard and confidence you have invariably shown me. I deeply regret that I shall not have the honor to lead you to the victory which you are just about to win; but I shall claim the right to share with you in the joy of every triumph, and trust always to be personally remembered by my companions in arms.

JOHN C. FREMONT,
Major-General.

THE COAST DEFENCES.

GOV. CURTIN'S REPLY TO SECRETARY SEWARD.

The following is a copy of the letter addressed by Gov. Curtin to Secretary Seward, in reply to his circular on coast defences:

PENNSYLVANIA EXECUTIVE CHAMBER, }
HARRISBURG, November 2, 1861. }

Hon. William H. Seward, Secretary of State,
Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I received, a few days since, an envelope, apparently from the Department of State, at Washington, enclosing a slip from a newspaper, purporting to be a copy of a letter from you to the Governor of New York. This mode of communicating advice by the Government of the United States to the State authorities is so unusual, that I am, perhaps, not quite justified in assuming, as I do, that the communication is authentic.

I am glad to learn that the prospect of a disturbance of our amicable relations with foreign countries is now less serious than it has been at any period during the course of the insurrection. The duty of taking precaution against such disturbance is appropriate to the Government of the United States; and as, when the prospect was more serious, it was not thought fit to invite to the subject the attention of Congress, which had authority to make suitable provision, I do not understand how the fact that it is now less serious can afford a reason for calling on individual States, which have no such authority.

What Congress has done or omitted you of course must know, but it seems strange that general appropriations for military purposes should render lawful the expense of fortifying Washington, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and other places, and yet that the Government should falter under an apprehension of want of authority when the question is of fortifying seaboard and lake ports.

The regular session of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, as you may be aware, will not commence until more than a month after the next meeting of Congress. When you assure me that the prospect of disturbance is now less serious than it has been at any period since the insurrection began, I feel that your letter would not justify me in calling a special session, and, without action by the Legislature, I have less authority to act than the Executive of the United States, since the subject itself is within the scope of the General Government, and is not within that of a State Government.

State Governments have recently (in conformity with the spirit of the constitutional provisions in regard to the militia) acted as agents of the General Government, in raising volunteers for the general defence, and in clothing, arming, equipping, and supplying them; but even in this matter, not, it is believed, beyond their own people and territory.

Some of the points important for the maritime defence of Pennsylvania are situated in other States. It could not, of course, be expected that the authorities of this Commonwealth should go into New Jersey or Delaware to erect fortifications.

If they are to be erected by the concurrent action of the several States immediately concerned, an agreement among them would be necessary to determine what should be done, and what proportion of the expense of doing it should be borne by each.

No such agreement could be lawfully made without the action of the several State Legislatures, and the Constitution expressly prohibits its being made at all without the assent of Congress.

To pay the expenses of the proposed fortifications, the States must, of course, resort to loans.

The effect produced by the competition of a principal with his own agents has already been illustrated by the embarrassments attending that system in the raising of volunteers, and in the procuring of clothing and other supplies for them.

To throw several of the States on the money market, in direct competition with the large loans necessary to be made by the General Government, especially under the discouraging influence which the publication of your letter may have on public credit, is an experiment which must lead to embarrassments of a similar kind, but probably more injurious.

It is not doubted that provision for reimbursement would be made by law, for Congress, at its last session, promptly passed an act providing for the reimbursement of expenses incurred by the States in raising, &c., volunteers for the defence of the United States.

For that defence Pennsylvania has, in proportion to her population, furnished a larger and more effective force, and at a greatly less expense, than any other State, and her people are now freely contributing their money to the loans of the United States.

Under the above-mentioned act of Congress, the Government of the United States, through its proper department, agreed to pay at once to the several States forty per cent. of their expenditures, as stated by their respective authorities, but this payment has thus far been withheld from Pennsylvania for the reasons, as given, that she is so wealthy a State, and has expended so little money in proportion to the large material aid which she has furnished, that she can wait till a more convenient season; in other words, that the economy of her Government and the liberality of her people afford grounds for refusing to her the prompt, though partial reimbursement which is made to other States, and which she would seem to have deserved not less, but rather more than they.

In regard to the final settlement of these accounts, I observe that a communication has already been received, (backed by a certificate of a person holding a high official position at Washington,) setting forth the necessity that the agent for settling them should possess an intimate knowledge of all the laws and precedents applicable to such cases to be found in the past history of the Government, and adding that this knowledge and proper consultations with the accounting officers will be necessary to enable him to advise as to the best mode of making up and proving the accounts, many of which must otherwise be rejected by the accounting officers.

These circumstances lead me to express the hope that the next provision by Congress for the reimbursement of the States may be so arranged that some faith may be reposed in the accounting departments of the several States, and that (at least in cases where the amount claimed is so small, in comparison with the services rendered, and with what they would have cost the United States directly, as to exclude the possibility of extravagance or prodigality) the actual expenditures made by the States may be refunded to them, without the necessity of resettling and revouching the accounts under such formidable conditions.

On the whole, I suggest that the best mode of attaining the end which you propose, would be for the General Government itself to immediately undertake the fulfilment of its own duties in this regard, in which it will prove, if necessary, the prompt, earnest, and zealous aid of the Government and people of this Commonwealth.

If, however, this course should not be assented to, then I have to say that Pennsylvania, in any way that may be required, will give her last man and her last dollar to quell domestic treason or drive back foreign invasion, and will leave to a more quiet season the discussion and decision of the various questions that may arise from steps that have been taken during the existing crisis.

In case, therefore, the General Government should persist in the plan which you suggest, I beg that the President will, as you propose, forthwith send proper agents of that Government to Harrisburg, to confer with me on the position and character of the necessary fortifications, so that no delay may occur in adopting proper measures for their construction.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. G. CURTIN.

ZAGONYI'S LETTER

TO THE LADIES OF SPRINGFIELD, MISSOURI.

HEAD-QUARTERS, FREMONT BODY GUARD, }
SPRINGFIELD, Nov. 2, 1861. }To Mrs. Worrell and others, ladies of Springfield:

LADIES: Your flattering offer to present a flag to the Fremont Body Guard is appreciated and gratefully acknowledged.

Some intimation of such a gift reached me late yesterday afternoon, and I much regret the mistake or misunderstanding which prevented a proper recognition of your kindness at that time.

But it is with far more profound sorrow that I find myself compelled to decline the proffered presentation. It would be idle to affect ignorance of the fact that the same distinction has been conferred upon a body of men who, though placed under my command upon the occasion to which your partiality obliges me to refer, deserted me at the very moment of conflict, and exposed the officers and men of the Body Guard to a fate which the hand of Providence alone could avert.

The honor of the soldiers under my command, dear to me as my own, I must not permit to be sullied or tarnished in the slightest degree.

The Union women of Springfield are too noble and generous to misinterpret this rejection of a testimonial which, under other circumstances, would be so thankfully received and so highly prized. To the forlorn band which entered this city a few days ago, they gave a cordial welcome; to its patriotism their approval has added zeal; their sympathy and tenderness are now softening the tedious confinement of its wounded, and they will pardon that scrupulous self-respect which forbids the Body Guard to share the rewards of a victory with those who refused to participate in its hazards. Respectfully, CHARLES ZAGONYI,
Major Commanding Body Guard.

BEAUREGARD'S LETTER.

CENTREVILLE, WITHIN HEARING OF THE } ENEMY'S GUNS, Sunday, Nov. 3, 1861. }To Editors Richmond Whig:

GENTLEMEN: My attention has just been called to an unfortunate controversy now going on relative to the publication of a synopsis of my report of the battle of Manassas. None can regret more than I do this, from a knowledge that, by authority, the President is the sole judge of when and what part of the commanding officer's report shall be made public. I, individually, do not object to delaying its publication as long as the War Department thinks proper and necessary for the success of our cause. Meanwhile I entreat my friends not to trouble themselves about refuting the slanders and calumnies aimed against me. Alcibiades, on a certain occasion, resorted to an extraordinary method to occupy the minds of his traducers—let, then, that synopsis answer the same purpose for me in this instance. If certain minds cannot understand the difference between patriotism, the highest civic virtue, and office-seeking, the lowest civic occupation, I pity them from the bottom of my heart. Suffice it to say that I prefer the respect and esteem of my countrymen to the admiration and envy of the world. I hope, for the sake of our cause and country, to be able, with the assistance of kind Providence, to answer my calumniators with new victories over our national enemies, but I have nothing to ask of the country, Government, or any friends, except to afford me all the aid they can in the great struggle we are now engaged upon. I am not either a candidate, nor do I desire to be a candidate, for any civil office in the gift of the people or Executive. The aim of my ambition, after having cast my mite in the defence of our sacred cause, and assisted, to the best of my ability, in securing our rights and independence as a nation, is to retire to private life, my means then permitting, never again to leave my home, unless to fight anew the battles of my country.

Respectfully, your most obedient servant,

P. T. BEAUREGARD.

SPEECH OF REVERDY JOHNSON,

AT A MASS MEETING OF THE UNION CITIZENS OF BALTIMORE CO., AT CALVERTON, MD., NOV. 4.

FELLOW-CITIZENS OF BALTIMORE COUNTY:—My failure to appear before you until the closing period of the canvass, I am sure, you will not attribute to any indifference to the momentous questions which it involves, or to a want of grateful sensibility for the honor of the nomination which your Union Convention, on the 12th of September, conferred upon me. Whilst these questions have almost engrossed my thoughts from their first appearance, that nomination advised me that those by whom it was made, and representing in that particular, as I supposed, your opinion, believed that I might be able to serve our State in her present exigency, and, by doing so constitutionally and loyally, assist the Government of the whole in its sworn duty to uphold its rightful authority by suppressing, through the use of all its delegated powers, the cruel, unprovoked rebellion which is aiming its destruction.

But the call, so wholly unexpected, found me under professional obligations which I could not, without a violation of honor, abandon, and which I found myself unable to postpone. But my heart has been with you and my associate candidates in all your united efforts, and, to some extent, though not upon the immediate theatre of the struggle, I have done what I could to assist in bringing it to a successful issue. Hoping that this explanation will be satisfactory, I proceed briefly to lay before you, in plain and unambitious language, some thoughts suited, as I think, to the occasion.

I have characterized the questions before us as momentous. Are they not? They affect the very life of our institutions. They threaten with extinction, perpetual extinction, all the elements of our social and political prosperity. They strike at the peace and happiness which was ours, and to an extent "beyond any thing that the history of the world could parallel." Whence the madness and the crime of their agitation? How happens it that at the very moment when, of all that had passed since the Constitution was adopted by our fathers, "in order to form a more perfect Union," the entire country was happier, richer, more powerful, in fact and in the world's esteem, than ever before, and when individual rights and all the reserved rights of the States were never more faithfully observed, and protected, and secured; how happened it, I say, that cursed rebellion then lifted its unholy hands, and has succeeded in involving us in frightful civil war, converting brothers into enemies, peaceful fields, but recently filled only with the cheerful sounds of contented and remunerative industry, into fields of blood and agony; homes, the abode of happiness and the schools of innocence and kindness, into scenes of harrowing suffering, and in many instances, it is feared, of almost demoniac passion. That reason, enlightened reason, pure love of country, could not have produced the change, every unprejudiced, intelligent, and patriotic mind will at once concede. What, then, is the cause? The failure to elect a President selected by a few men. The failure to elect one whom the people they have succeeded in deluding to their ruin they knew would esteem to be national, and which failure, for that very reason, they plotted to accomplish, satisfied that its success would be fatal to their long-meditated treason. The cause, then, is simply that a President was elected other than their own nominee—the nominee whose recent final step into the ranks of the conspirators, an outcast from the State of his birth, a State that had heaped her honors upon him without stint, proving himself a traitor to her as well as to the Union, and a fit instrument, in the hands of his co-conspirators, to assist in the nation's destruction.

Before a single measure was announced indicating the policy or the purpose of the President elect—before a single act was done by any branch of the Government touching any real or alleged Southern right; without consulting even their own people, but with "malice aforethought" for many years polluting their bosoms, they at once threw aside the mask which had so long concealed their deformity, and without shame, in the face of day, and many—most of them—enjoying at the moment, as they had done for years, the honors which the Union had given them, cast aside the allegiance which, over and over again, they had sworn to their God to observe, and avowed themselves, even with a boast, rebels and traitors. They had, too, as far as they could, guarded against the frustration of their unrivalled wickedness. A Secretary of War became one of them. By some of the party, as I know, he had been from the beginning of his official career, regarded with utter detestation. His gross and multiplied corruptions were the constant themes of their indignant denunciation. Nor was this expressed in a corner. His name was considered by them as the very synonyme of official baseness, and they made no secret of it. The moment, however, the time approached, when, to divulge their own dishonor, they called him into their counsels. They knew that treason in him, from his antecedents, could be relied upon. They knew that official faith, though secured by official oath, with him would be no restraint. They knew that with him, to deceive the President, who had appointed and weakly confided in him, would probably rather be a delight than an objection. Their anticipations were not disappointed. They were seen under the darkness of night, for nights and nights together, wending their way to his residence—which before, they would have esteemed it disgrace to enter—and there they, with him, concocted the acts of official baseness which have given undying infamy to his name. The army was dispersed; the arms and ammunition of the Government placed beyond its reach; officers put in command with treachery promised in advance. The blow was struck, and the traitors stood confessed, and boasted their treason, seeking no other justification than a notion of State sovereignty paramount to that of the General Government, not only absurd in principle and impracticable in practice, but in direct conflict with the very purpose and express words of the Constitution, which declare that the "Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land," that is, of the whole land, whether under Territorial or State Government.

Never, in human annals, did prejudice or ignorance before believe so preposterous a doctrine; and yet it is on this, and on this alone, that secession asserts its legality. The history of the Constitution repudiates it; the grounds on which its adoption by the people was resisted reject it; the fears anticipated from its operation repel it; the instrument itself, in clear terms, denounces it; and its administration, by every department of the Government, from the days of Washington to the present hour, scouts it. If, as is possible, there are men of capacity and intelligence who sincerely believe in it, the remark of Beaumarchais on the Girondists is even more applicable to them: "My God! what idiots these men of talent are." But they have brought the minds of thousands to credit the heresy. At war with reason, and fatal to any Union of States that may be formed—sure in the end, and at no distant period, to work its destruction, they have made it a part of their rebellious Constitution. This is done but the better to accomplish the delusion. The very incorporation of the principle demonstrates that they know it is not to be found in the Constitution which they are, under its pretence, seeking to overthrow. Assuming this heresy as a right, they go a step further, and contend that whether right or not, there is no rightful power in the Government to prevent it. They maintain that once acted upon, the people of the States seceded cannot be forced back into their allegiance, or suffered if willing, if their State forbids it, to return to it, because the State stands between them and their original duty, and there is no authority to coerce a State. This asserted consequence of secession is, if possible, even more absurd than its twin folly; and yet respectable gentlemen in our own State are its victims. A committee of our now defunct Legislature, at a session called for a definite purpose—not only not carried out, but persistently denied, the consulting the will of the people of the State, on the very question of their disputed allegiance—in a report, ingeniously prepared, culling from the debates of the Convention which prepared the Constitution extracts of speeches by Hamilton, Madison, and others, without giving the context, or stating fairly and fully the very questions being discussed, sought to maintain the groundless, absurd theory. And, more recently, three respectable Peace gentlemen of Harford County have given it the sanction of their names. When the will is father to the thought, nothing is easier than to find reasons to uphold it. In every branch of science and of literature, general or political, this has been over and over again illustrated. The absurdity is first adopted from choice, without reflection, and the mind is at work at once to maintain it. Experience is rejected, the teachings of the wise are forgotten or disregarded, the very nature of things is repudiated, and the mind of the deluded goes everywhere but where it should, to see the true character of its adopted folly. Spirit-rapping, Millerism, fanaticism in all its numerous shapes, are not more the subjects of self-delusion and persistent ignorance, honestly entertained, than the belief in the doctrine of State secession and individual impunity for allegiance violated and treason perpetrated through the protection of State power.

The debates relied upon for the heresy are utterly misunderstood. It was proposed to insert in the Constitution an express power to coerce a State. This was opposed by the great statesmen referred to, and rejected; but why? For reasons, as given by themselves, in direct conflict with the dogma. It was said, and with truth, that such a power, recognizing as it would a State as a party to such a conflict, would be to place her in the attitude of a belligerent to the United States, and justify other nations in so considering and treating her. The chief defect of the Articles of Confederation, which the Constitution was to supersede, was that the States and the Confederation, in the event of conflict, would hold that relation toward each other. This very relation was the parent of all the ills the country had suffered, and it was the often repeated purpose of the leading members of the Convention effectually to obviate and guard against it in the future. They objected, therefore, to insert a provision which might be construed to continue the very weakness to which the Confederation was, by experience, found liable. They sought, with this end, to pass by, as thoroughly as they could, the States, in their corporate capacity, and directed the powers of the Government to the individual citizen. The power proposed to be given to use force against a State to compel individual duty, was objected to by Mr. Madison, on the ground that "a union of the States containing such an ingredient, seemed to provide for its own destruction." He preferred the use of force upon the people "individually," and not "collectively," and expressed the hope that a system to that effect would be framed. Mr. Hamilton was of the same opinion, and the result was the adoption of a system that made each citizen a citizen of the United States, bound to it, as to all their constitutional powers, by a direct and paramount allegiance, and subject, by reason of it, to individual punishment for its violation. Over all individually, as well as over the States collectively, in all matters of duty which the Constitution imposed on the people and the States as such, the Constitution, and legislation and treaties under it, were made SUPREME. With what astonishment would those great men have received even an intimation (which no man, however, was weak enough to suggest) that the provisions imposing as a duty individual obedience, and giving the Government a judiciary, and an army and a navy to enforce it, and the power to "call forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," would all be but idle and fruitless powers, as they could all be frustrated by means of State secession and State power? That at last the demonstrated vice of the Confederation would be found to belong to the new Government, and courts, militia, armies, navies, denouncement of treason, all would be set at naught by virtue of inherent State sovereignty, which the people of the States could not, though they said they would and must, for their own safety and welfare, part with. Had such a monstrous absurdity been breathed in that assembly of truly great and patriotic men, it would have been received with universal derision, and the author written down insane.

And yet, in these degenerate days, it is invoked and solemnly maintained as a shield and protection for allegiance violated and treason perpetrated. The man is guilty; the offence, clearly defined by the Constitution, is as clearly perpetrated, and should be punished. Powers ample for the purpose are vested in the Government, the nation's safety demands their execution, the respect of the world can only be retained by their prompt and effectual exercise; but no, these are all to be sacrificed, the Government is to fall by reason of inherent incurable debility, the States are to be separated and consigned to febleness, even unknown to the Confederation, by this ridiculous, wholly ridiculous dogma, that States cannot be coerced. As well might the citizen who violates his country's laws plead immunity from punishment under the sanction of a foreign Power. The citizen is to claim exemption because others have offended with him. What is crime, conceded crime, in one or a few, ceases to be crime if many are committing it. It even then is supposed to rise to the dignity of a virtue. What folly! What absolute folly! Washington did not so hold when he raised and marched, leading it himself, an army to subdue and punish thousands in Pennsylvania in rebellion. Jackson did not so hold when he resolved to prostrate nullification by military power, though sought to be shielded by State authority. Congress did not so hold when it armed him with the whole force of the nation to effect that, his clear duty and patriotic purpose.

But of this enough; the doctrine is so obviously untenable that patriotism instinctively rejects it. As no argument can even plausibly maintain it, no argument is required to refute it. Its absurdity is as transparent as light. But it is being carried out, and this brings me to consider what are our duty and our interest.

As to duty, that is clear from what I have already told you. We owe allegiance to the Government of the Union, and its history to the breaking out of the present foul rebellion, the memory of the men who gave it to us, the untold blessings it has conferred upon us, the support it has given to the cause of constitutional freedom everywhere, the gratitude we owe to Washington, whom Providence, it has been said, left "childless, that his country might call him father," will all unite in making that allegiance a pleasure as well as a duty. To be false to such a Government, to palter even with the treason that seeks its downfall, to associate with the wicked men or the madmen who are in arms against it, would be as vile a dishonor and as base a crime as fallen man ever perpetrated.

Peace, in such a crisis—the cry of our opponents—how is it to be attained? How, upon their plan, but by a gross violation of our clearest obligations—a total disregard of an allegiance to which we are bound, not only by the Constitution, but by the pledge our ancestors gave for us? The force the Government is raising is not, as is falsely alleged by the conspirators, to subjugate States or citizens. It is but to vindicate the Constitution and the laws, and maintain the existence of the Government. It is but to suppress the "insurrection," force the citizen to return to his duty, and restore him to the unequalled benefits of the Union. And when this is done, as done it will be if there is justice in Heaven, the authors of the present calamity will be consigned to the execrations of the civilized world, and punished, perhaps, if that is possible, more severely by the people whom, by arts and subterfuges, they have so deluded and deceived.

In the mean time our path is clear. It is to remain faithful to duty and to honor; to avoid, as we would pestilence or famine, all communion with treason; to stand by, with unfaltering attachment, the Union Washington especially devised for us, and invoked us, in his dying, patriotic legacy, "indignantly to frown upon the first dawning of any attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest;" "to distrust the patriotism of those who in any quarter may endeavor to weaken its bonds;" and to remember always that "it is a main pillar in the edifice of (our) real independence—the support of (our) tranquillity at home, (our) peace abroad, of (our) safety, of that very liberty which (we) so highly prize." Forbid it, Heaven! that Marylanders shall ever forget these teachings! Save us, in mercy, from the crime he so urged us to avoid and denounce. Let us not be false to the filial obligations we owe him, the Father of our Freedom, achieved for us through seven years of struggle and peril; but, on the contrary, clinging around the altar of the Union, where he and his great associates ever worshipped, "pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor," to maintain it inviolate to the last.

Patriotism now is arousing the men of the loyal States to its rescue. Thousands, hundreds of thousands, are leaving the comforts of home, the employments of peaceful life, and nerving themselves to the task. The Government is directing itself to the same end. Until now they have had the counsels of a veteran soldier, whose life has been one scene of patriotic honor; whose achievements in the field have given renown to his country, and won for himself an ever-enduring fame; and whose counsels in many an exigency have rescued the nation from peril, whilst saving untouched its honor. Winfield Scott, bearing upon his body wounds received in the national service, and which, with age, unfit him, as he for himself has decided, has retired from the command of the army. Great as have been the deeds of his prior life, none is more calculated to secure him his country's gratitude and the world's esteem than the devotion with which he, though pressed down by infirmities that made him a daily sufferer, has stood, in the present exigency, as long as he physically could, true to active, patriotic duty. What a shining and crushing contrast to the faithless soldiers (officers, not men; they have all of them been true) who, false to obligations and honor, are now warring with the very Government that gave them a name, and seeking to degrade the almost sacred standard which they were educated to defend, and bound by every motive of gratitude and by oft-repeated pledges to Heaven to defend to the last! Whilst Winfield Scott's memory will ever live, honored and revered by the good and the great of the world, every true soldier will try, for the sake of his profession, to forget that such men had belonged to it.

Scott is gone, but the army has still a chief. Though new to fame, McClellan's repeated and rapid victories in Western Virginia, that so thrilled with joy every patriotic heart, and his untiring zeal, scientific attainments, and complete organization of his vast army, are guarantees on which the country may and will rely that the honor of the nation and the fame of the army are in safe hands. With such a leader, and such a cause, who can doubt the ultimate result? Sooner or later, we shall see "the stars to sparkle from the sphere from which they have shot." We shall see treason crushed and the Union restored; and that done, we may be confident "against the world in arms." That done—

"Foreign foe or false beguiling
Shall our Union ne'er divide;
Hand in hand while peace is smiling,
And in battle side by side."

In this instance, too, as it ever is, interest is the ally of duty. The firmness and patriotism of our Governor, encouraged and supported by the loyalty of the people, have saved us from the direst calamities of the strife. Our fields are untroubled by the traitorous foe; no horrid clash of arms has startled our homes with dismay; no desolation is within our limits; no armed soldier is here but to protect and defend the loyal. Peace is our condition, and none of our people are subject to the hazards of the contest but those who are patriotically giving themselves to their country's service for their country's defence. What a contrast to the sad fate of our misguided sister, Virginia! Through folly and crime, the war which South Carolina traitorously initiated she has brought almost exclusively within her borders, and sad, afflictively sad, is the result—private grief and misery, individual poverty, and State bankruptcy, and the loss of the renown won for her by her former generation of good and great men.

Let her example strengthen us in the resolve to remain true to patriotic obligation. Let it teach us how dear to us should be the fame of our good and great of the same generation, and how imperative the demands, alike of interest and duty, to preserve the renown they achieved and left us untarnished by our dishonor.

GENERAL NELSON'S PROCLAMATION, ON OCCUPYING PRESTONBURG, KENTUCKY.

HEAD-QUARTERS, CAMP AT PRESTONBURG, }
November 5, 1861. }

HAVING this day occupied the town of Prestonburg with the forces under my command, I declare to all whom it may concern: That the jurisdiction of the State of Kentucky is restored in this section of the State, and that the regular fall terms of the courts will be held in those counties in which the time for holding the same has not passed. All the civil officers are ordered to attend at the times and places of holding said courts, and attend to the duties of their respective offices.

Given under my hand, this 5th day of November, 1861. W. NELSON.

By command of Brig.-Gen. NELSON,
JNO. M. DUKE, Aide-de-Camp.

The Maysville (Ky.) Eagle, of November 9th, contains the following account of the occupation:

PAINTVILLE, November 6th, 1861.

BRO. COONS: Since writing you on Saturday, the object of our mission to this region has been attained. Our gallant Col., Leonidas Metcalfe, with twenty-nine other gallant and daring spirits, went up from this place to Prestonburg on yesterday, and took possession of it. It had been impossible to obtain any correct information from there concerning the force of our enemy, as regards numbers, equipments, or plan of defence. To satisfy himself on all these points, and obtain information so necessary to our future movements, Colonel Metcalfe determined on his own responsibility to go as far in that direction as he could make his way with thirty men. He was attended by Colonel Vincent, of the Sandy Valley Volunteers, whose men are here with us, the two commanders thus showing their men their purpose to head them in the path of duty, and not to send them. They left here about one o'clock P. M. of yesterday, feeling their way as they went, and examining their ground foot by foot as they advanced, and reached Prestonburg just before dark. The enemy had fled—leaving their flag floating over the Court House and their huts just as they had been before their flight. Metcalfe and his men advanced into the town, tore down the secession flag, ordered their suppers, obtained all the information possible, and returned to this place about twelve o'clock last night in triumph. Captain Wm. Oden, of Col. Metcalfe's regiment, was the man who tore down the flag, and he has it now in his possession. The enemy have retired up Big Sandy, how far or to what point we know not. Their number is between two and three thousand.

In haste, your brother,
JAS. P. HENDRICK.

EXPEDITION TO CORROTOWAN CREEK.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF COMMANDER PARKER.

U. S. STEAMER CAMBRIDGE, }
 RAPPAHANNOCK RIVER, Nov. 9, 1861. }

SIR: I have the honor to report that on the 6th instant I ordered a detachment of thirty men from this vessel, under the command of Lieutenant Gwin, assisted by Acting Masters Eldridge and Strong, and Midshipman Cushing, to proceed in the United States steamer Rescue to the Corrotowan Creek and capture a schooner reported to me to be loaded with firewood; and, in the event of not succeeding in this, to burn her.

The schooner was found to be hard and fast ashore, and, as it was impossible to move her, she was burned in obedience to my orders to this effect, together with a large quantity of firewood piled upon shore. No resistance was met with till the Rescue began to return, when a body of rebel troops, armed with rifles, on both sides of the creek—supposed to be about one hundred and thirty in number—with a rifled cannon in a masked battery, attacked her, but without effecting much damage to our party. The rebels were concealed by thick underbrush and a house from which they fired.

Acting Master Strong was struck with a spent rifle ball, but not seriously hurt, and no other person was wounded.

The expedition was perfectly successful, and the duty performed in a spirited and brilliant manner.

The detachment returned to this vessel about five P. M., having been absent on this duty a little more than four hours.

I herewith forward Lieutenant Gwin's report of the affair:

I have also to report that, having been informed by a contraband that there were three companies of rebel troops encamped at the town of Urbana, near a large magazine of powder, I proceeded on the 8th instant to that place, and endeavored to dislodge them and blow up the magazine with our battery, assisted by the Rescue. After bombarding the encampment for an hour and a half, the magazine was perforated several times with our shot and shell, but we were unable to destroy it, the depth of water not allowing us to approach the enemy nearer than one mile and a half. The rebels did not reply, except by musketry, when a boat from the Rescue attempted to approach the shore. There were no casualties in this action on our side.

Since our arrival in this river, this vessel has been actively engaged in maintaining the blockade. Respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. A. PARKER,
 Commander.

Flag-officer, L. M. GOLDSBOROUGH,
 Commanding U. S. A. B. Squadron,
 Hampton Roads.

A correspondent on board the steamer Cambridge, gives the following account of the expedition:

U. S. STEAMER CAMBRIDGE, }
 BLOCKADING RAPPAHANNOCK RIVER, Nov. 6. }

Having learned from the negroes that came on board this morning, that a large schooner was anchored about ten miles up the Corrotowan Creek, we immediately made arrangements to cut her out. At half-past eleven A. M., an expedition under command of Lieutenant William Gwin, assisted by Acting Masters R. D. Eldridge and F. W. Strong, and Midshipman W. B. Cushing, with thirty men, left the ship in the tugboat Rescue, Captain Haines, which is acting as a tender for us, and proceeded up the river. The Rescue carries a thirty-two-pound gun, and the whole force were armed with Sharpe's rifles. Mr. W. H. Seward, our pilot, accompanied the expedition, and to his skill and coolness much of our success was due.

We met with no opposition on our upward passage, though pickets were seen hastily retiring from several points on the river as we approached. Upon reaching the object of our search, we found her to be the Ada, of Baltimore, a new schooner of about one hundred and twenty tons' burden, and said to be the property of a well-known secessionist residing in the vicinity. She was loaded with wood and ready for sea—sails bent, &c. Her crew had evidently just left her upon our approach.

As the tide had left her hard and fast aground, we were obliged to abandon our original intention of taking her out, although we towed upon her until we parted all our hawsers. We accordingly made preparations to burn her, and after stripping her of sails and rigging, fired her fore and aft; also set fire to a large quantity of wood upon the shore, which, with the schooner, was soon enveloped in a sheet of flame. After remaining long enough to be certain of the success of our undertaking, we started down the river again.

But in the mean time our rebel friends had not been idle, and had prepared a warm reception for us. On reaching a high, wooden bluff on the western bank, about three miles from the entrance, and in a narrow part of the river, the smoke from a rifled gun flashed out from among the trees, and a shell came whizzing at us, passing through a boat on the house, and exploding, but fortunately injuring no one. At the same time a sharp fire of musketry opened on us from both sides of the river, showing the presence of a considerable force. We instantly replied with shell at the battery, and rifles at every cover, for we could not see a man of our assailants. We ran this gauntlet for half a mile, and had just cleared the range of the large gun, when firing commenced from a house on the right. We gave them a shell, which entered the second story and exploded, nearly ruining the building, and poured in a volley from our rifles, which soon stopped all hostile intentions on the part of the enemy. After leaving this place, we met with no further annoyance, though we raked every suspicious point with canister as we approached.

I am happy to state that no injury was received by our men. The enemy's gun (a rifled twelve-pounder) was well served, and the Rescue was grazed three times by their shell, but without receiving any damage of consequence. Acting Master Strong was struck by a spent rifle ball, causing merely a slight bruise.

The men of both vessels acted with coolness and gallantry, paying more attention to their own shots than those of the enemy. We have since learned from contrabands that there was a force of eighty riflemen with the gun on the western bank, and a company of fifty cavalry on the eastern. We accomplished our object safely and successfully, and are wishing for further opportunities of annoying the secessionists.

We have been on the river ten days, and have picked up seventy-three runaway negroes. They report that the inhabitants are much incensed against us, and are about preparing batteries, at different points, to endeavor to drive us out of the river, though we have seen none of them as yet.

Nov. 8.—This morning we threw a number of shells upon Gray's Point, where we had reason to think the rebels are erecting a battery, and this afternoon have thrown about seventy-five shells into the village of Urbana. A contraband who came from there this morning, reports that the town is deserted, except by a garrison of two hundred and forty troops, and that they have a large quantity of ammunition stored there. We do not know, as yet, the full effect of our cannonade, though several buildings in the vicinity of the magazine are known to have been struck.

Yours, truly,
CAMBRIDGE.

THE BATTLE AT BELMONT, MO.,

FOUGHT NOVEMBER 7, 1861.

GEN. GRANT'S REPORT.

CAIRO, NOV. 12, 1861.

On the evening of the 6th inst. I left this place with two thousand eight hundred and fifty men of all arms, to make a reconnoissance toward Columbus. The object of the expedition was to prevent the enemy from sending out reinforcements to Price's army in Missouri, and also from cutting off columns that I had been directed to send out from this place and Cape Girardeau, in pursuit of Jeff. Thompson. Knowing that Columbus was strongly garrisoned, I asked Gen. Smith, commanding at Paducah, Ky., to make demonstrations in the same direction. He did so by ordering a small force to Mayfield and another in the direction of Columbus, not to approach nearer, however, than twelve or fifteen miles. I also sent a small force on the Kentucky side with orders not to approach nearer than Ellicott's Mills, some twelve miles from Columbus. The expedition under my immediate command was stopped about nine miles below here on the Kentucky shore, and remained until morning. All this served to distract the enemy, and led him to think he was to be attacked in his strongly fortified position. At daylight we proceeded down the river to a point just out of range of the rebel guns, and debarked on the Missouri shore. From here the troops were marched by flank for about one mile toward Belmont, and then drawn up in line of battle, a battalion also having been left as a reserve near the transports. Two companies from each regiment, five skeletons in number, were then thrown out as skirmishers, to ascertain the position of the enemy. It was but a few moments before we met him, and a general engagement ensued.

The balance of my forces, with the exception of the reserve, was then thrown forward—all as skirmishers—and the enemy driven foot by foot, and from tree to tree, back to their encampment on the river bank, a distance of two miles. Here they had strengthened their position by felling the timber for several hundred yards around their camp, and making a sort of abatis. Our men charged through this, driving the enemy over the bank into their transports in quick time, leaving us in possession of every thing not exceedingly portable. Belmont is on low ground, and every foot of it is commanded by the guns on the opposite shore, and of course could not be held for a single hour after the enemy became aware of the withdrawal of their troops. Having no wagons, I could not move any of the captured property; consequently, I gave orders for its destruction. Their tents, blankets, &c., were set on fire, and we retired, taking their artillery with us, two pieces being drawn by hand; and one other, drawn by an inefficient team, we spiked and left in the woods, bringing the two only to this place. Before getting fairly under way the enemy made his appearance again, and attempted to surround us. Our troops were not in the least discouraged, but charged on the enemy again, and defeated him. Our loss was about eighty-four killed, one hundred and fifty wounded—many of them slightly—and about an equal number missing. Nearly all the missing were from the Iowa regiment, who behaved with great gallantry, and suffered more severely than any other of the troops.

I have not been able to put in the reports from sub-commands, but will forward them as soon as received. All the troops behaved with much gallantry, much of which is attributed to the coolness and presence of mind of the officers, particularly the colonels. Gen. McClelland was in the midst of danger throughout the engagement, and displayed both coolness and judgment. His horse was three times shot. My horse was also shot under me. To my staff, Capts. Rawlins, Logan, and Hillyer, volunteer aids, and to Capts. Hatch and Graham, I am much indebted for the assistance they gave. Col. Webster, acting chief engineer, also accompanied me, and displayed highly soldier-like qualities. Col. Dougherty, of the Twenty-second Illinois Volunteers, was three times wounded and taken prisoner.

The Seventh Iowa regiment had their Lieut.-Colonel killed, and the Colonel and Major were severely wounded. The reports to be forwarded will detail more fully the particulars of our loss. Surgeon Brinton was in the field during the entire engagement, and displayed great ability and efficiency in providing for the wounded and organizing the medical corps.

The gunboats Tyler and Lexington, Capts. Walker and Stemple, U. S. N., commanding, convoyed the expedition and rendered most efficient service. Immediately upon our landing they engaged the enemy's batteries, and protected our transports throughout.

For particulars see accompanying report of Capt. Walker.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
U. S. GRANT,
Brig.-Gen. Commanding.

GENERAL McCLERNAND'S REPORT.

BRIGADE HEAD-QUARTERS, }
CAMP CAIRO, NOV. 12, 1861. }

Brigadier-General U. S. Grant, Commanding District Southeastern Missouri:

SIR: I have the honor to report the part taken by the forces under my command in the action before Columbus, Ky., on the 7th inst.

These forces consisted of a portion of my own brigade, viz.: the twenty-seventh regiment, Col. N. B. Buford; the Thirtieth regiment, Col. Philip B. Fouke; the Thirty-first regiment, Col. John A. Logan, including one company of cavalry under Captain J. J. Dollins. The strength of the Twenty-seventh regiment was seven hundred and twenty, rank and file; that of the Thirtieth, five hundred; that of the Thirty-first, six hundred and ten—exclusive of seventy mounted men; being in all one thousand nine hundred men, rank and file. To this force you added, by your order of the 6th inst., Captain Delano's Company of Adams County Cavalry, seventy-two men, under Lieutenant J. R. Catlin, and Captain Ezra Taylor's battery of Chicago Light Artillery of six pieces and one hundred and fourteen men.

The total disposable force under my command was two thousand and eighty-six, rank and file—all Illinois Volunteers.

Having embarked on the steamer Scott, with the Thirtieth and Thirty-first, on the evening of the 6th instant, I left Cairo at five o'clock, and proceeded down the Mississippi to the foot of Island No. 1, and lay to for the night on the Kentucky shore, eleven miles above Columbus, as previously instructed by you. Posting a strong guard for the protection of the boat, and those that followed to the same point, I remained until seven o'clock on the following morning.

At that hour, preceded by the gunboats Tyler and Lexington, and followed by the remainder of the transports, I proceeded down the river to the designated landing on the Missouri shore, about two and a half miles, in a direct line, from Columbus and Belmont.

By half-past eight o'clock the rest of the transports had arrived, and the whole force was disembarked, and, marching beyond a collection of cornfields in front of the landing, was formed for an advance movement, and awaited your order. Ordering Dollins' and Delano's cavalry to scour the woods along the road to Belmont and report to me from time to time, the remainder of my command followed—the Twenty-seventh in front, the Thirtieth next, supported by a section of Taylor's battery, succeeded by the Thirty-first, and the remainder of Taylor's battery, the Seventh Iowa, (Col. Lauman,) and the Twenty-second Illinois, (Col. Dougherty,) who had been assigned by you to that portion of the command.

When the rear of the column had reached a road intersecting our line of march, about a mile and a half from the abatis surrounding the enemy's camp, the line of battle was formed on ground which I had previously selected. The Twenty-seventh and Thirtieth, having formed too far in advance, were recalled to the position first assigned them—the Twenty-seventh on the right, and the Thirtieth on the left. A section of Taylor's battery was disposed on the left of the Thirtieth and two hundred feet in rear of the line, the Thirty-first in the centre, and the Seventh Iowa and Twenty-second Illinois forming the left wing, masking two sections of artillery.

By this time Dollins' cavalry were skirmishing sharply with the enemy's pickets to the right and in advance of our line, and the enemy had shifted the heavy fire of their batteries at Columbus from our gunboats to our advancing line, but without effect.

With your permission I now ordered two companies from each regiment of my command to advance, instructing them to seek out and develop the position of the enemy, the Twenty-second Illinois and Seventh Iowa pushing forward similar parties at the same time.

A sharp firing having immediately commenced between the skirmishing parties of the Thirtieth and Thirty-first and the enemy, I ordered forward another party to their support, rode forward, selected a new position, and ordered up the balance of my command—the Twenty-seventh—to pass around the head of a pond, the Thirtieth and Thirty-first, with the artillery, crossing the dry bed of the same slough in their front.

On their arrival, I reformed the line of battle in the same order as before. It was my expectation that the Twenty-second Illinois and the Seventh Iowa would resume their former positions on the left wing, which would have perfected a line sufficient to enclose the enemy's camp, on all sides accessible to us, thus enabling us to command the river above and below them, and prevent the crossing of reinforcements from Columbus, insuring his capture as well as defeat.

The Thirtieth and Thirty-first and the artillery, moving forward, promptly relieved the skirmishing parties, and soon became engaged with a heavy body of the enemy's infantry and cavalry. The struggle, which was continued for half an hour with great severity, threw our ranks into temporary disorder; but the men promptly rallied under the gallant example of Colonels Fouke and Logan, assisted by Major Berryman, Acting Assistant Adjutant-General of my brigade; also by Capt. Schwartz, Acting Chief of Artillery, Capt. Dresser, of the artillery, Lieut. Babcock, of the Second cavalry, and Lieut. Eddy, of the Twenty-ninth Illinois regiment, who had, upon my invitation, kindly joined my staff. Our men pressed vigorously upon the enemy and drove them back, their cavalry leaving that part of the field and not appearing again until attacked by Capt. Dollins, on the river bank below their encampment, and chased out of sight, near the close of the contest.

Advancing about a quarter of a mile further, this force again came up with the enemy, who by this time had been reinforced upon this part of the field, as I since learn, by three regiments and a company of cavalry. Thus strengthened, they attempted to turn our left flank, but, ordering Colonel Logan to extend the line of battle by a flank movement, and bringing up a section of Taylor's battery, commanded by First Lieutenant B. H. White, under the direction of Captain Schwartz, to cover the space thus made between the Thirtieth and Thirty-first, the attempt was frustrated.

Having completed that disposition, we again opened a deadly fire from both infantry and artillery, and after a desperate resistance drove the enemy back the third time, forcing them to seek cover among thick woods and brush, protected by the heavy guns at Columbus.

In this struggle, while leading the charge, I received a ball in one of my holsters, which failed of harm by striking a pistol. Here Colonels Fouke and Logan urged on their men by the most energetic appeals; here Captain Dresser's horse was shot under him, while Captain Schwartz's horse was twice wounded; here the projectiles from the enemy's heavy guns at Columbus, and their artillery at Belmont crashed through the woods over and among us; here again, all my staff who were with me, displayed the greatest intrepidity and activity; and here, too, many of our officers were killed or wounded; nor shall I omit to add that this gallant conduct was stimulated by your presence and inspired by your example. Here your horse was killed under you.

While this struggle was going on, a tremendous fire from the Twenty-seventh, which had approached the abatis on the right and rear of the tents, was heard. About the same time the Seventh and Twenty-second, which had passed the rear of the Thirtieth and Thirty-first, hastened up, and, closing the space between them and the Twenty-seventh, poured a deadly fire upon the enemy.

A combined movement was now made upon three sides of the enemy's works, and driving him across the abatis, we followed close upon his heels into the clear space around his camp. The Twenty-seventh was the first seen by me entering upon this ground. I called the attention of the other regiments to their approach, and the whole line was quickened by eager and impatient emulation. In a few minutes our entire force was within the enclosure.

Under the skilful direction of Capt. Schwartz, Capt. Taylor now brought up his battery within three hundred yards of the enemy's tents, and opened fire upon them. He fled with precipitation from the tents, and took shelter behind some buildings near the river, and into the woods above the camp, under cover of his batteries at Columbus.

Near this battery I met Colonel Dougherty, who was leading the Seventh and Twenty-second through the open space toward the tents.

At the same time our lines upon the right and left were pressing up to the line of fire from our battery, which now ceased firing, and our men rushed forward among the tents and toward some buildings near the river. Passing over to the right of the camp I met with Colonel Buford, for the first time since his detour around the pond, and congratulated him upon the ardor of his men, to be the first to pass the enemy's works.

During the execution of this movement, Captain Alexander Bielaski, one of my aides-de-camp, who had accompanied Colonel Buford during the march of the 27th, separate from the main command, having dismounted from his horse, which had been several times wounded, was shot down while advancing with the flag of his adopted country in his hand, and calling on the men in his rear to follow him.

Near him, and in a few minutes afterward, Colonel Lanmann fell, severely wounded in the thigh while leading his men in a desperate charge.

Galloping my horse down to the river, I found Captain Bozart, of Company K, Twenty-seventh regiment, supported by squads of men who had joined him, sharply engaged with a detachment of the enemy, whom he drove into the woods above the camp. Here the firing was very hot. My own head was grazed by a ball, my horse was wounded in the shoulder and his caparison torn in several places. Here, too, one of the enemy's caissons fell into my hands, and a capture of artillery was made by Captain Schwartz, a portion of the Seventh gallantly assisting in achieving this result.

Having complete possession of the enemy's camp in full view of his formidable batteries at Columbus, I gave the word for three cheers for the Union, to which the brave men around me responded with the most enthusiastic applause.

Several of the enemy's steamers being within range above and below, I ordered a section of Taylor's battery, under the direction of Captain Schwartz, down near the river, and opened a fire upon them and upon Columbus itself, with what effect I could not learn. The enemy's tents were set on fire, destroying his camp equipage, about four thousand blankets, and his means of transportation. Such horses and other property as could be removed were seized, and four pieces of his artillery brought to the rear.

The enemy at Columbus, seeing us in possession of his camp, directed upon us the fire of his heavy guns, but ranging too high inflicted no injury. Information came at the same time of the crossing of heavy bodies of troops above us, amounting, as I since learn, to five regiments, which, joining those which had fled in that direction, formed rapidly in our rear with the design of cutting off our communication with our transports. To prevent this, and having fully accomplished the object of the expedition, I ordered Captain Taylor to reverse his guns and open fire upon the enemy in his new position, which was done with great spirit and effect, breaking his line and opening our way by the main road. Promptly responding to an order to that effect, Col. Logan ordered his flag in front of his regiment, prepared to force his way in the same direction if necessary. Moving on he was followed by the whole force, except the Twenty-seventh and the cavalry companies of Captains Dollins and Delano. Determined to preserve my command unbroken, and to defeat the evident design of the enemy to divide it, I twice rode back across the field to bring up the Twenty-seventh and Dollins' cavalry, and also despatched Major Brayman for the same purpose, but without accomplishing the object; they having sought, in returning, the same route by which they advanced in the morning.

On passing into the woods the Thirtieth, the Seventh, and Twenty-second encountered a heavy fire on their right and left successively, which was returned with such vigor and effect as to drive back the superior force of the enemy and silence his firing, but not until the Seventh and Twenty-second had been thrown into temporary disorder. Here Lieutenant-Colonel Wentz, of the Seventh, and Captain Markley, of the Thirtieth, with several privates were killed, and Colonel Dougherty, of the Twenty-second, and Major McClurken, of the Thirtieth, who was near me, were severely wounded. Here my body servant killed one of the enemy by a pistol shot.

Driving the enemy back on either side, we moved on, occasionally exchanging shots with straggling parties, in the course of which my horse received another ball, being one of two fired at me from the corner of a field. Captain Schwartz was at my right when these shots were fired.

At this stage of the contest, according to the admission of rebel officers, the enemy's forces had swelled, by frequent reinforcements from the other side of the river, to over thirteen regiments of infantry, and something less than two squadrons of cavalry; excluding his artillery, four pieces of which were in our possession, and two of which, after being spiked, together with part of one of our caissons were left on the way for want of animals to bring them off. The other two, with their horses and harness, were brought off.

On reaching the landing and not finding the detachments of the Seventh and Twenty-second, which you had left behind in the morning to guard the boats, I ordered Delano's cavalry, which was embarking, to the rear of the field to watch the enemy. Within an hour all our forces which had arrived were embarked, Capt. Schwartz, Captain Hatch, Assistant Quartermaster, and myself being the last to get on board. Suddenly the enemy, in strong force, (whose approach had been discovered by Lieut.-Col. John H. White, of the Thirty-first, who was conspicuous through the day for his dauntless courage and conduct,) came within range of our musketry, when a terrible fire was opened upon him by the gunboats, as well as by Taylor's battery and the infantry.

The engagement thus renewed was kept up with great spirit, and with a deadly effect upon the enemy, until the transports had passed beyond his reach. Exposed to the terrible fire of the gunboats and Taylor's battery, a great number of the enemy were killed and wounded in this, the closing scene of a battle of six hours' duration.

The Twenty-seventh and Dollins' cavalry being yet behind, I ordered my transport to continue in the rear of the fleet, excepting the gunboats; and after proceeding a short distance, landed and directed the gunboats to return and await their appearance.

At this moment Lieut. H. A. Rust, Adjutant of the Twenty-seventh, hastened up and announced the approach of the Twenty-seventh and Dollins' cavalry. Accompanied by Capt. Schwartz and Hatch, I rode down the river bank and met Col. Buford with a part of his command. Inferring that my transport was waiting to receive him I went farther down the river, and met Capt. Dollins, whom I also instructed to embark, and still farther met the remainder of the Twenty-seventh, which had halted on the bank where the gunboat Tyler was lying to, the Lexington lying still farther down. The rest of the boats having gone forward, Capt. Walker, of the Tyler, at my request promptly took the remainder of the Twenty-seventh on board, Capt. Stamble, of the Lexington, covering the embarkation.

Having thus embarked all my command, I returned with Capts. Schwartz and Hatch to my transports and reëmbarked, reaching Cairo about midnight, after a day of almost unceasing marching and conflict.

I cannot bestow too high commendation upon all whom I had the honor to command on that day. Supplied with inferior and defective arms, many of which could not be discharged and others bursting in use, they fought an enemy in woods, with which he was familiar, behind defensive works which he had been preparing for months, in the face of a battery at Belmont, and under his heavy guns at Columbus, and although numbering three or four to our one, beat him, capturing several stands of his colors, destroying his camp and carrying off a large amount of property, already mentioned. From his own semi-official account his loss was six hundred killed, wounded and missing, including among the killed and wounded a number of officers, and probably among the missing one hundred and fifty-five prisoners who were brought to this post.

To mention all who did well would include every man in my command who came under my personal notice. Both officers and privates did their whole duty, nobly sustaining the enviable character of Americans and Illinoisans. They shed new lustre upon the venerated flag of their country by upholding it in triumph amid the shock of battle and the din of arms. The blood they so freely poured out proved their devotion to their country, and serves to hallow a just cause with glorious recollections. Their success was that of citizen soldiers.

Major Brayman, Captains Schwartz and Dresser, and Lieutenants Eddy and Babcock, all members of my staff, are entitled to my gratitude for the zeal and alacrity with which they bore my orders in the face of danger and discharged all their duties in the field.

Colonels Buford, Fouke, and Logan repeatedly led their regiments to the charge and as often drove the enemy back in confusion, thus inspiring their men with kindred ardor and largely contributing to the success of our arms. Col. Logan's admirable tactics not only foiled the frequent attempts of the enemy to flank him, but secured a steady advance toward the enemy's camp. Colonel Fouke and his command, exposed throughout to a galling fire from the enemy, never ceased to press forward. His march was marked by the killed and wounded of the foe, mingled with many of his own men.

Accomplishing a difficult circuit, Colonel Buford, active, eager and emulous, was the first to throw his men within the enemy's defences.

Captain Taylor and Lieut. White managed the battery attached to my command with admirable skill and most successful effect. Captain J. J. Dollins, with his company of cavalry, displayed unsurpassed activity and daring. Having been early in the day detached from his regiment, (the Thirty-first,) he found his way in company with the Twenty-seventh to the enemy's camp on the lower side, charging his line with an impetuosity characteristic of himself and his brave followers.

Our victory, though signal and extraordinary, cost many valuable lives. Of the Twenty-seventh, eleven were killed, forty-two wounded, and twenty-eight are missing. Among the wounded was Lieut. William Shipley, of Company A, a gallant and promising young officer, who has since died.

Of the Thirtieth, nine were killed, twenty-seven wounded, and eight are missing. Among the killed is Captain Thomas G. Markley, of Company D, a brave and valuable officer, who died true to his trust.

Major Thomas McClurken, an accomplished and efficient officer, whose services were conspicuous on the field, was severely and, I fear, mortally wounded.

Of the Thirty-first, ten were killed, sixty-one wounded, and eighteen are missing—Capt. John W. Rigby, of Company F, a veteran and faithful officer, being among the wounded; also Capt. William A. Looney, of Company C, who was severely injured while leading his company in a desperate encounter with a detachment of the enemy. Of Dollins' cavalry, one was killed and two wounded.

Of Taylor's Company of Light Artillery, five were wounded, among whom was First Lieut. Charles M. Everett.

In closing this report, unavoidably somewhat imperfect, I cannot forbear bearing my testimony to the gallantry and good conduct of every arm of your whole force. Each did well, and I share in the just pride which their valor has inspired in you as their successful commander.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,
JOHN A. McCLEARNAND,
Brigadier-General Commanding.

REPORT OF CAPTAIN EZRA TAYLOR.

CAMP LYON, Mo., November 28, 1861.

Gen. U. S. Grant, Commanding Department S. E. Missouri:

SIR: I have to report the following casualties, etc., during the expedition and fight which occurred at Belmont yesterday. Three men were seriously wounded: first sergeant Chas. M. Everett, musket shot in head; sergeant David F. Chase, shot in the arm; private Geo. Q. White, lost right hand and badly wounded in the face. Slightly wounded—privates C. R. Van Horn and Wm. De Wolf. Horses lost—three shot on the field. Horses wounded—two in the legs, several others slightly wounded. Left on the field—two caissons, one baggage wagon, two sets artillery lead harness, one thousand ball cartridges for Colt's revolvers, one hundred rounds of ammunition for six-pounder guns, twenty-five double blankets, twenty canteens, five coats, three caps, five Colt's revolvers, five horse blankets, six sabres, five lanterns, three shovels, one overcoat, two curry-combs and brushes, two fuze gonges, sixty friction primers, two camp kettles, twenty cups, one leg guard, one sponge and rammer, six whips, twenty haversacks, two pickaxes, four felling axes, one trail handspike.

CAPTURED FROM THE ENEMY.—Twenty horses, one mule, one six-pounder brass gun, one twelve-pounder brass howitzer and some fragments of artillery harness, and sundry small articles captured by individuals not of any particular value to the service.

My force consisted of four six-pounder field guns, two twelve-pounder howitzers with gunlimbers and caissons complete, eighty-one horses, fourteen mules, one thousand rounds of ammunition for guns and howitzers, one thousand pistol cartridges, one hundred and fourteen men with rations and forage for two days. Number rounds fired, four hundred; number lost, two hundred; number brought off the field, four hundred.

I have to regret the loss of my caissons and baggage wagon, but trust the Government is amply repaid in the capture of two guns from the enemy.

I am highly gratified to be able to report that the officers and men under my command conducted themselves in a manner to deserve my highest commendation and praise.

I take pleasure in mentioning, in particular, Lieut. P. H. White and the men under his immediate command, for the bravery displayed in driving the enemy from his position, silencing his battery, and, under a galling fire from his infantry, capturing two of his guns; and although the result of the battle is any thing but satisfactory to me, yet I cannot forbear to say that, considering the ground fought over, and the extreme difficulty experienced in handling artillery in the woods, I am satisfied that no man could have effected more under the circumstances.

Your obedient servant,

EZRA TAYLOR,
Captain Light Battery "B" I. V.

COL. DOUGHERTY'S REPORT.

HEAD-QUARTERS TWENTY-SECOND REGT. ILL. VOL. }
CAMP LYON, December, 1861. }

To Brig.-Gen. U. S. Grant, Commanding Forces in District of Southeast Missouri:

In pursuance of your order issued on the 6th of November, I embarked the Twenty-second regiment Illinois Volunteers, numbering five hundred and sixty-two men, rank and file, with two days' rations, on board the transport Belle Memphis. Every thing being on board the steamer, we moved out into the stream, and, after a short trip, lay to on the Kentucky shore, near the head of Island No. 1, where we remained through the night in company with other transports from Cairo and Bird's Point, aboard of which were troops, comprising the Seventh Iowa, commanded by Col. Lauman, Twenty-seventh Illinois, Col. Buford, Thirtieth Illinois, Col. Fouke, Thirty-first Illinois, Col. Logan; also, Capt. Taylor's battery of light artillery, together with a small force of cavalry.

The gunboats Lexington and Tyler accompanying us, which took position in the stream, were anchored below the transports.

Our officers and men, being comfortably provided for, soon retired for the night, impressed with the probability of realizing their most ardent wishes, for by this time all on board were fully impressed with the opinion that we were bound for Belmont, which the sequel proved to be true. Having received orders from you during the night, through the hands, of A. A. Gen. Rawlins, I ascertained that you had placed me in command of the Second brigade. I immediately transferred the command of the Twenty-second Illinois to Lieut.-Col. H. E. Hart, who, in accepting it, remarked that he felt satisfied that the officers and men would do their duty, which I am proud to say they did, to my, and I hope to your, entire satisfaction.

Early on the morning of the 7th, the transports, preceded by the gunboats, moved down the river until within sight of the rebel forces on the summit of the Iron Banks, immediately above Columbus on the Kentucky shore, and, as afterward proved to be the case, within range of some of the enemy's batteries of heavy artillery.

After the disembarkation of the forces, and formation of the Twenty-second Illinois and Seventh Iowa regiments into line, three companies of the former and two companies of the latter were ordered to remain with the transports, being placed under the command of Captain Detrick, of the Twenty-second Illinois, who was ordered by you to protect the transports and engage any forces of the enemy which might approach them. His report is herewith submitted:

Having passed through a field near where we disembarked, and reached the timber, we joined in line of battle. The First brigade, consisting of the Twenty-seventh, and Thirtieth, and Thirty-first Illinois Volunteers, under the command of Brigadier-General John A. McClernand, taking the right a little in advance of the Second brigade, composed of the Twenty-second Illinois and Seventh Iowa regiments, under my command, and the whole force under your command in person. As soon as the line of battle was formed, the order to advance was received, and promptly obeyed. The Twenty-second Illinois and Seventh Iowa advanced for about five hundred yards to the margin of the slough, when an order was given to halt and wait for further orders. Here Companies C and B of the Twenty-second Illinois, under the command of Captain Seaton, and one company of the Seventh Iowa, were deployed as skirmishers to ascertain, and, if possible, to discover the position of the enemy.

Soon the order of advance was again given, and from this point the Second brigade encountered heavy timber, much of which had been felled by the enemy in order to impede the progress of any attacking force. Regardless of the obstacles thus encountered, the Second brigade advanced as rapidly as possible for about half a mile, passing over much of the distance at double-quick march. Hearing firing on the right while the skirmishers of the Second brigade remained silent on the left, we advanced by a flank movement to the right, through almost impenetrable roads, climbing over felled trees and filing around tree-tops in the direction of the firing. Halting a few moments to form a line, we again advanced and encountered the enemy, behind logs and among tree-tops; and at this point the firing commenced on the left, which now seemed to be general along the whole line—the whole force being apparently engaged in action.

The enemy for some time obstinately resisted any advance at this point, and a storm of musketry raged along the whole line of the Second brigade. Shell and shot from the artillery of the enemy along the Iron banks, and the field-pieces at Belmont, fell thick and fast, and a perfect storm of bullets from his small-arms was here encountered. Many of our brave men were wounded at this point, and some fell to rise no more, sealing their patriotism with their hearts' blood. But their valor forced the enemy to yield at last, and again the Second brigade advanced, pressing on over the enemy's dead and wounded, many of whom implored our men not to murder them, being evidently under the belief of the false and wicked impressions so industriously sought to be made by many of the leaders of this cursed rebellion, that we were barbarians and savages. But instead of murdering them, some of our men ministered to their wants, and conveyed them to places of safety.

Step by step we drove them until they reached a secondary bank, such as abound through the river-bottoms of the West, under which they were protected from our fire; and when they made another desperate stand for about thirty minutes, our fire became so hot that they retreated precipitately to some open ground near their encampment covered by a rude abatis of felled timber, strewing the ground as they went with guns, coats, and canteens.

Our brave troops followed them with shouts, pouring volley after volley into them. Here the enemy's movements at this point gave unmistakable evidence of being panic-stricken and defeated, retreating to the river and up the river-bank behind the shelter of some brush and timber.

On gaining the open ground near their encampment, opposite to and in sight of the lower part of Columbus, the relative positions of the different commands, for the first time since the commencement of the battle, became visible. The Second brigade, being on the left, had a shorter distance to march in order to reach the enemy than the First, and consequently reached the open ground in front of the enemy's camp in advance of the right wing. In a few moments one section of Captain Taylor's battery of artillery emerged from the timber on the right and took position, when the Seventh Iowa and Twenty-second Illinois fell back and supported the battery, which opened a fire on the retreating rebels and their camp. The battery was well served, and evidently disconcerted the rebels, accelerating their retreat, and spreading consternation among them. From that point the Second brigade advanced with the battery, entered the encampment of the enemy, and captured three pieces of his artillery, one piece being taken possession of by Company B, Capt. Seaton, and one by Company E, Capt. McAdams, both of the Twenty-second Illinois, and the third by a part of our forces unknown to me. Two of the pieces were placed in charge of Captain Taylor, who gallantly brought them away from the field, to be used in a better cause in future.

After assisting in the destruction of the rebel camp and property not movable, as long as was prudent, under the fire of the rebel batteries in and about Columbus, which commanded the whole ground, the order to retire to the transports was received, but not before the rebel flag had been hauled down and the Stars and Stripes, the flag of our fathers, still bright with the glorious memories of the past, was exhibited to their view.

After it had been displayed and the field music had played our national air within hearing of the rebels, the order to retire was received from you, and our weary forces were called from the camp which they had destroyed.

In the mean time the rebels had transported a large force of fresh troops across the river, seven regiments, according to their own statements contained in a Memphis paper. These were formed in the timber and in some corn-fields, between their destroyed camp and our transports. On the return the Second brigade encountered these fresh forces and at once engaged them, and opened a passage through them. At this time the Seventh Iowa was in the rear of the Twenty-second Illinois, and was somewhat confused; all the field-officers and many of the company officers of that brave regiment being either killed, wounded, or taken by the enemy. I told the men that, as we had fought our way in, we could fight our way out again, and ordered them to keep up a steady fire on the left, which they did with a will, notwithstanding their exhaustion, opening the ranks of the enemy, and forcing their way through, in order to reach the transports at the same place we had debarked. On reaching the transports, which were safe and in waiting for us, meeting Lieut.-Col. H. E. Hart, who had conducted himself through the entire battle with the coolness and bravery of a soldier, I ordered him to embark the Twenty-second Illinois regiment on board the Belle Memphis while I returned to fetch up the rear of the brigade; on my return I found many of the Iowa Seventh considerably scattered; while cheering them up, and hurrying them forward I received a small shot in the shoulder, and one on the elbow, and shortly afterward a ball through the ankle; my horse was also shot in several places, which fell with me, and soon expired. I found myself unable to travel and was consequently captured by the rebels, who treated me with respect and kindness.

The loss of the Twenty-second regiment Illinois Volunteers during the day was twenty-three killed, and seventy-four wounded. Total killed and wounded, ninety-seven. Captains Challenor and Abbott were severely wounded and left upon the field, where they were afterward taken by the enemy. Captain Hubbard was slightly wounded. Lieutenant Adams was severely wounded in the left arm and taken prisoner. Captains Challenor and Abbott and Lieut. Adams have since been returned, together with all non-commissioned officers and privates who were wounded.

The loss of the Seventh Iowa regiment, during the action, was twenty-six killed and eighty wounded. Total killed and wounded, one hundred and six—making the entire loss of killed and wounded of the Second brigade, two hundred and three. Among them were Col. Lauman, severely wounded; Lieutenant-Col. Wentz, killed; also the remainder of their field-officers, together with many of their company officers, who fought gallantly until stricken down by the enemy.

This regiment, throughout the battle, fought like veterans, dealing death to rebels wherever they encountered them.

Iowa may well feel proud of her sons who fought at Belmont. I am informed that as soon as the steamer Memphis got out of the fire of the enemy, every attention and care was paid to the wounded, of which there was quite a number on board. Many of the officers were very active in ministering to their wants, and Surgeons Stearns and Woodward attended them faithfully, performing their duties, dressing their wounds, and extracting many balls. While under way to Cairo, Dr. Hamilton, Quartermaster of the Twenty-second Illinois Volunteers, also assisted and rendered most efficient aid.

I am further informed that only one two-horse wagon, belonging to the Quartermaster's Department of the Twenty-second regiment Illinois, was left. It contained nothing but what could not be got aboard, because the bank of the river, where the Memphis lay, was so perpendicular that a road had to be made with shovels, which consumed too much time. All the horses, including those captured from the enemy, were got on board.

Many instances of individual heroism and bravery occurred during the day, but where all acted so gallantly, it would be unjust to discriminate. The whole force under your command acted like veterans, and you may justly feel proud of the manner in which they conducted themselves on the well-contested battle-field of Belmont.

H. DOUGHERTY,
Col. Twenty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteers.

Vol. III.—Doc. 24

The following is the General Order issued on the 8th by Brigadier-General John A. McClelland, in command at Cairo:

General Order No. 15.

BRIGADE HEAD-QUARTERS, CAMP CAIRO, }
November 8, 1861. }

The General commanding the First Brigade of Illinois Volunteers takes pleasure in meeting to-day those who conferred honor upon his command by their gallantry and good conduct on yesterday. Few of you had before seen a battle. You were but imperfectly disciplined, and supplied with inferior arms. Yet you marched upon a concealed enemy, of superior numbers, on ground of their own choosing.

You drove them steadily before you for two miles of continued fighting, and forced them to seek shelter in their intrenchments at Belmont, beneath the heavy batteries at Columbus. You drove them from their position, and destroyed their camp—bringing with you, on retiring, two hundred prisoners, two field-pieces, and a large amount of other property.

Reinforced from Columbus, they formed in large numbers in your rear, to cut you off, while the heavy guns were playing upon your ranks. Fighting the same ground over again, you drove them a second time. A portion of the command, becoming separated from the rest, made a successful and well-ordered movement by another route, and returned to the river. After a day of fatiguing marches, fighting as you marched, having been nearly six hours actually engaged, you reëmbarked and returned to your camps.

On looking along your ranks to-day, the commanding General has cause to mourn the absence of many of his gallant men—the victims of inexorable war. Some laid down their lives on the battle-field, offering their blood freely, and giving their last and most glorious moments to their country. Others bear honorable wounds, and suffer more than those who died, yet it is hoped they will resume their duties and win new honors.

While mourning the dead and offering sympathy to the suffering, the General commanding gratefully acknowledges his gratitude, and offers the thanks of a grateful country and State to the officers and soldiers of Illinois under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct.

When again called upon, he hopes to find you equally prompt, and better prepared for battle and for victory. By order of

JOHN A. McCLELLAND,
Brigadier-General Commanding.

M. BRATMAN,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

General Grant issued the following order to the troops at Cairo:

HEAD-QUARTERS DISTRICT S. E. MO., }
CAIRO, November 8, 1861. }

The General commanding this military district returns his thanks to the troops under his command at the battle of Belmont on yesterday.

It has been his fortune to have been in all the battles fought in Mexico by Generals Scott and Taylor save Buena Vista, and he never saw one more hotly contested or where troops behaved with more gallantry.

Such courage will insure victory wherever our flag may be borne and protected by such a class of men.

To the brave men who fell the sympathy of the country is due, and will be manifested in a manner unmistakable.

U. S. GRANT,
Brigadier-General Commanding.

On the day after the battle, (Nov. 8th,) a flag of truce was sent from Cairo, Ill., to Columbus, Ky., under charge of Major Webster, chief of the Engineer Corps, to make arrangements respecting the wounded. The following is the correspondence between the two commanders, and the report of Major Webster:

GEN. GRANT TO GEN. POLK.

HEAD-QUARTERS DISTRICT S. E. MISSOURI, }
CAIRO, November 8, 1861. }

General Commanding Forces, Columbus, Ky.:

SIR: In the skirmish of yesterday, in which both parties behaved with so much gallantry, many unfortunate men were left upon the field of battle whom it was impossible to provide for. I now send, in the interest of humanity, to have these unfortunates collected and medical attendance secured them. Major Webster, chief of engineers, district southeast Missouri, goes bearer of this, and will express to you my views upon the course that should be pursued under the circumstances such as those of yesterday.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

U. S. GRANT,
Brigadier-General Commanding.

GEN. POLK TO GEN. GRANT.

HEAD-QUARTERS FIRST DIVISION, WESTERN DEPARTMENT, }
COLUMBUS, KY., November 8, 1861. }

Brig.-Gen. U. S. Grant, U. S. A.:

I have received your note in regard to your wounded and killed on the battle-field after yesterday's engagement. The lateness of the hour at which my troops returned to the principal scene of action, prevented my bestowing the care upon your wounded which I desired.

Such attentions as were practicable were shown them, and measures were taken at an early hour this morning to have them all brought into my hospitals. Provision also was made for taking care of your dead. The permission you desire under your flag of truce to aid in attention to your wounded, is granted with pleasure, under such restrictions as the exigencies of our service may require. In your note you say nothing of an exchange of prisoners, though you send me a private message as to your willingness to release certain wounded men and some invalids taken from our list of sick in camps, and expect in return a corresponding number of your wounded prisoners. My own feelings would prompt me to waive again the unimportant affectation of declining to recognize these States as belligerents, in the interests of humanity, but my Government requires all prisoners to be placed at the disposal of the Secretary of War. I have despatched him to know if the case of the severely wounded held by me would form an exception.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

L. POLK,
Major-General C. S. A.

MAJOR WEBSTER'S REPORT.

ENGINEER OFFICE, }
CAMP CAIRO, ILL., November 9, 1861. }

GENERAL: I have the honor to report the result of the expedition sent under a flag of truce to Columbus yesterday.

On our arrival in the vicinity of the place, a steamer carrying Capt. Blake, Assistant Adjutant-General of Gen. Polk, met us. I delivered to him your letter, and offered him, unconditionally, the sick and wounded whom I had in charge. He informed me that orders had been recently received by Gen. Polk, respecting the exchange of prisoners, and declined accepting those proffered until he could receive further instructions. He then left, saying that we had permission to bury our dead on the field of battle.

I placed a working party, under command of Lieut. Hart, of the Twenty-third Illinois regiment, and sent them to the field, where they were employed, for the remainder of the day, in caring for the wounded, some of whom were found yet there, and in burying the dead.

It was near sunset when Capt. Blake again came on board our boat, and handed in the communication from Gen. Polk, which I gave you last night on my return. He informed me that a despatch had been sent to their Secretary of War, in regard to the exchange of prisoners, but that they had received no reply.

During the interval between the two visits of Capt. Blake, several parties of the enemy visited our boat; Gen. Cheatham among them. He informed me that he had directed four of our wounded to be brought to us, and asked if I would give four of theirs in exchange. I told him that I would give him four or any other number that he would accept unconditionally, but that I had no authority to negotiate an exchange, and that as to the four of ours which he sent on board, I would await the decision of Gen. Polk.

Several more of our wounded had also been given into the care of our party in the field by Major Mason, Quartermaster of Columbus.

These facts I mentioned to Capt. Blake, and told him that those three put in our charge awaited his orders, as I wished to avoid any appearance even of doing any thing not in strict accordance with our obligations under the flag of truce. He replied that he did not wish to interfere with any arrangements made by others; and I thought, under this state of the case, it would be putting an unnecessarily fine point on the matter to decline to take back the wounded men so politely offered by Gen. Cheatham and Major Mason. It is due to the latter gentleman, particularly, to say that his disposition to do every thing in his power to aid us in our mission of humanity, was conspicuous during our entire stay there, and certainly deserves our warmest appreciation.

At the second visit of Capt. Blake to our boat, he received the sick and wounded prisoners, whom I again offered to him unconditionally, and they were put on board his boat.

The number of our wounded, as above stated from Gen Cheatham and Major Mason, and brought up by me, was thirteen.

Enclosed herewith is a list of our men in the hands of the enemy, given me by Capt. Blake, which he thought to be nearly complete.

The number reported buried by them on the field yesterday was sixty-eight.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. D. WEBSTER,
Major and Chief Engineer.

To Brig.-Gen. U. S. GRANT, Com. Div.

SECESSION REPORTS.

GENERAL POLK'S DESPATCH.

HEAD-QUARTERS, FIRST DIV. WEST. DEP'T, }
COLUMBUS, KY., Nov. 7, 1861. }

To General Head-quarters, through General A. S. Johnson:

The enemy came down on the opposite side of the river, Belmont, to-day, about seven thousand five hundred strong, landed under cover of gunboats, and attacked Col. Tappan's camp. I sent over three regiments under Gen. Pillow to his relief, then at intervals three others, then Gen. Cheatham.

I then took over two others in person, to support a flank movement which I had directed. It was a hard-fought battle, lasting from half-past ten A. M. to five P. M. They took Beltzhoover's battery, four pieces of which were re-captured. The enemy were thoroughly routed. We pursued them to their boats seven miles, then drove their boats before us. The road was strewn with their dead and wounded, guns, ammunition, and equipments. Our loss considerable; theirs heavy.

L. POLK,
Major-General Commanding.

REPLY OF PRESIDENT DAVIS.

RICHMOND, Nov. 8, 1861.

To Major-General Polk:

Your telegraph received. Accept for yourself, and the officers and men under your command, my sincere thanks for the glorious contribution you have just made to our common cause. Our countrymen must long remember gratefully to read the activity and skill, courage and devotion of the army at Belmont. J. DAVIS.

LETTER FROM GEN. GRANT.

The following is from a private letter from General Grant to his father, written on the night of the 8th:

Day before yesterday I left Cairo with about three thousand men in five steamers, convoyed by two gunboats, and proceeded down the river to within about twelve miles of Columbus. The next morning the boats were dropped down just out of range of the enemy's batteries, and the troops debarked. During this operation our gunboats exercised the rebels by throwing shells into their camps and batteries. When all ready, we proceeded about one mile toward Belmont, opposite Columbus, when I formed the troops into line, and ordered two companies from each regiment to deploy as skirmishers, and push on through the woods and discover the position of the enemy. They had gone but a little way when they were fired upon, and the ball may be said to have fairly opened.

The whole command, with the exception of a small reserve, was then deployed in like manner and ordered forward. The order was obeyed with great alacrity, the men all showing great courage. I can say with great gratification that every colonel, without a single exception, set an example to their commands that inspired a confidence that will always insure victory when there is the slightest possibility of gaining one. I feel truly proud to command such men.

From here we fought our way from tree to tree through the woods to Belmont, about two and a half miles, the enemy contesting every foot of ground. Here the enemy had strengthened their position by felling the trees for two or three hundred yards and sharpening their limbs, making a sort of abatis. Our men charged through, making the victory complete, giving us possession of their camp and garrison equipage, artillery, and every thing else.

We got a great many prisoners. The majority, however, succeeded in getting aboard their steamers and pushing across the river. We burned every thing possible and started back, having accomplished all that we went for, and even more. Belmont is entirely covered by the batteries from Columbus, and is worth nothing as a military position—cannot be held without Columbus.

The object of the expedition was to prevent the enemy from sending a force into Missouri to cut off troops I had sent there for a special purpose, and to prevent reinforcing Price.

Besides being well fortified at Columbus, their number far exceeded ours, and it would have been folly to have attacked them. We found the Confederates well armed and brave. On our return stragglers that had been left in our rear (now front) fired into us, and more recrossed the river and gave us battle for a full mile, and afterward at the boats when we were embarking.

There was no hasty retreating or running away. Taking into account the object of the expedition, the victory was complete. It has given us confidence in the officers and men of this command, that will enable us to lead them in any future engagement without fear of the result. Gen. McClelland (who, by the way, acted with great coolness and courage throughout, and proved that he is a soldier as well as a statesman) and myself, each had our horses shot under us. Most of the field-officers met with the same loss, beside nearly one-third of them being themselves killed or wounded. As near as I can ascertain, our loss was about two hundred and fifty killed, wounded, and missing.

LOUISVILLE "JOURNAL" NARRATIVE.

CAIRO, Nov. 1861.

You have been informed by telegraph and forestalled communications from other sources of the recent battle at Belmont, but most of these reports have been in the main incorrect and incomplete; therefore it is that I have delayed giving an account until the confusion and excitement had subsided, and something like a definite and accurate account might be obtained. It might be well to notice here the underhanded antagonism evident in many of our prominent journals to the Union cause, in pronouncing—even in the face of positive evidence to the contrary—every action in which our troops are engaged, and, as must necessarily be, a few of our numbers are slain, to be positive defeats and repulses. We have a notable instance of this determination to embarrass and disparage our army in the recent editorials of the Chicago Tribune, and other journals, in relation to this Belmont fight. It has been pronounced a defeat, and some have gone so far as to proclaim it a rout; and thus has been reiterated one of the most wanton and damaging falsehoods that ever blistered a tongue. But so far from this being a repulse, from the evidences now accumulated, it proves to have been one of the most signal and brilliant victories that have graced the pages of our history since the record of Buena Vista. It will be seen from the official report of General Grant, that the object of the expedition was not for the attack of Columbus, but for the purpose of diverting the enemy from sending reinforcements to Thompson, Price, or Buckner, and I have further learned from Gen. McClelland, which is corroborated by prisoners taken at Belmont, that a large rebel force actually had their knapsacks packed to reinforce Buckner at Bowling Green, and make a forward movement against Louisville. To further show that the object of the expedition against Belmont was not intended for Columbus, I was shown a letter in Gen. Grant's quarters to-day from Assistant Adjutant-General McKeever directing him to move only against Belmont and avoid Columbus. Thus the movement intended and directed was a complete success and a triumph over the superior numerical forces of the enemy by destroying their camp and twice routing them, and driving them, with terrible slaughter, before our bayonets.

On the morning of the 7th, after lying on the Kentucky shore over night, our troops, two thousand eight hundred and fifty in number, being portions of the Twenty-second Illinois, Col. Henry Dougherty, Twenty-seventh Illinois, Col. Buford, Thirtieth Illinois, Col. Phil. B. Fouke, Thirty-first Illinois, Col. John A. Logan, and the Seventh Iowa, Col. Lauman, debarked on the Missouri shore about three miles this side of Belmont. They were at once marched to a corn-field about one mile distant, and west of Belmont. Three companies of the Seventh Iowa, and two companies of the Twenty-second Illinois, were, however, left at the landing to guard the steamboats. In the corn-field the whole force was drawn up in line in the following order: The Twenty-seventh Illinois, Col. Buford, occupying the extreme right, Thirtieth, Col. Fouke, next, Thirty-first, Col. Logan, on the centre, with Taylor's Chicago artillery (six guns) in the rear, Seventh Iowa to the left, and Twenty-second Illinois the extreme left; two companies from each regiment were then thrown out as skirmishers, except Colonel Buford's, which took the road leading to the right, with orders to bear down on the enemy below their camp, on the bank of the river, and drive them to the left, assisted by Captains Dollins, and Delano's Illinois Cavalry. The skirmishers of Logan's and Fouke's regiments had proceeded about half a mile through the woods when they encountered the enemy and opened a vigorous fire, which was returned by the enemy, who, however, soon fell back. Gen. McClelland, who was reconnoitring with the men, now sent back his aid to order a forward movement of the whole column, which soon arrived and formed again as before, moved forward a short distance, where he found the enemy in strong force, whom he attacked with the Thirtieth, Thirty-first, and a part of the Seventh Iowa, and again drove them before him and scattered them in disorder, with heavy loss. It was not long, however, until they rallied and offered a vigorous resistance, which somewhat disordered our lines. It was now soon discovered that the rebels were flanking us on the left, when Logan's men were brought about, and the artillery opened a tremendous fire on them, which brought them down like mowed grass, while Fouke's regiment was still engaging them with a terrible effect, and the enemy was finally driven back toward their camp. In the mean time Buford's regiment and Dollins' cavalry had arrived to the right of the enemy's camp, and was doing fearful execution on the foe.

While these regiments were making the enemy quail beneath their fire and bayonets, the Seventh Iowa and Twenty-second Illinois were dealing havoc among them on the left. After st companies of the Seventh Iowa thrown out, they immediately engaged the enemy, when Col. Lauman went with the remaining five companies and fought out as skirmishers also. This was suffered more severely than any other. They fought continually against fearful odds. Everward through the timber on their hands and knees, they crawled with their hands and feet, lying over them until they reached the left of the enemy's entrenchment where their cannon was planted, and from their guns, leaving them still standing, knowing that other forces were following up. Their course was still onward until they entered on the camp ground of the enemy, bringing destruction as they went, and their flag—one of the lieutenants had been wrapped round his body. No cowardly and daring can be attributed to the Twenty-second, who fought by the side of the Seventh Iowa throughout the action on the left of the camp ground, in a position on the river bank, was another of the batteries, upon which the Seventh Iowa and the Twenty-second Illinois made a charge and captured the pieces. It was here, while urging on his men, that Col. Lauman was wounded.

The Seventh Iowa received a continual cross fire from the enemy's guns and musketry, and that they were in the thickest of the fight from the fact that they had most men either killed or wounded, and more than any other regiment. The Twenty-second Illinois also suffered heavy loss, and the courage and valor of Col. Dougherty were highly commended.

The Twenty-seventh Illinois and Seventh Iowa were on the camping ground of the enemy at the same time, and the other regiments followed, upon which a shout of triumph from our troops rent the air, that was heard for miles above the roar of the baggage, and equipments taken at the battle were destroyed by order of Gen.

The force was in possession of the enemy, and was engaged in confiscating all the property, that of the enemy was received from Columbus, and cut off our retreat. Gen. McClellan, covering their move, inquired of Col. Lauman he intended to make, when he replied, "Cut our way through, and we accordingly did, as did the other forces. At this juncture it was that our troops rendered such valuable service by setting up a continual fire upon them, and bringing them down in scores. Here, the rebel batteries from Columbus opened upon our men, but their guns were from exhibiting the skill shown at the battle; and here, again, it was that many acts of daring bravery and spirit of sacrifice were exhibited by our officers. Col. Lauman, who had been badly wounded in the thigh, upon the order being given to retreat, ordered that he be placed on his horse, which was done, and he gallantly led his men out. Col. Dougherty, who was aware that Lauman was wounded, endeavored to pilot him out, they being in the rear, when he received his wound, which caused him to be taken prisoner, and has since cost him his leg, parts of which have been amputated three times.

The rebels still kept up the fire after our forces had regained their transports, but I learn from the several colonels that they did not kill a man.

Generals Grant and McClellan behaved with remarkable bravery and coolness during the whole of the action, and as much may be said of their respective aids—those of General Grant, Captains Logan, Rawlins, and Hillyer, and those of Gen. McClellan, Maj. Brayman, Captain Brolaski, (who was killed while gallantly cheering on the men,) and Captain Dresser, of the artillery.

The following is the regimental list of killed: Seventh Iowa, twenty-six killed; Twenty-second Illinois, thirty-three killed; Twenty-seventh Illinois, eleven killed; Thirtieth Illinois, nine killed; Thirty-first Illinois, ten killed. The wounded and missing are being greatly diminished by each day's report. The official report in regard to missing is no doubt incorrect, as General Grant informs me that squads are returning every day to Bird's Point. Yesterday twenty more returned, and they reported that eighteen others, who had taken a different road, would shortly arrive in camp.

It has been asserted and reiterated that our greatest loss was suffered on the retreat; this is incorrect, as the following will show: thirty of those who were wounded in the advance were brought to a hospital, which afterward fell into the hands of the enemy, and one hundred and forty-three were brought away on the return, showing that but twenty-four were wounded on the retreat, making the sum total of one hundred and fifty-four.

All the wounded prisoners were to-day exchanged unconditionally. I will be compelled to defer the incidents of the battle and late expedition after Thompson for another letter.

W. O. C.

The Cairo correspondent of the Chicago Journal of the 8th, gives an account of the preliminaries of the expedition to Belmont, Mo., also some account of the engagement.

When it was proposed to start an expedition down the river, the best information that had been received at head-quarters, left the impression that there was but a small garrison of rebels at the little town of Belmont, Missouri, nearly opposite Columbus, and its proximity to Columbus, the rebel head-quarters, made its occupancy desirable as a strategical point.

In order that its occupation should be effected with the least possible expenditure of blood, and without precipitating a general battle, the movement was kept, or attempted to be kept, a profound secret. But the result proves that there were traitors in the camp, who availed themselves of the earliest possible information, and not unlikely of full details of the expedition, which were transmitted without delay to the rebels in ample time for them to complete perfect preparations for our reception.

The total available force of the expedition was about three thousand five hundred.

The design was to reach Belmont just before daylight; but, owing to unavoidable delays in embarking, it was eight o'clock before the fleet reached Lucas Bend, the point fixed upon for debarkation. This is about three miles north of Columbus, Ky., on the Missouri side.

The enemy were encamped upon the high ground back from the river, and about two and a half miles from the landing. From their position they could easily see our landing, and had ample time to dispose of their forces to receive us, which they did with all despatch. They also sent a detachment of light artillery and infantry out to retard our march and annoy us as much as possible.

The advance from the river bank to the rebel encampment was a running fight the entire distance, the rebels firing and falling back all the way, while our troops gallantly received their fire without flinching, and bravely held on their way, regardless of the missiles of death that were flying thick and fast about them. The way was of the most indifferent character, lying through woods with thick underbrush, and only here and there a path or a rough country road.

The three divisions kept within close distance of each other, pressing over all obstacles and overcoming all opposition, each striving for the honor of being first in the enemy's camp. This honor fell to the right division, led by Colonel Buford. It was the gallant Twenty-seventh Illinois, who, with deafening cheers, first waved the Stars and Stripes in the midst of the rebels' camping ground.

The scene was a terribly exciting one—musketry and cannon dealing death and destruction on all sides; men grappling with men in a fearful death struggle; column after column rushing eagerly up, ambitious to obtain a post of danger; officers riding hither and thither in the thickest of the fight urging their men on, and encouraging them to greater exertions; regiments charging into the very jaws of death with frightful yells and shouts, more effective as they fell upon the ears of the enemy than a thousand rifle balls—and in the midst of all is heard one long, loud, continuous round of cheering as the Star-Spangled Banner is unfurled in the face of the foe, and defiantly usurps the mongrel colors that had but a moment before designated the spot as rebel ground.

The Twenty-second boys have the honor of having silenced and captured a battery of twelve pieces, which had been dealing destruction with marked success. The Thirtieth had been badly cut up by this battery, and were straining every nerve to capture it. They express considerable disappointment that the prize was snatched from them. They turned away in search of new laurels, and in charging into the very midst of the camp, were drawn into an ambush, where they were again suffering terribly, though maintaining their ground unflinchingly, when the Thirty-first came to their assistance.

An impetuous and irresistible charge was then made, that drove the rebels in all directions, and left the field in possession of the Federal forces. The rebel camps were fired, and with all their supplies, ammunition, baggage, &c., were totally destroyed.

The discovery, on the Kentucky side, that we were in possession of their camp, led to an opening of the rebel batteries from that direction upon us. Their fire was very annoying, the more so as we were not in a position to return it.

Just at this juncture, the report was brought to General Grant by Lieut. Pittman, of the Thirtieth Illinois regiment, who had with his company (F) been on scouting duty, that heavy reinforcements were coming up to the rebels from the opposite side of the river. Indeed, the discovery was also made that the enemy were pouring over the river in immense numbers, and the danger was imminent that our retreat would be cut off. The order to fall back to the boats was therefore given, but not a moment too soon.

The way was already filled with rebel troops, and as we had fought our way up to the encampment, so we were obliged to fight back to our boats, and against desperate odds. But the men were not lacking in courage, and fought like veterans, giving ample demonstration of their determination. Every regiment of Federal troops suffered more or less severely in their return march, but the general opinion prevails that the rebels suffered far greater losses than we.

Wherever they made a stand we put them to flight, and although we lost many brave men, either killed, wounded, or taken prisoners, we made at least two of their men bite the dust for every one that fell from our ranks. Our regiments all reached their boats, though with considerably thinned ranks.

We also brought away, as near as can be ascertained, two hundred and seventy-five prisoners, two cannon, and a quantity of muskets, small-arms, equipments, blankets, &c.

The battery captured in the engagement in the midst of the encampment we were obliged to leave behind. The guns, however, were first carefully spiked.

The battle lasted from 11 o'clock in the morning until sundown. Had the day been longer we should have stood the ground later, and doubtless have achieved a decided victory.

The rebel loss must be much greater than ours. Among their killed was Colonel John V. Wright, of the Fifteenth Tennessee regiment, formerly member of Congress from that State. It is supposed that the rebel camp at Belmont numbered not less than seven thousand. These were wholly routed by the gallant assaults of our little band of less than four thousand. Our fatigued and wounded men were then obliged to overcome a body of five thousand fresh troops in fighting their way back to the boats. Such fighting, against odds so vastly superior, is seldom recorded.

The rebel reinforcements crossed directly opposite Columbus, and their movements were concealed from the gunboats as well as from our main forces, until they had formed on the Missouri side, and were marching up to cut off our retreat to the boats, when our scouts discovered them, and reported to General Grant, as stated above.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT.

CAMP McCLEARNAND, }
CAIRO, NOV. 8, 1861. }

Ere this reaches you, you will have heard of the engagement of our forces with those of Gen. Pillow, at Camp Belmont, opposite Columbus. On Tuesday evening orders were received from head-quarters by the officers commanding the various regiments, to be ready at four o'clock, with two days' rations. The Thirtieth regiment, Col. Fouke, and Thirty-first, Col. Logan, embarked on the steamer Aleck Scott, Capt. Riley; the Twenty-second regiment, Col. Dougherty, the Twenty-seventh, Col. Buford, and the Seventh Iowa, Col. Lauman, upon the Memphis and Montgomery. Taylor's Battery of Artillery and a battalion of Col. Noble's Cavalry, also the Centralia Cavalry, Capt. Burrill. At five o'clock all was in readiness, and the steamers, preceded by the gunboats Tyler and Lexington, passed down about five miles below Norfolk, and anchored for the night. Gen. Grant and staff were upon the Memphis, and Gen. McClelland and staff upon the Aleck Scott. At daybreak, Gen. Grant ordered us to leave about seven o'clock A. M.

We reached Lucas' Bend and disembarked, and Gen. Grant ordered the gunboats to proceed as far as practicable and shell their batteries, and in about an hour the firing commenced from the gunboats and was returned by the enemy from a battery on the Iron Bluffs. No damage was done to the gunboats, although the balls passed over them. I was standing on the deck of the Scott, with Capt. Riley, watching their battery with a glass, when they threw a shell from an eighty-four pound gun, which passed directly over our heads and landed three-quarters of a mile above the Scott, but did not explode. Mr. Reeder, the clerk, sent some men for it, and they found it buried in the earth over ten feet.

At this time the various regiments were forming, scouts having been sent out reported that the enemy were formed in a line of battle two miles from their encampment. Our troops then took up the line of march, ready and eager for a fight. At nine o'clock, the line of battle was formed. The Seventh Iowa, Twenty-second and Twenty-seventh Illinois on the right, Col. Fouke in the centre, and the Thirty-first, Col. Logan, on the left, and two guns from Taylor's battery, the other four being in a corn-field in the rear. At nine o'clock the fight began, Col. Buford, of the Twenty-seventh, opening. Our boys gave three cheers and fired, and it was returned by infantry, and the artillery firing shell. The first shell exploded in the ranks of the Seventh Iowa, wounding three and killing John Wells, a private. Col. Fouke received an order to charge, and he did it and was ably sustained by Col. Logan. After a few more rounds, they were driven into their encampment, and Cols. Fouke and Logan were in their position on a rising hill.

At this time, Col. Dougherty came up with the Twenty-second. Another charge was made, and our troops were in possession of their encampment, passing over a large number of dead bodies. This was about two o'clock, when an order came to burn their encampment, which was done with a good will. It was a splendid encampment, and Lieut.-Colonel Dennis, of the Thirtieth, fired one of an artillery officer's, with all its equipments, which could not have been valued at less than five hundred dollars. And now comes the saddest part. It is not to be supposed that all this was done without any loss on our part. At this time, Gens. Grant and McClelland, Col. Fouke and Capts. McCook and Dresser, had their horses shot from under them; Capt. Challenor, of the Twenty-second regiment, Company K, and seven of his men, were killed instantly.

I can only learn the names of five at present, as the official reports are not made: P. Fogan, Thomas Bowles, H. Stroul, John McCauley, and P. Welch, and eighteen missing, including Capt. Challenor, Col. Henry Dougherty, badly wounded and missing. Capt. Abbott, Company C, and Lieut. Fraleck, supposed to be killed; Benedict Phillips, Sergeant Welch, Joseph Adams and Martin Hartnor, wounded. There are at least seventy-five wounded now in the hospital, and one, named Zimmerman, died this morning on the boat.

Major McClurken, of the Thirtieth, was badly wounded, and fell from his horse while gallantly encouraging his men, and is missing. Capt. Markle, of Company B, Thirtieth regiment, was instantly killed while receiving an order from Col. Fouke, his last words being, "Colonel, I am killed," and died instantly, being shot in the head. Lieut. Fouke, seeing him fall, rushed to him, but could not save his remains, but under a heavy fire he saved his sword and revolver.

Lieut. Dougherty, Company K, was also killed. Surgeons Gordon and Whitnell, of the Thirty-first, are also prisoners, they refusing to leave the wounded. George White, of Taylor's battery, had his right arm shot off, and is very much disfigured. Orderly Sergeant Everett, of the same battery, was shot through the head, a very serious wound. Col. Lauman, of the Seventh Iowa, is badly shot in the thigh. Of the Thirtieth regiment, forty-four are killed and missing; eighteen are in the hospital and three wounded in camp. The names of the men are as follows: John S. Heath, Theodore Gross, Jerry Beatie, John A. McClure, of Company A; James Davis, Company B; Joseph Lenning, Company C; Isaac Wright, L. Cox, Milton Colton, Company D; H. Haling, George Brown, Frank G. Hart, Company E; H. Mayar, Wm. Abernethy, Company H; Isaac R. Martin, Wm. Entleten, A. J. Williams, Casper Sabien. Most of them are doing well; two of them will, without doubt, lose an arm. Col. Logan thinks thirty-seven of his men are killed.

Col. Buford's boys arrested a Major Harris, of Tennessee, and brought home their Confederate flag as a trophy. The Seventh Iowa and the Twenty-second have suffered pretty badly. We captured two prisoners.

At two o'clock, Col. Fouke detailed Company F, as a scouting party. They returned and reported that a force of nearly five thousand had landed from Columbus to reinforce Pillow, and their object was to cut off our retreat to the boats. Cols. Logan and Fouke fought their way out, the balance coming after them. Just as the boats were about to leave, the enemy were seen approaching the levee. The Twenty-second received the first shot from them, which they returned. The gunboats then shelled them, making a havoc in them. The Thirtieth and Thirty-first then fired from the Aleck Scott. None of our troops were killed, but some of them were badly wounded.

Capt. Detrich, of Company I, Twenty-second regiment, was in command of three companies from the Twenty-second, and two from the Iowa First, in a ravine opposite the Iron Bluff, where their battery was planted. They fired at him for a long time, but all their balls and shells passed over him, and not a man of his command was injured until they fired upon the Memphis, when five of his company were shot. When we came to the levee, they had two thousand five hundred infantry, and five hundred cavalry—all fresh troops. We took two hundred of their men prisoners, and two pieces of artillery belonging to the Washington Artillery, of New Orleans, named the Lee and Jeff. Davis. All we lost were two caissons. I have a secession letter from a captain in Watson's Battery of Artillery, written yesterday morning. He had not time to mail it. It is written to a friend in Natchez, Mississippi, in which he makes use of the following language:

"I am thoroughly disgusted with the service. Gen. Polk acts more like a priest than a soldier. I don't meet a man once a month who knows anything about military. I have not seen a field officer who can drill a regiment, or a General who can review a brigade, but McCown, who is an old artillery captain. We are still in Missouri, but expect orders to-day to join Bowen's brigade, at Feliciana, Ky.

"P. S.—Our pickets have just come in, bringing us the information that five steamers, with Federal troops, and two gunboats, are landing within two miles of us. We are all ordered under arms. Yours truly, DAN."

If Dan or his friend would like the original, I will send it to them at the end of the war. I have his name and address. I have also a letter from the surgeon of Watson's battery to a friend in New Orleans.

There were thirteen regiments at Columbus yesterday morning, and they were all to have left yesterday to reinforce Price, and it was known here, and the reception they got from the Egyptians of the Sucker State, has prevented it.

This evening General Grant sent a special letter complimenting the troops for the able manner in which they sustained the honor of the American Union, and at a brigade parade this evening General McClernand addressed each regiment, and returned his thanks.

The Memphis has gone down with Colonels J. D. Webster, Fouke, and Logan, with a flag of truce and the prisoners, to exchange and bury the dead. It is doubtful whether they return to-night.

Captain Brolaski, of Gen. McClernand's staff, was killed instantly by a shot through the head. His family reside at Springfield, Illinois. Where all did so well as they did yesterday, it would not be proper to make any distinction.

A singular circumstance took place yesterday. At the last session of Congress, Colonel Fouke parted with Colonel Wright, a member from Tennessee, and used this expression: "Phil, I expect the next time we meet it will be on the battlefield, and I want to ask one favor of you; if you get me or any of my men, I want you to use us well, and if I get you or any of your men, I will do the same." Yesterday they met in battle, and the very first prisoners, sixty in all, that were taken, belonged to Colonel Wright's command, and his old friend, Colonel F., took them. One of the men informed me that Col. W. was mortally wounded. Also, that Pillow, who was in command, was wounded. There will be more information when the Memphis returns.

But one ball struck the gunboats—that was the Tyler—killing one man and wounding two others. The Memphis has just returned from Columbus. They exchanged thirty sick prisoners. Surgeons Gordon and Whitnell are well, and will be exchanged for fifteen privates. Colonel Dougherty, of the Twenty-second, has had a leg amputated, and he is not expected to recover. Major McClurken is shot through the skull, and is not expected to recover. They acknowledge to near four hundred men killed. They were lying very thick on the banks. They have been all day bringing in their dead. Captain Challenor and Capt. Abbott, of the Twenty-second, are wounded and are prisoners. Col. Fouke was asked by a Lieutenant at Columbus if he was not the Colonel who drove Col. Wright and his command. He told him he was. The Lieutenant then told Colonel F. that twenty guns were aimed to pick him off, when Col. Wright saw him and ordered his men not to shoot him as he was his friend. Had it not been for that we should have been another colonel short. About seventy of our men were buried, they refusing to allow but one of ours to be brought home—that of Captain Markle of the Thirtieth. Gen. Pillow was not wounded; it was his son. All of the missing but two of Col. Fouke's regiment are killed. Our loss is about one hundred killed and one hundred and twenty-five or fifty wounded. It is a glorious victory. They have about one hundred and eighty of our men prisoners.

B. R. K.

Postscript.—The Memphis returned at midnight. The expedition that went down upon her with flags of truce, report the whole number of our dead found and buried by them upon the battle-field at eighty-five—this includes all. The rebels acknowledge their loss to be three hundred and fifty killed. The body of Lieut.-Colonel ———, of the Seventh Iowa, was found dead upon the field by his wife, who went down on the Memphis. His body was divested of all his clothing except shirt and drawers, as was the case with many others of our dead; buttons were found wrenched off, and pockets turned inside out. Col. Dougherty, of the Twenty-second, is a prisoner with the loss of a leg, which has been amputated below the knee. Captain Pillow, a son of Gen. Pillow, fell from his horse fatally wounded, which gave rise to the report that Pillow, senior, was killed.

The Memphis brought thirteen of our wounded—three of them will probably die during the night. All that were left on the field the night of the battle were well cared for, and experienced the kindest treatment from the rebel surgeons. All the troops have been withdrawn to Columbus. Nothing was to be seen on the Belmont side yesterday, but the party burying the dead and a company of cavalry, searching the woods for the dead and wounded.

PRIVATE LETTER FROM A MEMBER OF TAYLOR'S BATTERY.

BIRD'S POINT, MO., Nov. 8.

We returned last night from the hardest fought battle our troops have had since Wilson's Creek. It is the old story. We were overpowered by superior numbers and driven from the field, leaving many of our dead and dying, although we had once fairly gained the victory, and taken two splendid guns from the Louisiana artillery. We started down the river at half-past ten o'clock Wednesday night, with parts of five regiments on five boats, and the two gunboats. We dropped down to within six miles of Columbus, and lay to till morning, when we moved down to within two miles of the same place, and landed on the Missouri shore. At nine o'clock the gunboats went around the point and opened on the enemy's batteries on the Ohalk Bluffs. The Kentucky shore rises in high bluffs, while the Missouri side is low, covered with woods, with a clearing here and there. We had to drag our guns up the bank (thirty feet high) by hand, which we did with a lively "Hi, hi, hi," the shot and shell dropping around; and an order to hurry up the battery urged us to the utmost. Some of their shots went half a mile over us, but they did no damage. We then made a circuit and came on the rear of their camp at Belmont, where there were about three thousand. They did not expect us, but thought the gunboats had just come down to shell the camp. We stopped in a cornfield, and the infantry went forward, having divested themselves of their knapsacks, blankets, coats, &c., which were stacked up all around. We soon heard the shots of the pickets, and at eleven o'clock the fight commenced in earnest. (Two of our guns went forward before the firing commenced.) In a few minutes we were ordered to advance, and we dashed through the woods, the balls whistling through the tree-tops, and shells dropping and bursting around. When we got half-way, they halted one section and ordered ours forward; but just then my gun ran against a tree and broke the pole, and we were detained until we could change limbers with the caisson, number six going forward in our place. We soon got fixed and were ordered on, and took the extreme left all alone. During this time the battle had progressed gallantly, and the rebels were driven back from their camp, and their tents and every thing else burnt. There was a continual string of wounded going to the rear, and a number of prisoners. We supposed the day was ours, and, having caught six secessh artillery horses that came dashing up, and fine ones at that, we were feeling well. General McClelland and staff came past and said we were in danger of being cut off any moment, having no infantry to support us, and told us to fall back further, which we did, but had not been gone ten minutes before four thousand troops came up to where we had been, having crossed the river from Columbus, and more had been landed below, and they came up on both sides and drove us back, the infantry being tired with two hours' hard fighting, and discouraged to see the fresh numbers coming on. We retreated slowly, being too tired to run. We attempted to rally and make a stand, but, after we had halted in battery, could not stop the infantry. So away we went again, intending to make a stand on the river-bank, and give them another turn. I cleared the road, and got along as fast as I could with our two guns, which were together. The road was full of soldiers, and I had hard work to make them make way for the artillery. The road was strewn with knapsacks, overcoats, etc., but they clung well to their arms. We reached the boat, and the colonels and officers tried every means to rally their men, but without success. We were then ordered to get aboard as quick as possible, and we slid our guns aboard lively, I tell you. I could have brought off my caisson-body by leaving the secesh gun we had taken, but considered I was far ahead by leaving it, although pretty full of ammunition, and having our blankets, etc., strapped on, (mine was on my horse;) and the captain said, "Certainly, by all means, you were right." The gun was worth a great deal more. The other one we took was a twelve-pound brass howitzer. Our boys got secesh coats, caps, revolvers, rifles, muskets, knives, etc., when they burnt the camp. The enemy were well armed and fought bravely, but are no match for us, man for man; but when they are three to one, and have the advantage of intrenchments, heavy artillery, and position, it is rather too much. We had got nearly all of our carriages aboard, when the rebels were seen advancing. We got all our horses, guns, and carriages aboard and shoved off, during the firing which had opened between our troops on the boats and the rebels. We learned afterward, from some of the Twenty-seventh, which we left behind, that among the enemy's reinforcements were four batteries of artillery, which were advancing on us when we were embarking, and if we had made a stand on the bank we would have had hot work. After we got out in the river and in range, we opened with three of our guns on them, together with the gunboats, and the way we dropped the shell among them was a caution. The firing did not cease till sundown.

The whole thing was an awful "bungle." The question is, where was the force from Paducah, and the force above, which left several days ago? Fifteen thousand, we thought, were there to engage the rebels at Columbus, while we were to take them at Belmont.

We steamed slowly up stream, lying to occasionally and taking on fugitives, in squads, till we were loaded down. We learned that there were two regiments left behind, but they were all mixed up; nobody knew where his regiment was, or what had become of the rest. All the wounded were taken on the boats up to the time of the retreat, but of course many were left behind. Our cabin and state rooms were crowded as thick as they could be laid with the wounded, and the surgeons were busy as they could be all night.

To recapitulate: We had about four thousand men; attacked about three thousand at Belmont and drove them from the field, when they were reinforced by four thousand above and three thousand below, together with cavalry and four batteries from Columbus, and their heavy guns from the bluffs opposite playing down upon our men all the time; they could look right down on the battle from the shore, where Pillow was said to be in command. Our battery was very fortunate, part of them being in the thickest of the fight all day, and only three or four wounded. Geo. Q. White had his right hand blown off, but is doing well. Orderly Sergeant Everett was struck in the back of the head, but is doing well. Sergeant Chase was shot through the arm—doing well. Two of our guns destroyed a famous battery of nine guns, called the "Washington Battery," from New Orleans. We brought off two of their guns, but had to leave two of our caisson-bodies. I brought off one of them with my caisson-teams, a brass six-pounder, engraved on the breech "Lee, John Clark, maker, New Orleans, La."

MEMPHIS "APPEAL" NARRATIVE.

COLUMBUS, Nov. 10, 1861.

Thursday, the 7th day of November, 1861, as your columns have already announced, was an eventful day to the Confederate cause in the Northwest—"the advance of the first column of the enemy," as a prisoner has remarked, "upon New Orleans," though, more properly speaking, upon Columbus. Things had worn their wonted aspect of quiet up to six A. M. on that morning, with the exception of an occasional piece of impudence on the part of the Lincolnites, in the shape of near approaches with small bodies of their men to our lines, without any skirmishing, however, for some two weeks.

On the morning of the 7th, about six o'clock, boats were seen landing troops some seven miles above Columbus, on the opposite side of the river, near Hunter's Landing. Information was immediately conveyed to head-quarters. The number of the boats, however, seemed to imply that they were after larger game than was known to be in that vicinity. The Aleck Scott had frequently been seen on these marauding expeditions, but this time she was accompanied by six other boats, including two gunboats, most of them of heavy tonnage. The process of disembarkation kept steadily progressing, and by the numbers landed it became plain that our little force on the other side of the river—consisting of Col. Tappan's Thirteenth Arkansas regiment, Watson's battery, Col. Beltzhoover, and the Bolivar Troop, Capt. Montgomery, and Capt. Bowles' Cavalry, of Lieut.-Col. Miller's battalion of Mississippi Cavalry—were in imminent danger of an attack. Under these circumstances, reinforcements were rapidly sent, consisting of Col. Edward Pickett's Twenty-first, Col. J. V. Wright's Thirteenth, Col. Freeman's Twenty-second, and Col. J. Knox Walker's Second Tennessee regiments. On the landing of these troops they were hastily formed in line of battle on the border of an old field lying immediately behind the encampment of Col. Tappan's regiment, skirmishers being detailed from Col. Pickett's regiment to press forward and engage the enemy at the head of the lake, Col. Freeman's regiment and Watson's battery, Col. Beltzhoover, occupying the centre, with the Thirteenth Arkansas on the right, and Thirteenth Tennessee on the left. All of this had been effected by nine o'clock, and our troops on the other side at this time may be estimated at about two thousand seven hundred men. The enemy at about ten o'clock came upon our advance, which received them with a heavy volley of musketry, and gradually fell back toward our main line, the Lincolnites following them up closely until they came within range of the main body, where they were gallantly received. Now commenced the rattling of the musketry and the roar of the artillery in earnest, our line standing firmly for one hour and a half in the face of the enemy. Our position at this time was not an eligible one, as our forces were mostly drawn up in the open field, giving the enemy the advantage of the woods, which was bordered by a heavy underbrush, and large numbers of old logs, which served them as impromptu breastworks. Two of the guns of Watson's battery had by this time become unserviceable through the stopping of the vent by their fuze, which materially impaired the efficiency of the battery, though it still continued to do noble service. Under all the circumstances, however, it was folly to maintain our position before a vastly superior force, who were steadily outflanking us, and the order was given to fall back and await reinforcements, which was not done, however, until our little force had repelled three desperate charges by the enemy.

Our forces, after falling back in good order, took up a position on the bank of the river, where they continued firing until their ammunition gave out, and they were compelled to retire under the bank in order to escape the galling fire of the enemy, who had taken Watson's battery after a desperate charge, and turned it upon our lines, charging at the same time upon the encampment which had been occupied by Colonel Tappan's regiment, and the Watson battery, setting fire to the tents and throwing their lines upon the banks of the river beneath which our men lay without ammunition. It is said that as the Lincolnites came upon the bank above them, our whole force, which lay but eight or ten yards off, had but three rounds of cartridges with which to receive them.

Our men now retreated up the bank of the river to a point opposite the upper end of Columbus; here Colonel Carroll's Fifteenth (under Colonel Tyler, of San Juan notoriety) and Col. Mark's Eleventh Louisiana regiments were being landed, which forces reached the other side of the river between half-past twelve and two.

At eleven o'clock A. M. orders were received for two companies of the first battalion Tennessee Cavalry, Colonel Logwood, to cross the river, and Captain Taylor's Memphis Light Dragoons and Captain White's Tennessee Mounted Rifles (being companies A and B, of the battalion) were detailed and marched under Colonel Logwood. In crossing the river, the two companies were compelled to take separate boats, and Captain Taylor's company, accompanied by Colonel Logwood, reached the other side before our forces had retired up the river. Taking a position on the left wing with Captain Montgomery's Bolivar Troop and Captain Bowles' Cavalry, under Colonel Miller, as sharpshooters and videttes, that portion of our cavalry, when the charge was made, were cut off from the main body and were obliged to retreat down the river. Captain White's company were delayed some hour or more in crossing, and made the other side at a time when the landing for disembarking our reinforcements had been removed further up the river, and were consequently with the main body at and after the time of landing.

As soon as it became apparent that our troops had deserted their camp on the Missouri side, and while the flames were issuing from them, surrounded as they were, the famous pivot gun Lady Davis was turned loose upon them from this side, and Stewart's and Smith's batteries opened fire from a position on this side of the river, opposite them. The Lady Davis fired two shots.

About this time the Ingomar was coming up the river, and the guns of the enemy being turned against her, she was compelled to fall back and postpone her landing. The batteries on this side of the river, however, kept up such an incessant firing that the enemy were compelled to retire from the river bank and take position farther back and within the cover of the woods. By this time our reinforcements had landed, and were drawn up in line of battle on the bank; Colonel Smith's First (One Hundred and Fifty-fourth) Tennessee regiment, and Colonel Blythe's Mississippi battalion, being in transit across the river.

The falling back of the enemy from the river was the turning tide in the affairs of the day.

Gen. Pillow, now at the head of Col. Tappan's, Freeman's, Pickett's, Wright's, Russell's, and Mark's Eleventh Louisiana regiments, attacked the enemy in three desperate charges between twelve and two o'clock, each time repulsed and rallied by General Pillow in person. Wherever the battle raged the fiercest, there was seen their indomitable leader, overseeing and directing even the details of the engagement.

In the mean time, a flank movement under General Cheatham was being effected, under the immediate direction of General Polk. This movement was intended to cut the enemy off from their boats by throwing our right wing between the river and the head of a little lake that runs parallel with the river some mile from each other. Captain White's Tennessee Mounted Rifles were on the extreme right of this movement, with Carroll's Tennessee regiment and Blythe's Mississippi battalion; soon followed on their landing, by Col. Smith's First (One Hundred and Fifty-fourth) and Neeley's Fourth Tennessee, in their order, on his left, commanded by General Cheatham.

While this flank movement was being effected, and before our forces had fully gained the position it was designed they should occupy, Gen. Pillow, with the forces under his command, made an irresistible charge upon the position of the enemy, driving every thing before him, and completely routing them. They made two partial stands as they were pursued by our troops, but finally broke into a perfect stampede, and the victory was ours, though the enemy's loss was not near so heavy as it would have been had the design of our flank movement been fully carried out, and our forces placed in the position they were designed to occupy before the breaking of their column. Capt. White's Tennessee Mounted Rifles being first to move, had, however, gained the point where the enemy were to embark before they reached it in large numbers, and taking a position between the gunboats and the enemy's hospital, where they could not be shelled without the shots taking effect upon their own sick, they kept up a brisk fire upon them as they retreated past. Smith's and Carroll's regiments, and Taylor's, Montgomery's, and Bowles' Cavalry soon came up, and the havoc is said to have been frightful. As the enemy gained ground in the commencement of the engagement, they had kept a large number of wagons and ambulances engaged in carrying their dead and wounded off the field, and this will make it impossible for us ever to approximate the number of their killed and wounded. Besides, a galling fire was kept up upon them even after they had reached their transports, and as we crowded upon them every shot from our ordinary muskets even seemed to take effect.

Captain White's company captured two surgeons, two captains, and fourteen men from the Lincolnites, and recaptured three of Colonel Wright's regiment, when within two hundred yards of the boats.

It is a remarkable fact that not a man was lost of the cavalry corps engaged, and but two slightly wounded.

Two companies of the First Tennessee battalion of cavalry, Colonel Logwood, were kept on this side as a reserve, in anticipation of an attack on this side of the river. Captain Ballentine's company, the Shelby Light Dragoons, and Captain Green's (formerly Major Hill's) company, were stationed on the hill above Columbus, and the battle went on before them like a panorama.

Captain Taylor's Cavalry, the Memphis Light Dragoons, captured 24 prisoners, among whom was Brevet Brigadier-General Dougherty, Colonel of the Seventh Illinois regiment, who had been shot in the early part of the day—about the time of the taking of the Watson battery by the enemy. Colonel Dougherty has since had his leg amputated twice, the first operation being unskillfully performed.

Captain Dashiell, of Pickett's regiment, was carried off the field wounded.

General Fouke, an "M. C." of some little distinction, was commander of a brigade on the field, and it is said that in retreating on to the boat a colonel of one of our regiments, who was formerly his personal friend, prevented a soldier of his regiment from shooting "his honor" through excess of courtesy, he being a "distinguished visitor."

It is a remarkable thing that out of the sixteen horses lying dead on the field after the battle was over, nine were white. All the white horses on the field, with the exception of General Pillow's and Colonel Logwood's, were killed. Every man on General Pillow's staff lost his horse, and a number of them had two horses shot under them. Geo. Pillow, a son of General Pillow, had his horse shot no less than seven times, and was afterward himself injured by the falling of the staging while getting a six-pound gun off of one of the boats. Mr. H. P. Woodlock, Gen. Pillow's orderly, had two horses shot under him. Captain Jackson, of the artillery, acting aid to General Pillow, was shot through the thigh and the spine injured.

Captain J. H. Morgan and Captain R. W. Pittman, of Somerville, of Wright's regiment, were both wounded.

General McClelland's horse was shot under him in the engagement, though it is thought he was uninjured.

Generals McClelland, Grant, and Fouke were in command of the enemy, and it is thought all escaped uninjured.

Major McClurken, of the Seventh Iowa regiment, is a prisoner. He is badly shot in the head, three inches of the skull being shot away, with the brain protruding.

Brevet Brigadier-General Fouke was here yesterday, under a flag of truce, to ask, and received, permission to bury their dead.

Colonel Tappan's Arkansas regiment lost thirteen killed, forty-three wounded, and twenty-three missing.

An incident of heroic conduct is related in connection with the first heavy charge that our columns made upon the enemy, which, as an incident of the battle, should not go unrecorded. When the two columns came face to face, Colonel Walker's regiment was immediately opposed to the Seventh Iowa, and David Vollmer, of Captain Stokes' company, belonging to Colonel Walker's regiment, drawing the attention of a comrade to the Stars and Stripes that floated over the enemy, avowed his intention of capturing the colors or dying in the attempt. The charge was made, the centre of Walker's regiment, Captain Stokes' position, facing the centre of the Iowa regiment. As the two columns came within a few yards of each other, young Vollmer and a young man by the name of Lynch both made a rush for the colors, but Vollmer's bayonet first pierced the breast of the color-bearer, and, grasping the flag, he waved it over his head in triumph. At this moment he and Lynch were both shot dead, and as Vollmer fell, emulating the ardor of these chivalrous young men, Captain J. Welby Armstrong stepped forth to capture the colors, when he also fell, grasping the flagstaff. These colors are now at General Pillow's office.

The loss of Russell's brigade is as follows:—Second regiment, 18 killed, 64 wounded, 33 missing. Thirteenth regiment, 28 killed, 70 wounded, 43 missing. Fifteenth regiment, 10 killed, 10 wounded, and 4 missing—making a total of 56 killed, 147 wounded, and 85 missing.

A steamer, bearing a flag of truce, came to Columbus to-day, (Nov. 8,) bearing Mrs. Dougherty and other ladies, who came down to see their husbands, who are prisoners in our hands.

We have one hundred prisoners in our possession who are uninjured, and about the same number of wounded are in our hospitals. The enemy are reported to have one hundred and two of our men at Cairo, a large number taken from our hospital on the other side.

Two gentlemen, residents of Austin, Texas, passed through Columbus to-day, who were taken prisoners in New York on landing from a vessel from South America. After being held for some time, they were released, and after making their way through Canada came down through St. Louis, and were at Cairo on the 6th—the day of the battle. They report that transports were continually plying between this point and Cairo on that day, full of dead and wounded, who were received and borne away from the boats at Cairo by the citizens. They further report that there are two gunboats finished at St. Louis, and six on the stocks. They bring a Chicago Tribune, which has the candor to say the battle on the 6th was terrible on both sides. In the midst of the battle our batteries were turned upon the gunboats, whenever they showed themselves around the bend above. It was plain that several of our balls from Major Stewart's battery struck the boat, but the amount of damage was not known at the time. These gentlemen now bring the report, which is confirmed, that the gunboat Lexington has since sunk from the effects of her injuries.

MEMPHIS "AVALANCHE" ACCOUNT.

We have received from our highly intelligent military friend, Major Bledsoe Harmon, who has just returned from a visit to Columbus, the following particulars of the late engagement:

From ten to twelve regiments of the enemy effected a landing on the Missouri side, about five miles above Columbus by land. Information of it was immediately brought in by the pickets of Tappan's regiment, encamped opposite Columbus, and communicated to General Polk, who immediately began preparations to send reinforcements to Tappan, steam having to be raised for the transportation of the troops across the river. In the mean time the enemy came down at double-quick, and attacked Tappan's regiment, which had to fall back; when Pillow arrived with Pickett's, Wright's, Knox's, Walker's, and Freeman's regiments, and gave the enemy battle in an open square of about 700 acres, on which the trees had been felled, the Federals being concealed in the surrounding woods and bushes.

Our troops fought here at a great disadvantage, being exposed to the fire of the skulking Federals without having a fair chance at them, but yet they made a gallant struggle, until their ammunition running out, they were compelled to return to the river. The Federals then fell upon Tappan's camp, plundering and burning, and turned Watson's battery, which they had taken from us and posted below them, on the steamers which were transporting our troops across. But a battery on the Kentucky side silenced its fire while the one hundred and twenty-eight-pounder on the hill above Columbus, sending a few shots among the main body of the Federals, sent them howling back to the woods. These shots, it is said, were found several miles distant.

In the meanwhile, General Cheatham brought over Marks', Russell's, and Carroll's regiments, and, with Pillow, renewed the fight. A flank movement was executed by Cheatham, in which Marks' Louisiana regiment did good service, which threw the enemy into disorder, and a disorderly rout ensued, the Federals flying to their boats, four or five miles distant.

Colonel Smith's regiment, with Col. Blythe's, having also gotten over, the former was despatched in pursuit of the enemy, while Blythe's was afterward to follow to support it. Captains Taylor's and White's companies of cavalry, of Logwood's battalion, also joined in the pursuit, which was led by Generals Polk, Pillow, and Cheatham, the slaughter of the flying Federals being great.

But it was when they reached their boats and embarked on the L. M. Kennett, supported by their gunboats, that the butchery was most terrific. Packed together on the boat, lying at the shore, in dense masses, Smith's regiment poured on them for half an hour, from a distance of only eighty yards, an incessant fire. An immense number were killed and wounded, the gutters around the boat filled with torrents of blood, which crimsoned the river around for a considerable distance, and the decks so slippery that the men could scarcely stand. Those who approached the wheel were shot down as fast as they appeared, so that they were compelled to move the boat into the stream without guidance.

The guns of the gunboats, lying close to the shore, shooting too high, were inefficient, until they got into the river, when Col. Smith withdrew his men. So hasty was the retreat of the boats that all the cables were cut, leaving us a full supply of them.

The battle throughout was exceedingly fierce. The fire on Pillow's force in the first instance was tremendous. The Federals fought with unusual bravery. They were picked men—the very flower of the forces on the Mississippi—their best marksmen. Only our superior generalship and the desperate courage of our men gave us the victory.

Captain John Morgan estimates the loss of our entire army at about one hundred killed and less than two hundred wounded. The enemy lost about four hundred killed and seven hundred wounded. We have ninety-one prisoners and over one hundred of their wounded in our hands. He says that McClelland's haversack was found upon the battle-field, and his nice snack eaten by our men. It was well understood that the plan of the enemy was to take the Missouri side and erect fortifications, while seventeen regiments were to move upon Columbus from the other side, and, making a simultaneous attack, take the place and capture the Confederate army. From some cause the enemy did not approach from the Kentucky side, and to this fact the enemy attribute their discomfiture.

L. P. YANDELL'S ACCOUNT.

COLUMBUS, November 10.

MY DEAR FATHER: I know you have been impatient to hear from me since news reached you of the battle, but I have not had time till this morning. Thursday morning two gunboats, with five steamboats, landed six or eight miles above us on the Missouri shore, and were seen to disembark infantry, artillery, and cavalry in large numbers. Troops were thrown across from our side of the river about eight or nine o'clock, and about eleven o'clock the battle commenced and raged till three or four o'clock P. M. The gunboats came down within range of our camp and commenced throwing shot and shell about eight o'clock. One or two shots fell inside our line—one piece near my tent. Hamilton's artillery replied to the boats, and they soon moved out of range, when Captain Stewart, with his Parrott guns, went two miles up the bluff and opened on the boats. Most of his guns threw over the boats, and the enemy's balls did not reach us. Adjutant Hammond and I were with Captain Stewart, and helped the men to place the guns in position a number of times. They were just going to fire one of the guns, when Hammond and I retired some ten or twelve yards. The gun was fired—the explosion was terrific—and some one yelled out "Two men killed!" I rushed up immediately and saw at once that they were killed. The gun had exploded into a thousand atoms. One of the men had his right arm torn to pieces, and the ribs on that side pulpified, though the skin was not broken. He breathed half an hour. The other poor fellow received a piece of iron under the chin, which passed up into the brain—the blood gushing from his nose and ears. He never breathed afterward. A third man received a slight wound of the arm. The fragments of the gun flew in every direction, and I can only wonder that more of us were not killed. A horse hitched near mine received a glancing wound from a piece of the gun.

Our brigade was ordered under arms about noon—or rather, it was kept under arms all the morning, but I was ordered across the river about noon. Our men were previously anxious to be led over soon in the morning; but Gen. Polk would not allow it, as he expected an attack from this side of the river—which was certainly the plan of the enemy, but it was not carried out.

We did not get on the ground till the enemy were in full retreat, and we never got near them; in fact, only one regiment of our brigade pursued them at all, and they only for a mile or two. I went with Col. Scott's regiment, belonging to Col. Neeley's brigade. When about two miles out we were ordered back, as the enemy had reached his boats. I had fifty or eighty men detailed from Scott's regiment to scour the woods with me to pick up the wounded. We found none but Federals, but they were in such numbers we could only take back a few and return for the others. In one cornfield they were lying, dead and wounded, as thick as stumps in a new field. I saw sixty or seventy, and others report as many as two hundred in this field. They were mostly of the Sixth Iowa regiment, and some of the Twenty-seventh Illinois. The Lieutenant-Colonel and three captains I know to have been killed, or wounded and taken prisoners. The Seventh Iowa was almost annihilated. The scene upon the battle-field was awful.

The wounded men groaned and moaned, yelled and shrieked with pain. I had opium, brandy, and water, with which I alleviated their torture, and, poor creatures, they were exceedingly grateful. I was out until two o'clock that night with Col. Neeley and a battalion of the Fourth regiment picking up the wounded. In the woods and in the field the dead were so thick that it required careful riding to keep from tramping their bodies. The only means I had of knowing the road that night was by the corpses I had noticed in the afternoon. In one place there were eleven bodies lying side by side; further on were five; in another place were fifteen near together. These were the only groups that I noticed, but I sometimes found six or eight within a space of twenty yards. Some of the poor creatures had crawled to the foot of trees, and laid their heads upon the roots and crossed their arms; others lay upon their backs with arms and legs outstretched; some were doubled up, and, in fact, they were in every imaginable position. As to the variety of expression depicted upon the faces of the corpses, of which I heard so much, I saw nothing of it. They all looked pretty much alike—as much alike as dead men from any other cause. Some had their eyes open, some closed; some had their mouths open, and others had them closed. There is a terrible sameness in the appearance of all the dead men I have ever seen. The only faces which were disfigured were those that were burned, or shot, or blackened with powder.

There were not many wounds from cannon balls or shells, but I saw almost every variety of wounds from musket and rifle balls. I saw almost all the battle from our camp, which is on top of the high bluff. The Missouri side is low and flat, and much of the battle-ground is open. The battle swayed back and forth many times. Once our men were driven clear under the river bank, having got out of cartridges. For several hours General Pillow held the enemy in check with two thousand men, the enemy having seven thousand infantry, four hundred and fifty cavalry, and I don't recollect their artillery. Pillow acted with great bravery. So did Polk and Cheatham, but they were not in the fight for several hours after Pillow. Pillow's escape is miraculous. Every one of his staff officers had his horse shot under him. One of them, Gus. Henry, had two shot under him. One of his aids was shot through the hip, and his horse was riddled with balls. Pillow wore a splendid uniform, very conspicuous, and rode the handsomest gray mare in the army. As we watched the fighting from the bluff, and saw our men advance and retreat, waver and fall back, and then saw the Arkansas troops' tents on fire, and the Stars and Stripes advancing toward the river, and some of our men crowding down to the very water's edge, I tell you my feelings were indescribable. The scene was grand, but it was terrible, and when I closed my eyes about four o'clock next morning, I could see regiments charging and retreating—men falling and yelling—horses and men torn and mangled—and myriads of horrid spectacles. It was a bloody enjoyment, but we do not know the loss on either side yet.

It is roughly estimated that we lost two hundred and fifty in killed, wounded, and missing, and the enemy five hundred in killed and wounded. An immense number of horses were killed. I rode over the battle-field yesterday.

For several miles the trees are torn and barked by balls, and many horses lie upon the ground, some torn open by shells and others riddled by balls. You can see innumerable stains of blood upon the ground. Where poor, gallant Armstrong was killed, there were eleven dead bodies. At the time of his death, he had a cap upon his sword waving it, rallying his men. My friend Captain Billy Jackson was shot in the hip while leading a portion of Russell's brigade. I think he will recover. I am afraid Jimmy Walker (James' son) will not recover. I think he is shot through the rectum.

The day before the battle, Jackson, Major Butler, of the Eleventh Louisiana regiment, Wilson, of Watson's battery, Lieut. Ball, of same regiment, and Major Gus. Henry, and myself dined at Gen. Pillow's. Butler was shot through and died yesterday. Lieut. Ball was dangerously injured, and Henry had two horses shot under him. Jackson I have spoken of. I have given you but a poor account of what I saw, but I have not time to go more into details now, and I am out of kelter besides. You will see a full account in the papers of the fight. I wish the war would close. Such scenes as that of Thursday are sickening; and this destruction of life is so useless. I believe we shall have some terrible fighting very soon on the coast, in Virginia and in Kentucky. Much love to mother and sister when you see them. Mr. Law gave me the letter.

I am your devoted son,
LUNSFORD P. YANDELL.

THE FREMONT-PRICE TREATY.

GENERAL HUNTER'S REPUDIATION OF IT.

GEN. HUNTER TO GEN. PRICE.

HEAD-QUARTERS WESTERN DEPARTMENT,
SPRINGFIELD, Mo., Nov. 7, 1861. }

General Sterling Price, commanding forces at Cassville, Mo.:

GENERAL: Referring to an agreement purporting to have been made between Major-Generals Fremont and Price, respectively, commanding antagonistic forces in the State of Missouri, to the effect that, in future, arrests or forcible interference, by armed or unarmed parties of citizens within the limits of said State, for the mere entertainment or expression of political opinions, shall hereafter cease; that families now broken up for such causes may be reunited; and that the war now progressing shall be exclusively confined to armies in the field—I have to state:

That, as General commanding the forces of the United States in this Department, I can in no manner recognize the agreement aforesaid, or any of its provisions, whether implied or direct; and that I can neither issue, nor allow to be issued, the "joint proclamation" purporting to have been signed by yourself and Major-

General John C. Fremont, on the first day of November, A. D. 1861.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
D. HUNTER,
Major-General Commanding.

GENERAL HUNTER TO ADJUTANT-GENERAL THOMAS.

Brig.-Gen. Thomas, Adj.-Gen. U. S. A. :

GENERAL: Enclosed you will find copies of certain negotiations carried on between Major-General John C. Fremont, of the first part, and Major-General Sterling Price, of the second part, having for its objects:

First. To make arrangements for the exchange of prisoners.

Second. To prevent arrests or forcible interference in future "for the mere entertainment or expression of political opinions."

Third. To insure that "the war now progressing shall be confined exclusively to armies in the field;" and,

Fourth. The immediate disbandment of "all bodies of armed men acting without the authority or recognition of the Major-Generals named, and not legitimately connected with the armies in the field."*

You will also find enclosed a copy of my letter of this date, despatched under a flag of truce to General Price, stating that "I can in no manner recognize the agreement aforesaid, or any of its provisions, whether implied or direct, and that I can neither issue, nor allow to be issued, the "joint proclamation" purporting to have been signed by Generals Price and Fremont, on the 1st day of November, A. D. 1861."

It would be, in my judgment, impolitic in the highest degree to have ratified General Fremont's negotiations, for the following, among many other, obvious reasons:

The second stipulation, if acceded to, would render the enforcement of martial law in Missouri, or any part of it, impossible, and would give absolute liberty to the propagandists of treason throughout the length and breadth of the State.

The third stipulation, confining operations exclusively to "armies in the field," would practically annul the confiscation act passed during the last session of Congress, and would furnish perfect immunity to those disbanded soldiers of Price's command who have now returned to their homes, but with the intention, and under a pledge, of rejoining the rebel forces whenever called upon; and lastly,

Because the fourth stipulation would blot out of existence the loyal men of the Missouri Home Guard, who have not, it is alleged, been recognized by act of Congress, and who, it would be claimed, are therefore "not legitimately connected with the armies in the field."

There are many more objections quite as powerful and obvious, which might be urged against ratifying this agreement—its address "to all peaceably-disposed citizens of the State of Missouri," fairly allowing the inference to be drawn, that citizens of the United States (the loyal and true men of Missouri) are not included in its benefits.

In fact, the agreement would seem to me, if ratified, a concession of all the principles for which the rebel leaders are contending, and a practical liberation, for use in other and more immediately important localities, of all their forces now kept employed in this portion of the State.

I have the honor to be, General, most respectfully, your most obedient servant,

D. HUNTER,
Major-General Commanding.

RETIREMENT OF GENERAL SCOTT.

RESOLUTION OF THE NEW YORK CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

At a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, held November 7th, 1861, the following resolutions, introduced by Mr. Denning Duer, were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce, at this its first meeting after the retirement of Lieutenant-General Scott from the command of the army of the United States, desires to join its voice to that of the constituted authorities of the nation and of the people at large, in bearing testimony to the signal services of Lieutenant-General Winfield Scott, and to his illustrious example as a man, a soldier, and a citizen, through a period of more than half a century.

In war always successful; in adverse circumstances never discouraged; in the moment of victory never unduly elated; provident of the blood of the soldiers, and steadily set against any self-aggrandizement at the cost of a single life unnecessarily hazarded; alike in peace and in war, respecting the sanctity of law and subordinating arms to the civil authority; he passed through his long career without a stain upon his name, or a departure from the character of an able, upright, Christian soldier and gentleman.

Once and again, when foreign war seemed to threaten our country, we have turned instinctively to the great soldier, as our mediator for peace, and never in vain; and now, when the crime of the age—the rebellion of the Southern States—broke out, he, whose warning voice in advance was fatally unheeded, stood forth, faithful among the faithless, and, with his great name and his strong arm, bearing aloft the flag of our Union, sprinkled in times past with his blood, and blazing all over with his exploits, he planted it on the dome of the Capitol, and, inaugurating the new President beneath its folds, rescued the nation from anarchy.

Later still, when baffled traitors, rushing to arms, beleaguered the capital with overwhelming forces, and the head of the nation called all loyal men to the rescue, Winfield Scott at Washington was our sword and buckler, and to him flocked instantly thousands and tens of thousands of our countrymen.

And now, when the sublime uprising of the people has averted the danger, the glorious veteran, broken with the trials of war, asks permission to remit to young and able hands the chief command, and gracefully retires, crowned with every honor that a grateful country can bestow—faithful in all the past to one flag, one Constitution, one country, and the one great name of America.

The Chamber of Commerce deems it a privilege to express its sense of such eminent-services, and to place upon its records this memorial of grateful appreciation.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, duly authenticated, be presented to Lieutenant-General Scott by a committee of this body.

SIEGE OF COTTON HILL, VA.,

OCTOBER 30 TO NOVEMBER 7, 1861.

A CORRESPONDENT at the camp of the Second Kentucky regiment, in Western Virginia, gives the following account of the siege:

CAMP TOMPKINS, WESTERN VIRGINIA, }
Nov. 8, 1861. }

For the past eight days the roar of artillery and musketry has been the only music we have danced to, and even while I write the booming of cannon still falls on my weary ear. The camp of our Second Kentucky regiment and the head-quarters of Generals Rosecrans and Cox are situated on top of Gauley Mount, on the farm of Colonel Tompkins, now in the rebel army, a gentleman of strong Southern proclivities, a graduate of West Point, and formerly in the United States army. This farm is his summer residence, he and his wife being residents of Richmond; she now occupies the house with her family, while he is somewhere in the neighborhood, assisting Floyd in "driving the invaders from the soil." From our camp the road descends abruptly to the river bank, and runs directly along the bank to Gauley Bridge, a distance of three miles; at this point Gauley and New rivers empty into and form the Kanawha; and across Gauley River is where the bridge was, but by some means or other, after Wise had crossed it, whilst he was retreating before our advance column, the bridge was burned; and now the massive stone piers alone remain, a monument to the disgrace of as vile a miscreant as ever deserved a hempen cord. At this place are all the depots for quartermaster and commissary stores for supplying the entire army of Western Virginia, and the only means of crossing the stream is by a flat-boat pulled by hand; on this cross all the wagons and supplies for our troops above New River. On the opposite side of the river from our camp, and all along, down to the bridge, the mountains extend down to the water's edge, and tower above to an immense height.

On Wednesday, October 30, the rebels could be seen gathering in large numbers on the mountains, and were apparently working hard, throwing up breastworks, &c. During that night the hills were alive with them; here and there were large fires, and lights were constantly moving around among the trees; the rumbling of wagon and cannon wheels could be distinctly heard, and ever and anon a command spoken too loud was borne to our ears. Our camp was all excitement, and General Rosecrans was at a serious loss to know what Floyd & Co. intended. We finally worried the night through, and daylight relieved our suspense. On the mountain ridges they had planted their cannon during the night, and closer down toward the river their riflemen and sharpshooters filled the woods the entire distance from our camp to Gauley Bridge. The ferry-boat was making its usual trips, running day and night, and the road had become nearly filled with wagons passing to and fro, when, bang, whizz went a cannon, and the ball commenced, the riflemen pouring in their deadly volleys on our wagons and teams, and the artillery shelling the ferry-boat and the camp of the Eleventh Ohio below the bridge. General Rosecrans immediately ordered a battery of mountain howitzers to the top of the hills on our side of the river, and in a brief space of time they engaged the artillery of the rebels on the opposite hills, and then commenced one of the most exciting artillery duels that was ever witnessed. The shells flew fast and thick from one side to the other, shot answered shot, and soon the entire scene was enveloped in a dense curtain of smoke; naught was to be seen on either hand but the fire belching from the enemy's artillery, and in a second more their shells burst around and about us, scattering dirt, twigs, and bark in every direction. Meanwhile, some two hundred men of the Second Kentucky had worked their way behind trees and rocks along the road below, and were soon busy returning the fire of the rebel sharpshooters; and so general did it soon become that each side of the river seemed one vast sheet of flame. For hours was this exciting scene kept up, each side seeming loth to give up; our men were worked down, but still stuck to their guns; finally, the fire on the rebel side slackened, our gunners stopped a few moments to breathe and wipe the perspiration from their powder-be-grimed visages, and then reopened with renewed vigor. Soon the rebel guns ceased entirely, the smoke cleared away, and we discovered that night had drawn her sable curtain round the scene, and gladly did we relinquish the contest. From nine o'clock in the morning until seven at night had the battle raged without intermission, and all who were engaged in it were ready to drop with exhaustion. Supper was unthought of in camp that night; the gunners dropped down alongside of their pieces, and were soon unconscious of all around; none but those who commanded, but what sought repose and tried to shut out the events of the day.

At midnight, Col. Sedgewick was summoned by General Rosecrans, and ordered to select about three hundred of his best shots, and, before daylight, post them along the river road, to engage those of the rebels posted on the opposite side. Long before daylight, that selected band moved stealthily out of camp, and, under the colonel's directions, were soon well disposed of behind trees, rocks, and logs, from the camp down to Gauley Bridge. Arriving here, he left his horse, and pulled across the river in a skiff, the rebel battery having stopped the ferry, and, after delivering his despatches to Gen. Cox, who was then stationed on the lower side of the river, he returned, and, mounting his horse, started toward camp. By this time it was broad daylight, and he had not gone one hundred yards before he was greeted with a volley of rebel bullets. He was in a trying position. To retreat was impossible—to go forward was almost certain death. The rebel riflemen lined the opposite shore. He was the only person visible on the road, and was mounted on his large gray horse, an easy mark. When he became aware that he was the only person shot at, he paused for a moment, not more than ten yards from the rock where I was posted. I saw him set his lips firmly together, dash his spurs into his horse, and in a second he had dashed past. The next moment a shower of balls splattered against the rocks which he had just passed. Thus he ran the gauntlet for three miles to the camp, and, out of more than a hundred shots fired at him, but one struck him, that on the knee, cutting a furrow through the skin. During the entire day the firing was kept up incessantly from the infantry, but the rebel artillery was all concentrated at a point commanding the ferry. Here the shell and shot from their battery fell thick and fast. The boat was sunk by a shot from their rifled cannon, and the shell from their howitzers compelled the Eleventh Ohio regiment to evacuate their camp. About two o'clock P. M. Capt. Simmons, of our artillery, succeeded in getting one of his rifle guns in position on a hill below the bridge, and was soon exchanging shot for shot with them, but they still kept up a continual firing, our shots seeming to take no effect upon their battery, until night again closed upon the scene. The carpenters then set to work and soon completed another boat; this was kept running all night, crossing wagons with supplies for the army above us, who had well-nigh run dry.

At daylight the next morning hostilities again commenced on the same plan. At twelve o'clock news came to camp that they had killed one of the Second Kentucky and wounded another. An ambulance was immediately sent to the spot to bring them off, but the rebels fired upon it, one ball striking the horse, who ran off, throwing the driver out, and smashing the ambulance to pieces. When this intelligence reached head-quarters, Surgeons Wirts and White, with another ambulance, upon which they hoisted a red hospital flag, proceeded to the place for the two unfortunate men. No sooner had they made their appearance, however, than the rebels opened a heavy fire upon the party. Dr. Wirts waved the red flag, but they disregarded it and kept up the firing. They finally succeeded in bearing off the wounded man, who proved to be a member of Company I, from Ohio; but so hot was the fire that they were compelled to leave the dead one until night. Upon their return, the flag was found to be full of bullet holes. I had heard that the rebels had in other cases fired upon the hospital flag, but could not believe that they were so recreant and degraded; but now I know it, have had the proof positive, and am sorry to know that I am engaged in warfare against a people so completely depraved as to have no respect for the cries of the wounded and dying.

On Wednesday we were all gratified by the arrival of a battery of six "Parrott" rifled cannon, ten-pounders, and that night a company of the First Kentucky regiment, under Lieutenant Dryden, of Jeffersonville, pulled two of them up the steep mountain side to an elevation commanding the hills on the other side. The next morning the rebels opened out early. In a few minutes after their first shot, Capt. Simmons sighted one of the "Parrotts" and let drive at them. The rebel cannon stopped for a moment, as if in surprise at the effect of our shot, then fired again. Simmons let them have it again from both the ten-pounders, when, in the emphatic language of the poet, they "skadad-eld," or, in other words, left; at least, no more was heard of them, and up to this time none of them have showed themselves on the hills. They had learned to treat our howitzers and six-pounders with indifference, but the Parrott gun carries a ten-pound shot five miles; that was too much for them, and they retired after a siege of seven days, during which we lost three men only, but had any number of narrow escapes. Their loss we do not know, but believe it large, as a number of bodies were seen carried off. The ferry is now making regular trips, and communication is uninterrupted.

The troops in Western Virginia are now situated as follows: the First and Second Kentucky and Eleventh Ohio regiments constitute General Cox's brigade, the First Kentucky under Lieut.-Col. Enyart and the Eleventh Ohio under Col. DeVilliers, (who was captured with Col. Woodruff and has since made his escape,) occupy the ground around Gauley Bridge; the Second Kentucky, under Col. Sedgewick, with a cavalry company and one piece of artillery attached, are the body guard of General Rosecrans, and are encamped with him at Tompkins Farm. General Schenck's brigade is eight miles above; Col. McCook's, consisting of three German regiments, is five miles above;

General Benham's brigade is at Cannelton, seven miles below Gauley Bridge, and Col. Tyler, with the Seventh Ohio and Second Virginia regiments, has possession of Charleston, thirty-eight miles below, the whole under Gen. Rosecrans.

The paymaster paid off our regiment yesterday, and everybody seems to be happy, and everybody wants leave to go home. Furloughs and leaves of absence are in demand; our little colonel is obliging as many as possible, and ere many days Louisville will be full of blue-coated Second Kentuckians, with pockets full of money and mouths full of daring deeds and miraculous escapes. They deserve a hearty welcome at your hands, for no troops ever upheld the honor of a State more nobly, under as many difficulties, as the "bloody Second" has that of our own gallant State. Adjutant Welhedel has just left for home, and ere many days, unless we have a big fight, you may see,

Yours truly, KENTUCKIAN.

COL. SEDGEWICK'S LETTER.

HEAD-QUARTERS SECOND KY. REGIMENT, U. S. A., }
CAMP AT TOMPKINS FARM, WESTERN VA., }
Nov. 4, 1861. }

The health of the regiment is very excellent, and we now number more men for duty than any regiment in Virginia, (eight hundred and eighty-four men,) although we have followed and fought the rebels since July last, from Guyandotte to Big Sewell Mountain, and back to this place.

The rebels have been gathering for some time past on the opposite side of the river, and during the last three days a constant and terrific fire of artillery and musketry has been kept up on both sides. On yesterday they succeeded in killing a private of the Thirteenth Ohio Volunteer regiment, and private Hyer of Company D (Woodward Guards) of our regiment. The two men lay where they fell for some time—the fire from the rebel side being so hot that it was almost impossible to bring them off. During the day, Doctors Wirts and White, with an ambulance, upon which they hoisted a red hospital flag, proceeded to the spot to bring them off. They no sooner showed themselves than they were greeted with a shower of bullets. They waved the flag, but still the fire was kept up. They finally succeeded in bringing off private Hyer, but were compelled to leave the body of the dead soldier until after dark, when a party of my men brought him from the spot.

I have heard of the enemy firing on our hospitals and upon red flags, but did not believe they were so depraved. I have now witnessed it—can testify to it—and consequently know what kind of enemies we have to deal with, and shall govern myself and command accordingly.

With many thanks for your kindness, I am, with much respect, yours, &c.,

T. SEDGEWICK,
Commanding Second Kentucky Regiment, U. S. A.

CINCINNATI "COMMERCIAL" ACCOUNT.

CAMP AT TOMPKINS FARM, VA., }
SECOND KENTUCKY REGIMENT, Saturday, }
Nov. 2, 1861. }

Since I last wrote to you, every thing has passed off quietly here until yesterday, although the secesh have been in sight of us for the last four or five days, on the opposite side of the river. They have now a force, as near as we can ascertain, of from fourteen to fifteen thousand, and six or eight four and six-pounders.

Yesterday morning they opened the fire on our trains from the opposite side, and kept up a constant fire from rifles and musketry. I was the first one they opened out on in the morning. Whilst I was going down the road to visit the pickets, I run the gauntlet for over a mile down to the bridge, and they came pretty close to me several times. When I returned they opened out again worse than ever, and I escaped them all. I have a good horse, who soon landed me safe out of their reach, and I took the news to camp, which soon stopped all wagon trains passing down, although some had started down the hill and had to go at full run, some escaping very narrowly—the bullets going through the wagons. No other damage done.

The rebels succeeded in planting a four-pounder on the point of the hill commanding the ferry, when they opened out with shell and round shot; several of their shots falling short and into the river, doing no damage, only keeping our wagons from crossing. They kept up the fire until Capt. Simmons opened out with one of his six-pound rifle cannon, which soon made them quiet, and our boys, with rifles and muskets, kept up a constant firing until dark, when every thing quieted down on account of the darkness and rain. During the afternoon, Capt. McMullin got three of his mountain howitzers to work, which did some fine work. At the First Kentucky camp they had considerable firing, and, as far as I could learn, no one was hurt there. They are located on the Kanawha at the falls. Three companies of the First crossed the river below the falls, and got on top of the hill, but returned by dinner time, as they were unable to do any good from their position; but whenever any of the rebels showed themselves, they would make them hunt the bushes.

Saturday, Nov. 2

The morning opened with a dense fog, so that we could not see any distance—but taking due advantage, we got our men well posted on the road and mountain side, and passed over several of our wagons without trouble. As soon as all was clear, we found our friends on the other side had been as industrious as ourselves, for they had cut a road and placed a six-pounder on the point, and had the hills full of their riflemen, and so opened the ball. They opened out with their cannon on Gauley Bridge and the commissary and store-houses, but did not reach or hit them. One shot struck the ferry-boat, doing but little damage, but they found a formidable enemy to oppose them, in the shape of Capt. Simmons' battery, who soon made them play out. He silenced them by two o'clock, from the other side of Gauley. In the mean time about one hundred of our boys were giving them a hot time from this side, with rifles and muskets, which was kept up until about three p. m., when the rebels, finding it too hot, commenced leaving their hiding places, and it was much sport for our boys to see them running. Whenever they had a clear place to pass, the boys would help them along faster by sending despatches to them. For a long time some of our men were close enough to talk across the river to them, and many amusing remarks were exchanged. When our boys wanted to find out where they were secreted, they would ask them if they did not want salt or a drink of good old Bourbon, &c., &c., which would be responded to by "Oh, you d—d Yankees," &c., when the response would be by half-a-dozen bullets whistling among them, which our boys call telegraph despatches. This kind of warfare don't suit our boys. They want them to come out and show themselves, and many a challenge was sent to them to come out and give us a fair fight, and not be so cowardly. Toward evening we noticed their forces retreating back along the top of the mountain. We could plainly see their wagons and cavalry moving off on the double-quick, with several regiments of infantry, withdrawing toward Lewisburgh. What their intentions are we know not, but I rather think they don't like the style of the Second Kentucky's shooting. They have found out that we are as good at the bush whack as they are, and can shoot as well. This evening and afternoon all is quiet, and trains are passing without any trouble. Gen. Rosecrans thinks the Second Kentucky are some in a fight, and says he would like to see them in a clear open fight, for they would go in one side, and cut themselves through and come out the other side.

The number of their killed or wounded we do not know, but from one point on New River is a log-house, where they were seen to carry off four bodies; and from where our battery was playing on them, several were seen to fall, and were carried off. Our little Col. Sedgewick was down the road when they opened out on him. He jumped from his horse, and took a rifle from one of the men, and made one of the five rebels bite the dust. The rebel fell dead, and was carried off by his comrades, when they had a hot time getting out of sight and back to their holes. Col. S. escaped with a slight flesh wound in the leg, just below the knee. He mounted his noble charger, (by the way, one presented to him at Camp Dennison,) and the finest horse in this division.

I might wind up by saying that our men are in fine health, and look well in their winter suits, and the best of all is, the paymaster is on hand, and will pay them to-morrow. We would have been paid yesterday, but the excitement, and the road being impassable, he could not get up from Gauley, where he makes his headquarters. I imagine he thought it rather a hot place this morning. He will be welcomed in the morning. You shall hear from me again soon.

Sunday Evening, Nov. 3, 9 P. M.

P. S.—Early this morning the rebels again opened a heavy fire on our trains, and killed a private belonging to the Thirteenth Ohio, whose name we could not learn, and wounded a private belonging to Company D, of Second Kentucky, by the name of Hyer; the ball struck his leg and broke it. No other damage done; but the rebels are working hard on the Kanawha, and we now anticipate a hard fight before they are whipped out.

The Thirteenth, Twelfth, and Tenth Ohio have crossed over the Gauley, and gone down to Cannelton. Our movements are now uncertain for the present. Should we have any thing of a fight, you may depend on the lively Second Kentucky doing their duty. Every preparation on our part is in course of erection. Gen. Cox is down at Gauley, and Gen. Rosecrans is at his headquarters with us. So look out for lively times this way.

BATTLE OF PORT ROYAL, S. C.,*

FOUGHT NOVEMBER 7, 1861.

NEW YORK "WORLD" NARRATIVE.

ON BOARD THE BIENVILLE, NOV. 12.

ONE of the vessels attached to the great Southern naval expedition, and which played a most important part in the affair, was the United States steam gunboat Bienville; a steamer whose reputation for fleetness stood second to none in the service of the Government, and which, as you will perceive, held the post of honor throughout the engagement with the batteries at Hilton Head. I took passage on the Bienville, which left on the 23d, having in tow the Brandywine, which Capt. Steedman had orders to proceed with to Fortress Monroe. He arrived at the latter point at nine o'clock on the morning of the 29th, and met the fleet just on the point of coming out en route for its intended destination, which at that time was unknown to any one on board our ship. As I stood on the quarterdeck of the Bienville and sighted the noble vessels as they gallantly rode out one after another, I felt an enthusiasm, a faith in the might and power of the Government to vindicate itself, and to perpetuate those institutions that have made us one of the foremost nations of the earth, such as I never before experienced. The day broke most beautifully, proving to be one of the finest of the season—a happy omen of that success that has far exceeded our most sanguine expectations. The day of sailing had so long been delayed that it seemed as if one could feel the sensation of relief experienced by the thirty thousand brave hearts who were anxious to meet the enemy on the soil of his much vaunted chivalry, and who could hardly repress their joy at being fairly in motion.

The vessels came out in regular order, the Wabash acting as flag-ship, and taking the lead, and the others following in the positions assigned them.

Having received our orders to join the fleet, we did so, having the Brandywine still in tow, and taking up a position in the rear of the main column. Late on Wednesday afternoon we encountered a severe gale off Cape Hatteras, which at one time threatened to do serious damage to the flag-ship of the fleet. The thorough sea-going qualities of the Bienville enabled her to ride the gale out safely, but Capt. Steedman deemed it his duty to lay to during the early part of the ensuing day, lest some vessel of the fleet might have been disabled and need assistance. Thursday proved to be another beautiful day. The gale subsided as the sun arose, and about noon we proceeded again on our voyage.

The second gale which we encountered, and the effects of which were experienced along the whole line of the southern coast, was one of the most terrific character. I had never before had an opportunity of witnessing a grand storm at sea. I have often been out in what is termed rough weather, but I never witnessed any thing so thoroughly terrific as was this storm, in which we supposed the larger portion of the fleet would be wrecked or so disabled as to render it inefficient for the accomplishment of its mission. The increase of the gale was gradual from four o'clock Friday morning until midnight, at which time it was at its height. One moment we were on the top of a wave, and could distinguish the position of the vessels in the fleet by the multitude of signal lights that were swung in the rigging, and the next instant we were down in the trough of the sea, with the avalanche of waters rearing its giant walls each side of our noble craft, and threatening to engulf us in its folds. To add to our consternation, the rain poured down in torrents as the night closed in, and the darkness became intense, being relieved only by the lightning that broke in sheets of flame from the heavens, almost blinding our eyes and rendering the darkness more intense. Sailing-Master Smith, of the Bienville, says that in a thirty-five years' experience he never encountered so terrific a storm as this. The storm would not have caused so great anxiety had we been alone on the water; but conscious as we were that fifty other steamers and transports, freighted with thousands of precious lives, were all about us, and that we were liable at any moment to come into collision with some one of them, filled our hearts with fear, and made the stoutest among us quail. We could not reconcile ourselves to believe that an enterprise in which the hopes of the country were centred, and which was to render such signal service in the holiest of causes, could be permitted to be destroyed by the fury of the conflicting elements; but we could do no more than make all snug on board, and patiently await the issue. On Saturday night the gale had in a great degree subsided, and we were gratified to learn that the majority of the vessels composing the expedition had rode it out better than could have been expected.

No vessel in the fleet suffered more or was in greater jeopardy than the transport Winfield Scott, from the storm. Heavily loaded, and not calculated to weather safely the fierceness of such a gale, her position was eminently critical. From the deck of the Bienville it was easy to see the activity of the men in tossing overboard their tents and muskets, and every thing that was of movable character, to lighten the vessel. She had on board a portion of the Thirtieth Pennsylvania regiment, altogether four hundred and fifty soldiers. At length a signal was given to our ship to heave to and save her, the signal indicating that she was leaking, and likely, at any moment, to sink. Promptly did our commandant respond to the appeal for aid.

As stated above, the storm was at its most furious height. The waves rolled mountain-high. It did not seem that any small boat could live an instant in such a sea. "Who will volunteer to save the Winfield Scott?" asked Captain Steedman. "I, I," shouted a score of voices.

Three small boats were at once lowered, and quickly in them some thirty brave men of our crew, willing to risk their lives to save the endangered crew of the leaking ship. Two of these boats were swamped, and also one of the Winfield Scott's small boats. The scene was one of intense excitement. From the Bienville hawsers were thrown out, and no lives, fortunately, were lost. Our steamer at one time came so near the Winfield Scott that the cat-head of the latter ran into our quarter. Taking advantage of the proximity, some fifty soldiers leaped upon the Bienville. A few were not successful, the leap being one to death. Three were crushed in the collision, and their lifeless bodies fell into the engulfing waves below. The jump for life, the crash, and wild shriek and splash in the water of the inanimate forms of the killed, were the work of a moment. The whole was a scene of tragic interest, and one that will never be forgotten by any who witnessed it. It was feared by the officers of the Bienville that our steamer might become seriously endangered through our proximity to the Winfield Scott. Finally, with good fortune, the leakage of the transport was stopped through throwing overboard tents and guns. The storm began to abate, and our steamer was enabled to withdraw from her side.

I learned from the soldiers who jumped on the Bienville, that the most intense panic prevailed on the Winfield Scott. It was in the height of this panic that the men wildly flung their muskets and tents into the sea. The leak was between the wood and iron work, and above the watermark, and on the vessel being lightened, of course a stop was put to the flowing in of water. Meantime the men were separated in divisions, and detailed to work the pumps. They worked nearly thirty-six hours unfalteringly and without complaint. All believed that the worst was over on which depended their lives, and, impressed with this belief, they labored forgetful of food or sleep. One of my informants, soldier though he now is, stated that he had followed the sea for ten years, and during this time he had been shipwrecked three times. He never saw such a storm, and he hoped never to see such another.

We arrived at Port Royal on Sunday evening, Nov. 3d, being some twelve hours in advance of the fleet, the advance ships of which did not have in sight until the following morning. On the arrival of the Wabash, Commodore Dupont ordered us to leave the Brandywine and run down to Savannah in search of the frigate Sabine, which we had orders to tow up. Being unable to find her, however, we returned, but were again ordered back to cruise for her during the ensuing night. On our return, we ascertained that we were to be the advance ship of the starboard column in the engagement, which would give us the post of honor.

During our absence in search of the Sabine, the steamers Vixen and Mercury, supported by three of the new gunboats, had advanced up the harbor for the purpose of buoying out the channel, and marking the line of position and advance of the respective columns. This was accomplished with the most complete success, and proved one of the most admirable of the many well-laid plans that tended to our ultimate success. The points had been well ascertained, and the major part of the soundings taken before the rebel batteries opened fire, which they did on one of the gunboats during the afternoon.

By Tuesday afternoon every thing had been put in readiness, and the fleet fully prepared for action. It was about 4 o'clock, however, before the Wabash signaled the advance, and it was then so late that it was deemed advisable to defer the attack until the following day. Wednesday morning opened with heavy weather, and the attack was again deferred until it should subside. Meantime, the enemy were very busy on shore preparing to give us the warmest of welcomes, and exulting over the opportunity they were about to have to sink our vessels as soon as we came within range.

On board the Bienville every thing was made in readiness. Shot and shell were brought up from below, the magazines were opened, and the bulls' eyes lit; the gunners took their positions beside the cast-iron peacemakers, and waited to obey with alacrity the order, "Cock your lock, blow your match, stand by, ready—"

The surgeon and his assistants were busy in the cockpit spreading out their finely tempered instruments, opening packages of lint, and taking those precautions so necessary, and yet that augur such fearful things to come. From our gallant commander, Steedman—himself a South Carolinian by birth, but a thorough Union man for all that—down to the powder-boys who stood in their bare feet, and with shirt sleeves rolled up ready for their work, every heart beat high, and waited with anxiety for the moment of action, which was hourly expected to be signaled from the flag-ship.

On Thursday morning, at 9 o'clock, the flag-ship Wabash signaled to form in the order of battle. The flag-ship led the main column, and the Bienville led the starboard column, having her position on the Susquehanna's starboard quarter and maintaining it during the entire action. They were drawn up in the following order:

Main column.	Starboard column.
Wabash,	Bienville,
Susquehann	Seneca,
Mohican,	Curlew,
Seminole,	Penguin,
Pawnee,	Ottawa,
Unadilla,	Vandalia.
Pembina.

The arrangement of the ships was a work of speedy accomplishment. They presented a noble and magnificent spectacle. It was apparent to all that the great mission upon which we had been sent, was now about to be undertaken in hearty earnest. Every heart beat high with hope, though most well knew that the forts and batteries of the enemy about to be attacked, had been erected under the guidance of enlarged military experience and practical skill, and that behind those distant ramparts, now so obscurely visible, were men whose numbers were as yet unknown, and who, it was confidently supposed, would defend the soil—especially that of South Carolina, the State that had taken the lead in the rebellion—with desperate and unyielding courage, and if need be, their life's blood. Meantime the transports lay outside, awaiting proper opportunity to land their troops.

The ships made the entrance of the Port Royal channel. At the point between the forts, it is twenty-five hundred yards wide. As the fleet moved up, the rebel batteries on both sides of the river opened fire on the head of the column, with heavy guns of long range.

At ten minutes past ten, the Wabash fired simultaneously on both Forts Walker and Beauregard, sending a broadside at each. Each volley fell in front of the batteries, and ploughed up the sand furiously.

The whole fleet immediately joined in the engagement, and broadside after broadside was fired in quick succession. In five minutes the action became general along the whole line. The scene was one terribly grand and exciting. No words can describe it. So many ships and gunboats were never before employed in a naval engagement on this continent. The simultaneous booming of the broadsides, the quick flashing of the belching fires, the dense curling of the masses of smoke, accompanied by the whizzing of the enemy's balls over our heads, their splashing on the water, and their destructive tearing of our masts and sides, gave an impress of danger, and the vastness of the engagement almost impossible to realize, much less to adequately detail. Meantime, amid the roar of the cannon could be heard the loud voices of command, and as the smoke rolled upward on the deck of each gunboat, could be seen the men arranging and sighting their guns, and everywhere the most courageous and exciting activity. Of course eager eyes looked toward the forts and batteries of the enemy. It was known that our firing must be producing terrible effect. Looking through the marine glasses, it was easy to discern the havoc of our terrific cannonading. We saw guns dismounted, and huge clouds of sand swept up by our shells as they struck.

As our vessels were moving about in a circuit, so as alternately to come within shot range of the opposing forts on either side, three rebel steamers appeared in sight up the stream. These steamers, as afterward proved, were part of a squadron, numbering eight vessels, under command of Commodore Tatnall, formerly of the United States Navy. A few well-directed shots from some of our ships, convinced them that it was better to head their prows in an opposite direction, which they proceeded, in inglorious haste, to do. It was not long before the dim outline of their retreating forms faded from our view.

I may as well state in this connection, as pertinent to the subject, that a letter was subsequently discovered at Hilton Head, from Commodore Tatnall to the garrison officers, declaring in very decisive and valorous terms, that he would defend them to the last, or perish in the attempt.

The plan of the naval attack was arranged with great skill. Three circuits of the channel were taken. At each circuit, a broadside was opened upon the fort opposite. In this way the whole force of the fleet was brought to bear upon the enemy with irresistible effect. Each firing met with a prompt response. After the first circuit, the small gunboats took their positions at discretion, choosing any point of attack which might appear to them more effective. A number of them congregated in a cove, some distance up the inlet, and commanding a range of the rear of the forts. As the rear of the forts were comparatively unprotected, an attack in this direction would have a most destructive effect upon the two garrisons.

The second circuit was only performed by the Wabash, Susquehanna, and Bienville. The Bienville occupying the head of the starboard column, was necessarily nearer each of the forts than either of the other ships.

Capt. Smith, of the Bienville, as stated elsewhere, is a South Carolinian, and so is Capt. Drayton, of the Pocahontas. In the movements of the cannonading fleet, the two vessels came side by side, the two captains standing on the wheelhouses, facing one another.

"Three cheers for South Carolina!" shouted Capt. Smith, swinging his hat over his head with enthusiasm.

"Three cheers for South Carolina and the American flag!" responded Capt. Drayton in a voice equally stentorian, and with a circuitous movement of his hat equally enthusiastic.

At one time, when the Bienville was within short range of Fort Walker, the whole fire of the fort was concentrated upon her, and she was struck in several places. One shot passed through the ship just forward of the foremast between the upper decks, and through the water line. Another struck one of the forward boat davits; the third hit the funnel, and the fourth cut a shroud off. The most destructive shot was one that, after striking the water, glanced and hit the forward division under the bulwarks, and, passing through a beam a foot and a half thick, killed two men, and wounded two others. The men were employed at one of the guns. After the third circuit an officer on board the Bienville, through his glass, discovered two men riding toward Fort Walker in great haste, and it was conjectured that they bore important despatches. At three o'clock in the afternoon the flag-ship hoisted the signal to cease firing. Previously there had been a lull in the engagement for about half an hour, during which the men had been served with lunch so as to have them in proper condition for further hard work. After this a few shots were fired, and as there was no response from the crews, preparations were made to send a boat to the shore with a flag of truce.

Captain Rogers, from on board the flag-ship Wabash, lowered a cutter, and proceeded cautiously, carrying a white flag to Fort Walker or Hilton Head. He found nobody there to receive him or the flag of truce, as the rebels had entirely deserted their forts.

Now comes the most exciting event of the engagement—the raising aloft of the Stars and Stripes on the ramparts of Fort Walker. Our men were now on South Carolina soil, and over their heads proudly waved the American flag, whose folds have not floated on the breeze in the Palmetto State since the fall of Fort Sumter. The cheers that arose on the hoisting of this flag were deafening. The stentorian ringing of human voices would have drowned the roar of artillery. The cheer was taken up man by man, ship by ship, regiment by regiment. Such a spontaneous outburst of soldierly enthusiasm never greeted the ears of Napoleon amid the victories at Marengo, Austerlitz, or the pyramids of the Nile. The next morning Fort Beauregard, on Bay Point, was also occupied, and several gunboats were sent up to Beaufort, and the town was found deserted.

From one of the wounded rebels taken prisoner at Fort Walker, I gather some interesting details of the conduct of the men during the engagement. It was confidently asserted that no vessel could possibly pass the batteries, and the General in command had promised his men that every ship should be sunk as it came up; and it is certainly wonderful that we escaped with so little damage. The rebel batteries were served with the greatest activity. The great fault was in their firing too high. An incessant shower of shot and shell rained over us, but with little or no effect. The wounded rebel says that, on the first circuit round, the General told them that a number of the vessels must have been sunk, but seeing them emerge from the clouds of smoke and pass on, he concluded they had been disabled and were drawing off. The men thought the victory was theirs. Refreshments were served and cheers given for the Southern Confederacy. Their consternation at seeing the Wabash again wind the column and approach them was great; but they sprung to the guns and fought with desperation. Again they congratulated themselves the vessels had drawn off disabled; but on seeing the Wabash, the Bienville, and the Susquehanna, rounding up in gallant style for the third time, apparently unharmed, the panic was complete, and they broke and fled in utter dismay.

THE FORTS AND SURROUNDINGS AFTER THE BATTLE.

On landing, the forts were found to be utterly deserted, and every thing gave proof of the headlong and utter confusion and haste with which the rebels had vacated their hard-fought positions. As specimens of military skill, both Forts Walker and Beauregard are considered by old army officers as the most skilful and formidable earthworks that they have ever seen. Fort Walker, on Hilton Head, is much the heaviest, being a gigantic mass of earthworks thrown up in angular walls, the corners being protected by strong redoubts. In front of the walls was a deep trench, about ten or twelve feet in width, likewise protected by an admirable chereaux de frise of thick posts, six or eight feet high, firmly set in the ground, about four inches apart, pointing outward from the fort, and sharpened at the end. With this encircling wall of sharp stakes guarding a deep trench, which in turn was covered by the twenty-six monster guns and columbiads of the fort, it was doubtless impregnable to the assaults of any land force of infantry. Both forts had probably been erected for at least nine or ten months, as the soil, where not rent by our terrific fire, was firm and well settled, and clothed in a luxuriant mantle of grass. The country around is one of much beauty and fertility—rising from the sea gently, the coast sloping off far into the ocean, making a long shallow spread of water. A beautiful cotton-field was near by, the bolls already burst and the long white cotton hanging from them in the greatest profusion. A Northerner, unaccustomed to the sight of a field of ripe cotton, the scene presented me was one of unrivalled magnificence and novelty. It seemed as if a living mantle of snow rested upon a square of beautiful country, and undulated like the yellow grain in the gentle winds. I passed also over a fine patch of sweet potatoes, which bore good evidence of having grown thrifty and well by the fertile sweat of slaves. The ground in every direction was ploughed into furrows and ridges by our shells and balls. The earthworks were honey-combed and torn into unsightly heaps, trees shattered in every direction, and long lanes cut through the pure white field of cotton. The forts, now deserted except by the ghastly bodies of the dead, bore witness to the terrific effect of our fire, the long and unavailing defence maintained by the rebels, and the rapidity with which they had quitted the works and fled when we came, fresh and determined as ever, to the third, and, as it proved, the final engagement. At Fort Walker only three guns were found dismounted. The rest remained in their places well aimed, and had been well served. They were of immense size, carrying from one hundred and fifty to one hundred and eighty pound balls, and rifled. Some of them were of old English manufacture, and others were probably cast at Richmond. These were of rough exterior, but proved to be equal in utility to the others. They were already loaded when we found them, and not one spiked—a fact which evidenced the terror created by our final broadside.

The rebel Tatnall, who had lauded from his musquito fleet, and who had assured his subordinates that their position could not be taken, was among the garrison of one thousand three hundred when they precipitately fled from their forts and ran helter-skelter over the South Carolina soil back to the woods in the rear. He doubtless thought that, whether or not "blood is thicker than water," it is a bad thing to lose. The exodean flight from Hilton Head has not been equalled by any thing in the history of the war; and although in truth the rebels fought well and desperately until the last moment, yet their running bears off the palm. And as the terrified horde fled, the balls and shells from the fleet continually screamed around and above and among them like very devils on the wing, and made many a panic-stricken fugitive to bite the dust. The whole of the ground passed over was scattered with fragments of shell, and torn and mangled corpses. Some with the head half torn off, some with entrails spreading for yards around them, some with mangled legs and arms, and with faces distorted with pain and horror. Some lay prone on the ground, with backs toward the enemy, and others struck dead while in peculiar postures, as if calling and motioning to others. For two miles back in the woods dead bodies were found of those killed by our shells. All the rebel wounded were taken off, but the dead remained. In a massive bomb-proof in Fort Walker was found the dead body of a Surgeon Borst, formerly of the United States army. He had doubtless retired to this place for safety, and it indeed seemed secure, formed as it was of massive walls and strengthened by great beams of wood. A large shell had whizzed into the small room through the small diagonal aperture, and struck a heavy piece of timber, tearing away the supports and tumbling down the walls about his head. A splinter from the fractured beam struck him upon the head, killing him instantly, just as he had thrown up his hands to shelter himself from the falling walls. His watch was still keeping correct time in his pocket, when a Federal soldier pointed out the fearful tableaux of death. Fort Beauregard, on Bay Point, had been silenced previously, and with less severe fighting.

It had sixteen guns of large calibre, garrisoned by five hundred men, who were soon convinced that the "damned Yankees," as the negroes reported them to call us, were more than their match. They ran in confusion, but one bold fellow returned to the largest gun in the fort and discharged it at us. The enormous rifle ball flew with a tremendous scream over the deck of the Bienville and struck the after-part of the Augusta, without, however, killing any one. That shot was its last, for as it left the piece the gun burst, killing the man who fired it, and scattering missiles all around. It was a magnificent cannon, and could not have weighed less than one thousand six hundred pounds.

In the forts and in plantation residences around, were found a mass of documents, letters of all descriptions, and officials papers. A telegram was found, sent by Jeff. Davis to General Drayton, stating that from reliable information he had received, a fleet was about leaving New York, destined for Port Royal. This was dated about the first of the month. The officers of Fort Walker had established their head-quarters at a rich old plantation mansion, not far from the fort, on an estate belonging to a family by the name of Pope. Here was a splendid library, a mass of papers and documents, and a file of the Charleston Mercury, for the last thirty or forty years. One was seen dated as far back as 1812. The order of battle for the day was found, giving directions for the mode of repelling a Federal attack. It appeared that they had been in constant expectation of our attack ever since the Bienville first appeared off the harbor, on Monday, and had been busily preparing for us. A large quantity of love letters were discovered, from the Flora McFierys and Amazons of Georgia and South Carolina, to various officers and men stationed at the fort. One was from a Georgia lady to her husband, telling him to remember that they had been married but six months, that he promised her not to go as a soldier, and that somehow or other he must get away as soon as possible. There was something ambiguously added about longing for his embraces, and if he has continued running at the rate with which the Georgians and South Carolinians started, he doubtless enjoys them by this time.

It was evident that the garrisoned rebels had large reinforcements close at hand, awaiting an opportunity to come to their aid should their services be required. Those reinforcements were kept in the background, to keep our forces ignorant of their strength, and draw us, as was believed, to destruction. The result showed that they calculated without their host. Our cannons produced a most devastating effect upon their crowded columns, who were hid among the trees, killing them right and left, and putting them to rapid flight. All about the woods for two miles the bodies of the killed soldiers were to be found, and manifold indications of a hasty retreat. These reinforcements were stated at ten thousand men.

I should have stated, in a former part of this letter, the attempt of the rebels to destroy their forts and the capturing party by blowing up their magazines. At Fort Walker a fuze was lighted and attached to the magazine, but it was discovered in time and extinguished. At Fort Beauregard a pistol was arranged to be fired by the opening of a door, and when the Federal party landed it exploded the magazine—killing, however, only two men, and blowing up the rickety old house in which it had been deposited. Their intention was thwarted as much by their own haste to get away as by the carelessness of our men, as the thing was very bunglingly arranged.

As soon as the negro slaves observed us coming on shore they flocked along the banks in great numbers, some bearing parcels and bundles as if expecting us to take them at once to a home of freedom. Every variety of negro and slave was represented. I say negro and slave, for it is a melancholy fact that some slaves are apparently as white as their masters, and as intelligent. Darkies of genuine Congo physiques, and darkies of the genuine Uncle Tom pattern, darkies young and jubilant, darkies middle-aged, and eager, and gray-haired, solemn-looking fellows. Some appeared mystified, and some intelligent. The quadrone and the octone, possessing an undistinguishable tint of negro blood mingled, one drop with seven of Southern nativity and ancient family, formed, to speak mildly, an interesting scene.

As fast as the contraband article came within reach, it was placed in the guard-house, an old frame building behind Fort Walker. Here quite a collection was made. They were huddling together, half in fear and half in hope, when a naval officer of the Bienville looked in upon them asking, "Well, well, what are you all about?"

"Dat's jest what we'd like to find out, mas'r," was the response.

The officer assured them that they would be kindly taken care of and perhaps found something to do, and need not be alarmed.

"Thank God for dat, mas'r," was the reply. On drawing them into conversation, they said that they caught a great deal of fish in Port Royal harbor, fishing at night, after the plantation work was over. Two slaves were found reconnoitring about on their own account, and on being brought into camp, explained that they belonged to Mrs. Pinckney, of Charleston, and came down to "see what de white people were all about." They said that the white people all ran away when the ships came up, crying, "Great God! Great God! Great God! the Yankees are coming; fire the boats." Other slaves reported that "when the white folks see the little boats coming up, dey luffed at dem, but when dey see de big checker-sided vessels comin', they luffed on de oder side der moufs."

The number of slaves will probably increase each day, and the importance of their aid must be great.

Soon after landing, a detachment of men proceeded up to Beaufort, and found it tenantless except by one dilapidated person, who presented some traces of cultivation, and of having been an original South Carolina gentleman, but he appeared to be either paralyzed by drunkenness or fear, and it probably was not the latter. He met the Federal troops on the outskirts of the city, and with hat in hand, and gently swaying from side to side, hiccupped out a few undistinguishable words as they passed in. The remnant of secesh chivalry excited only the risibles of our men as they raised, with many cheers, the Stars and Stripes over Beaufort.

As I close my long and hasty letter, troops are being landed from the transports to occupy and repair the forts and positions gained by their bravery and valor. They are encamping in a sweet-potato field, the edibles of which they will soon, doubtless, exhibit a fondness for. General Sherman's head-quarters are at the mansion-house lately occupied by the officers of Fort Walker as theirs. Over its roof the Stars and Stripes of the Union now wave, and our victorious troops gaze on it with full, gushing hearts, and songs of exultant triumph.

JOURNAL OF THE VANDERBILT.

ON BOARD STEAMER VANDERBILT, }
TUESDAY, October 29. }

At half-past four this morning the signal gun for getting under way was fired from the U. S. steam-frigate Wabash, Commodore Dupont commanding.

At five there was a general weighing of anchors, and the Wabash steamed out at half-past five.

As the sun rose the whole fleet was under way, the weather being delightfully clear, a light breeze from the west, and no clouds. Some delay occurred in getting the fleet in proper order, but at ten the Commodore's ship was off Cape Henry Lighthouse, the fleet following in regular order.

At two o'clock P. M. Cape Henry Lighthouse was out of sight, the fleet bearing due south. Whether beautifully clear; wind from the west; no clouds, and the sea but slightly ruffled. The fleet, consisting of about fifty steamers and transports, all in sight, and retaining their order, according to brigades, presented a most magnificent sight. The low shore of Virginia is dimly visible at the right, and fast receding from sight.

At three o'clock P. M., two of the propellers we brought with us relieved two of the blockading squadron on this part of the Virginia coast, and the two vessels relieved are following with us.

At sunset we were off the North Carolina coast but out of sight of land.

At eight o'clock P. M. the whereabouts of the fleet could be traced by the lamps in the rigging, the horizon all around being dotted with lights, bearing steadily south, and weather unchanged.

Wednesday, October 30.—A beautiful clear morning; wind from the southwest; but few clouds. The headway was but a few miles an hour all night, and the vessels have changed position considerably. The Wabash, instead of being in the lead, is in the centre, the Vanderbilt being ahead, and several vessels six to ten miles ahead. About forty vessels in sight.

Noon.—The vessels of the fleet have resumed their position of yesterday, the Wabash in the lead, off Chicamacomico Inlet.

Three o'clock P. M.—Off Cape Hatteras, but cape not in sight. Course southwest. Weather clear, wind moderate, and sea not very rough.

Six P. M.—Wind increasing and sea rough.

Thursday, October 31.—A high wind from the southwest prevailed all night. Headway slow; making but two and a quarter miles an hour. The wind has now fallen considerably, and has changed to the west.

Noon.—In the Gulf stream. Weather warm; sea smooth; progress slow—only forty-four miles south of Hatteras.

Six o'clock P. M.—The afternoon has been lost in lying by, waiting for the fleet to come up. The Baltic and nine other vessels have been missed, and the Atlantic sent back for them.

Friday, November 1.—The Atlantic has come back with the missing vessels. The Baltic had been aground near Hatteras. Fleet all in sight; wind high from the southeast, and considerable sea running; weather cloudy.

Six o'clock P. M.—Wind increased to a gale; sea very rough, and vessels all laboring heavily. Signalled from the Wabash to keep further off the coast. No observations for latitude today.

Ten o'clock P. M.—Wind so high that we had to cut the hawser towing the Great Republic.

Saturday, Nov. 2.—The gale eased up during the day, but is worse than ever during the night. It has scattered the fleet in all directions, and not a vessel is in sight except the Great Republic. We are now steering west across the Gulf stream, having run out east during the night. Sea rough, and soldiers suffering severely from sea-sickness.

Three p. m.—Still heading west; dead wind ahead. By observation at noon we are about sixty miles from the North Carolina coast, and making for land. As we have been running west all day, we must have been out to sea pretty far. Seven of the fleet are now in sight, and others expected to appear at intervals. Sea continues rough.

Six p. m.—The storm having scattered the fleet, the sealed sailing orders were opened to-day, and it was found we were ordered to land at Port Royal, near Savannah. We have been running southwest since three o'clock. The wind has fallen, and the sea is much smoother.

Sunday, Nov. 3.—The storm is over, and the weather to-day is again warm, and the sea smooth. We ran slowly all night southwestward, and since daylight have been running rapidly. Steamer Illinois, with one of her smoke-stacks carried away, is to the larboard; the Atlantic and Daniel Webster to the starboard.

Nine o'clock a. m.—Seven vessels in sight ahead.

Eleven o'clock a. m.—Have reached rendezvous, and are now lying by South Carolina coast, dimly seen to the starboard. Eleven of the fleet in sight. Weather delightful. Waiting for the fleet to come up. No sign yet of the Wabash.

Six o'clock p. m.—Fourteen of the fleet around us. Still lying to. No tidings of the Wabash. The Winfield Scott has just come up, nearly wrecked in the gale of Friday night; she had to cut her masts away, and her bow is badly stove in; she was compelled to throw over her three rifled-cannon, all her freight, the muskets and equipments of her five hundred men; every thing but rations for her troops, to keep her from going to pieces. At midnight of that night she had five feet of water in her hold, and but for the labors of the soldiers in baling out, her fires must have been extinguished, and nothing then could have saved her. During the night the gunboat Bienville came to her relief; and as soon as she came alongside the chief-engineer of the Scott and his assistants, and thirteen of the crew, jumped on board, abandoning the Scott to her fate. This came near leading to a panic among the soldiers, who gave up all for lost when they saw the crew fly; but the captain of the Scott went on board the Bienville, and, with the assistance of her officers, put the chief-engineer in irons and brought him and the runaway crew back. Things then went on better, the soldiers behaving remarkably well. Colonel Clark, of the Thirtieth Pennsylvania regiment, five hundred of whose men were on board, describes the night as a most fearful one. The gale was terribly severe; the boat was a mere shell; the terror of the men as the timbers cracked and the masts went overboard; the despair when it was announced she was leaking badly, and the panic when the crew attempted to escape—all combined to make it a night of anxiety and horror.

The Winfield Scott has just been taken in tow by the Vanderbilt, and will leave with us in the morning.

The Governor, a light-boat, seventeen years old, from Long Island Sound, with fifty marines on board, was seen during Friday night with her Union down and firing guns of distress. The Winfield Scott was bearing down to her when one of the gunboats made for her, but the captain of the Scott is unable to say whether she was relieved or not. She probably foundered. Her loss, with the wreck of the Scott, is the only injury we have heard of by the storm. All the small vessels which have come up describe the gale as terrific, creating scenes of confusion and alarm on every boat containing troops.

Monday, Nov. 4.—We are again under way, bearing nearly due west. Twenty vessels in sight, but the Wabash has not yet been seen. We are now but a short distance from Port Royal. Weather fine, and wind off-shore.

Eleven o'clock.—Off Port Royal entrance. Thirty-eight of the fleet arrived and in sight, and the Wabash and the gunboats among them. The Governor went down with twenty men on board, the Pembina taking off all who were able to escape. No word yet of the Union, R. B. Forbes, and Ericsson.

The gunboats are now feeling their way up the river, sounding and marking the channel. The only sign of the enemy so far is a little tug, which came down far enough to catch sight of the fleet, and then put back.

Four o'clock p. m.—It has been a most beautiful day, scarcely a breath of air stirring, and the water as smooth as a mirror. The gunboats are now moving up toward the river, followed by the smaller vessels of the fleet.

Half-past four p. m.—Three small vessels have just put off from shore to meet our gunboats. The Penguin, Curlew, and Unadilla are in the lead, and the Pawnee in the rear. The three rebel boats open on ours, firing three rounds, all of which fall short. The Penguin answers, then the Curlew and the Unadilla, and then the Pawnee, each feeling the way, and firing closer to the enemy at every shot. After exchanging shots for half an hour or so, none of which seemed to hit on either side, the rebel boats drew off and showed a clean pair of heels, making up Port Royal River, where two other vessels were lying, which did not come within shooting distance. It was now sundown, and by the time our gunboats, the Curlew in advance, had chased them out of sight and got abreast of the little town at the mouth of the river it was dark, and the firing ceased.

There was no firing from the land batteries, and no guns on shore were visible.

Seen from a distance, the interchange of shots presented a beautiful sight.

The calm, clear atmosphere rendered it easy to see a great distance; and as the rebel gunboats, after receiving a few shots uncomfortably near, took to their heels, there was a general cheer through the crowds in the fleet anxiously looking on.

Nine o'clock p. m.—There is a general preparation going on for landing the troops in boats to-morrow for a land assault.

Tuesday, Nov. 5.—The cannonading was resumed this morning and continued till eleven o'clock, and apparently without effect. None of the rebel shots have struck our boats, and we could see none of ours strike them. The three rebel boats came down again this morning, and opened fire spitefully but at long range—every shot falling short. Our boats, which anchored last night on the spot they had driven the rebel boats from, worked up abreast of Port Royal, answering the enemy's shots without much effect; and when opposite the town a battery of two guns on the shore opened on them, followed by two guns on the shore on the opposite side of the river's mouth. The guns opposite Port Royal were too weak to do any harm, every shot falling far short; and several shots from the foremost of our gunboats seemed to weaken their fire considerably. The guns in Port Royal had nearer work of it; but all the shots went over the fleet, doing no harm. The rebel boats kept a safe distance from the forward gunboats of our fleet, and finally sneaked off up the inlet behind the town, the firing ceasing all around about eleven o'clock, our boats maintaining their anchorage abreast of the town.

The Wabash and the other vessels-of-war have just moved up to the scene of conflict, cheered by the men in every vessel as they pass, their crews cheering lustily in return. She anchored at least three miles from shore, the water being evidently too shallow to allow her to go further. The vessels with troops are getting their boats out ready to land.

Six p. m.—The fleet has been inactive all day since the war vessels moved up. The Ericsson is aground on the bar outside, and has Hamilton's battery aboard, and the need of this battery has prevented a landing to-day.

Wednesday, Nov. 6.—The fleet has been inactive all day, but there has been a great deal of preparation going on. On shore, on both sides of the river, the enemy is very busy. Their half-dozen river steamers, all armed, have been running all day, bringing in troops and guns, and getting ready for an obstinate defence. Our fleet is anchored in the bay, just beyond the mouth of Port Royal River. There are two islands at the mouth of the river—one on the north and one on the south, opposite each other, and there are strong batteries on both. That on the south has apparently over twenty guns, and that on the north over fifteen guns. Which one the fleet will attack perplexes the enemy; but he has apparently concluded that the heaviest attack will be on the south side. The inlet behind the north island leads north to Beaufort, and that behind the south island leads south to Savannah.

Thursday, Nov. 7.—Early this morning, the fleet moved up and attacked both forts, directing its heaviest fire upon that on the south island. The batteries replied vigorously, but were badly handled, and their shot nearly all fell short. The fleet, on the contrary, poured in upon the south battery a perfect shower of iron hail. The gunboats rendered excellent service, every shot almost telling, while the Wabash, Susquehanna, Pawnee, and Vandalia poured in most effective broadsides.

About 1 o'clock p. m. a white flag was visible on shore. The firing then ceased, and the commodore's gig went ashore from the Wabash with a white flag, and found the fort abandoned. The American flag was immediately hoisted, and as it once more floated in triumph over the soil of South Carolina, it was greeted with deafening cheers by the anxiously awaiting masses on board the fleet, and all the bands, as of one accord, struck up our national airs.

Our loss was only one killed and nineteen wounded. The Seminole had four or five shots planted in her hull. The Wabash is disabled in her machinery, by balls which penetrated her hull. The dead and wounded of the enemy cannot now be ascertained. Eight dead bodies were found on landing, and two sick in the hospital. The wounded (and probably many of the dead) were carried off. Twenty guns and two howitzers were captured, and large quantities of ammunition.

The garrison was eight hundred yesterday, and reinforced by five hundred last night. A perfect panic seems to have seized them when the shot came in hotly on them. Where they are, cannot yet be ascertained. Our gunboats have gone up the southern inlet to cut off their retreat.

The northern island was abandoned by the enemy at the same time. It has a battery of some fifteen or twenty guns, which we shall take possession of in the morning.

This victory was won altogether by the fleet.

NEW YORK "TIMES" NARRATIVE.

HILTON HEAD ISLAND, S. C. }
Friday, Nov. 8, 1861. }

I shall endeavor to give a faithful narrative of the conflict, its attendant circumstances, and such other matters as may seem to be of interest.

The day itself was more beautiful, if any thing, than the finest with which we had been favored since our arrival at Port Royal. The wind, blowing gently from the northeast, scarcely caused a ripple upon the water, and the sky was only flecked here and there with a feathery cloud.

Early in the morning the rebel gunboats took up the position which they had occupied on other days at the entrance of the bay, while as many as seven rather large river steamers, coming from behind the headlands, passed backward and forward in the offing, occasionally approaching the fortifications on either side, and communicating by means of a row-boat with those on shore. Some of these vessels had brought reinforcements from Charleston, but the larger number were crowded with excursionists, from all the country round, who had come to witness the utter humiliation of the "Yankees" and the destruction of their fleet. One of the steamers is believed to have had the Consuls of England and France on board, for she displayed the flags of those nations, as well as the rebel ensign, and taking a position beyond the reach of danger, remained until the victory was won.

At 9 o'clock, the fleet was signalled from the Wabash to raise anchor, and in rather more than half an hour afterward, all the vessels were in motion. They moved slowly toward the land, cautiously feeling the way with the sounding line, arranged in two columns, of which the first was led by the flag-ship, and the second by the Bienville. The first column comprised the Wabash, Susquehanna, Mohican, Seminole, Pawnee, Unadilla, Ottawa, Pembina, and Vandalia, in tow of the Isaac Smith. The gunboats Penguin, Augusta, Curlew, Seneca, and R. B. Forbes, followed in the track of the Bienville. Sufficient space was given each vessel, in order that the fire from one column might not interfere with the operation of the other.

It was well understood that the Commodore intended to fight at close quarters, and the fact intensified the interest everybody felt in the approaching conflict. As the fleet moved majestically on toward the foe, the few minutes consumed in getting within range of the batteries seemed dreadfully long to the spectators, who watched in deep suspense for the commencement of the fight. At length, precisely at five minutes before 10 o'clock, the Bay Point battery opened its fire upon the Wabash, and that at Hilton Head followed almost within a second. The ships were then nearly midway between the hostile guns, and scarcely within range. For a minute they made no reply; but presently the Wabash began. Then grandly she poured from both her massive sides a terrible rain of metal, which fell with frightful rapidity upon either shore. The other vessels were not slow in following her example, and the battle was fairly begun.

From my point of observation, on board the Atlantic, which had been taken as close to the combatants as was consistent with safety, in order that Gen. Sherman might witness the proceedings, it was apparent that few of the shells, which at first were the only projectiles used, burst within the fortifications. The guns had too great an elevation, and their iron messengers went crashing among the tree-tops a mile or two beyond the batteries. The same was the case with the rebels, whose shot passed between the masts and above our vessels. The frigates and gunboats each having delivered their fire, which mainly in this round was directed against Bay Point, passed within the bay, indifferent alike to the bursting shells, humming projectiles, and hot round-shot which the rebels furiously discharged, breaking the water into foaming columns everywhere around them.

It was, I believe, part of the plan of battle to engage the batteries alternately, and the vessels preserving their relative positions, were to move in circles before the foe. This mode of procedure was decided upon, because the current sets swiftly in the straits between the fortifications, which are about two miles and three-quarters apart, and it was impossible, even had it been desirable, for the vessels to remain stationary long enough to silence one battery before attacking the other. Something occurred, however, to change these arrangements a little. It is true the larger vessels followed the Wabash, from first to last, in the prescribed way, and the Bienville, leading the second division, gallantly maintained the position which had been assigned to her throughout the entire action; but the gunboats, finding that they could bring a destructive enfilading fire to bear upon Hilton Head, by stationing themselves in a cove, about a mile's distance to the left of the fortification, took that position, and performed most efficient service. The Commodore, perceiving the good result of the manœuvre, permitted them to remain.

The Wabash was brought as near Hilton Head battery as the depth of water permitted; while soundings were given and signals made during the whole time the ship was in action, as regularly as upon ordinary occasions.

Within a distance of nine hundred yards from the rebel guns, the Wabash threw in her fiery messengers, while the other frigates, no further away, participated in the deadly strife; and the gunboats, from their sheltered nook, raked the ramparts frightfully. Thus the fire of about fifty guns was concentrated every moment upon the enemy, who worked heroically, never wavering in his reply, except when the Wabash was using her batteries directly in front of him. Then it was too hot for flesh and blood to endure. Shells fell almost as rapidly as hail-drops within, and for a mile and-a-half beyond the battery. As they struck and ploughed into the earth, a dense pillar of sand would shoot upward, totally obscuring the fortification, and driving the blinded gunners from their pieces.

In describing their circuit and delivering their fire, the vessels consumed rather more than an hour for each round. Little more than half of this time, however, was spent in getting into position; for gliding slowly around, perhaps entering the bay beyond the fort half a mile, just far enough to permit the safe turning of his immense ship, the commodore brought her back, and repeated from his starboard battery, until the guns became too hot to handle, that devastating fire. What is true respecting the firing of the Wabash is also true respecting the Susquehanna, Bienville, Pawnee, Mohican, and the rest. Each vessel discharged her broadside at the shortest possible range, loading and firing again and again, with all the coolness and precision exercised in target practice, before she passed the battery.

But the enemy was by no means inactive. He offered a stubborn and heroic resistance. Looking through a powerful telescope belonging to the engineer officers of the expedition, I saw, when the ships were approaching the battery the second time, two men wearing red shirts. They had been particularly active, and now sat at the muzzle of a gun, apparently exhausted, and waiting for more ammunition. This terrible fire from the fleet was falling all around them, but they moved not, and I doubted if they were alive. Finally they sprang up and loaded their piece—a shell at that instant burst near them, and they disappeared, doubtless blown into atoms. I heard frequently, during the hottest of the fight, most unqualified expressions of approval for the manner in which the rebels served their guns. That their marksmanship was good, the torn hulls and cut rigging of our vessels, rather than the number of killed on board, furnish full evidence.

After the second round had been brilliantly fought on both sides, the Wabash gave a signal to the vessels which had been most actively engaged, to cease firing and give refreshments to their men. Accordingly the steamers repaired to a point beyond reach of the batteries, and the poor sailors—nearly exhausted with their work—satisfied their hunger and gratefully accepted a few moments' repose. Then it was that the gunboats did their most efficient cannonading. Their shell and round shot flew straight across the parapet of the fortification, driving the men from their guns and making dreadful havoc. The little steam-tug Mercury, Master Commanding Martin, gallantly steamed into a shallow bay to the left of the fort, not more than half a mile distant, and presenting her diminutive figure to the rebel guns, opened upon them with her thirty-pounder Parrott, which was fired rapidly and with good effect. From her proximity to the fort, Capt. Martin was probably the first to see that the rebels were preparing to evacuate the place. In rear of the fortification, extending about three-fourths of a mile, is a broad meadow bounded by dense woods. Across this open space the enemy was carrying his dead and wounded, and wagons were hurriedly removing the equipage of the camp.

The Mercury, steaming closer to the shore, found that the battery had been deserted, and immediately took the news to the flag-ship, which, by this time, with her sister vessels, was coming up like a destroying angel to renew the conflict. The commodore almost simultaneously received confirmation of the tidings from other sources, and even while listening to the words of the messenger, the rebels struck their flag.

The signal to cease firing was at once hoisted, and it being precisely a quarter to three o'clock, the bombardment had been nearly five hours in progress.

The flag-ship lowered a boat and sent it ashore, carrying a flag of truce in the bow, and our own proud banner at the stern. Its mission was to inquire if the enemy had surrendered. Commander John Rodgers, a passenger on the Wabash, who had come down to join his vessel, the Flag, now blockading off Charleston, and had been acting during the fight as aid to Commodore Dupont, was assigned the duty of taking the flag ashore. Himself and crew were unarmed, but they found no one to receive them. He planted the American ensign upon the deserted ramparts, and took possession of the rebel soil of South Carolina in the majesty of the United States. Another and larger Star-Spangled banner was afterward displayed upon the flag-staff of a building a few rods to the left, where the rebel standard had waved during the combat, and whence it had just been taken down.

Commodore Tatnall and his gunboats disappeared in the early part of the engagement. He sent a few shots toward the fleet, but as usual his boats were not near enough to do us injury. Much regret was felt that neither of our fast steamers pursued and captured the Commodore. He would have been an interesting prisoner. Among the papers found in the secessionist garrison was one from Mr. Tatnall, in which he promised emphatically to General Drayton, who commanded the rebel forces, that his gunboats should be brought down from Savannah, and that they should share the fate of the forts. The promise was kept and the fate was shared—the latter much earlier than was necessary.

Ten thousand eager eyes beheld our flag as it was planted upon the parapet, and who shall describe the enthusiasm with which the sight was greeted? Cheer followed cheer from the men-of-war, and were echoed by the transports in the distance. Tears of joyful pride filled many an eye; hands were cordially shaken, heartfelt congratulations for the glorious victory were expressed. Some, in the exuberance of their exultation, danced wildly and clapped their hands, until it seemed doubtful whether they would ever cease their antics. Nor was the ebullition of patriotic fervor at all decreased when the regimental bands, with earnest feeling, as if by a spontaneous impulse, all struck up "The Star-Spangled Banner," the majesty of which had been so signally vindicated.

The transports had been lying during the engagement with their anchors "hove short," ready to run up to the fort with their troops at the first sign of victory. Immediately they got under way, steaming quickly along through hundreds of shell cases, which, having been emptied of their contents, were thrown overboard, and now dotted the smooth water for miles around us, telling as plainly as words of the large number of shots that had been fired. As the transports passed the ships which had participated in the glories of the day, cheer after cheer was cordially given by the soldiers in acknowledgment of the dauntless courage which had resulted in such a victory, and the enthusiasm was undiminished until long after our anchors had been dropped, a few hundred yards from shore, and the boats were being collected for the purposes of disembarkation.

The limited means for landing made the operation one of the slowest and most tedious I have ever witnessed. The surf and flat boats first went alongside the steamers containing Wright's brigade, and one regiment was put on shore before any attempt to move another was made. I must be permitted to remark, without intending to be offensive, that soldiers on ship-board are awkward enough, but pack them closely in a small boat and they seem to lose all control over their limbs, so that nothing whatever can be done with them. This characteristic intractability was not lacking on this occasion, and it seemed that each particular man took ten minutes to get himself on board after the order to enter the boat was given. Adding to the delay was the fact that the beach shelved so gradually that none of the loaded boats could approach it within fifty yards or more; and the soldiers, therefore, had to divest themselves of shoes and stockings, and flounder through water up to their knees. Leaving these unfortunate creatures with my mind filled with misgivings as to the consequences should the rebels rally to attack them in their unprepared condition, I sauntered into the fort and examined it.

It was then in charge of Lieut. Barnes, of the Wabash, who had been sent on shore with his battalion, consisting of seventy sailors and fifty marines. Sentinels were pacing upon the parapets and at the approaches to the work, and pickets were stationed about two hundred yards from the outer limits, on the flanks and at the rear. Evidences of the wild confusion—nay, the abject terror—in which the rebels had left the fort, were abundant everywhere. There were twenty-three guns in the fort, only three of which had been dismounted by our fire, and not one of the remainder had been spiked. Several, indeed, were loaded, ready for our men to defend themselves in case they should be attacked; while the magazines, of which there were three in the fort, contained ammunition enough to withstand a very long siege.

The encampment, consisting of about eighty tents, to the left of the fortifications, indicated, if any thing, more plainly than the fort, how hurriedly its late occupants had decamped. Most of the tents had been undisturbed. Officers' furniture, uniforms and other clothing, dress swords, small stores, with here and there an article which told that even in camp the warriors had not been wholly bereft of the society of their wives, mothers, and sisters—were left as significant tell-tales of a sudden departure. Over the meadow, to which I before alluded, were scattered blankets, knapsacks, (some of which, singularly enough, were recognized as those which had been cast away by our panic-stricken troops at Bull Run,) muskets, bayonets, cartridge-boxes, and a few dead mules and broken vehicles, not camp wagons, but family carriages, which had been used to carry away the dead and wounded. I was afterward told by a negro—a slave—who gave himself into custody, that the rebels, believing their position to be impregnable, and confident of sinking the ships, had invited the ladies of the neighborhood to come down and see our chastisement. Many did so, and the broken carriages in the field had conveyed them thither, but in view of the unexpected result of the fight, these vehicles were devoted to the use of the wounded.

There was plenty of testimony regarding the destructiveness of our fire—not alone from the prisoners, of whom about twenty fell into our hands, but also from the very earth itself, where numerous deep and long furrows, caused by ricocheting shells, and fragments of jagged iron, in countless quantity, told mutely and more impressively.

Eight dead bodies, some shockingly mangled, were found within the fort. One was that of a young officer, whose legs had been shot away. There was a mangled arm in one place, half-buried in the sand, and in another, near where the huge guns lay prone with their carriages shattered, were mangled pieces of flesh immersed in gore. I saw still other sickening things.

Commander Charles Steedman, of the Bienville, himself a native of Charleston, with that humanity which is ever the handmaid of bravery, assumed the task of interring the remains of those South Carolinians who had fallen. This was accomplished in as respectable a way as circumstances permitted, and the Episcopal burial service was read by the chaplain of the Wabash.

Meanwhile, as the troops landed, they scattered themselves about the encampment, apparently under no control of their officers, but possessed with the one idea of plundering the property which the rebels had left. This conduct was utterly inexcusable, as the victory had been won without their slightest aid; but, for a while, nothing but pillaging went on. The soldiers were eclipsed, however, in their disgraceful deeds by the crews and some of the officers of the transports. These last, not content with securing a slight memento of the fight, filled their boats with trunks, muskets, and other "portable property," which they placed on board their ships, and then returned for more. It was painful to witness the wanton destruction of clothing, which the ravagers trod under foot after they had obtained it from trunks that were broken open in their desire to find more valuable spoils. The free use of whiskey, which was found in abundance among the officers' stores, began to have its effects upon the men; and, finally, only after stringent measures had been resorted to, was some degree of order restored.

I learned that the tars who landed earliest obtained some splendid trophies. The most elegant was a sword, with silver scabbard and hilt; the blade, containing two golden lines of Arabic characters, denoting it to be a Damascus steel—probably an heir-loom. This, with a large Confederate flag, and the standard which Capt. Rogers planted on the parapet of the fort, beside two pretty brass field-pieces, go to Washington as presents to the Navy Department.

I went into a house—the only building in the vicinity having any architectural pretensions—and found that it had been used by the rebels for a hospital. There were three rebel soldiers there, two of whom were brothers, named Lewis and William Noble, and the other called himself James Durragh. William seemed to be very ill, almost at death's door, from the effects of typhoid fever, and Lewis, who had been nursing him, preferred to be taken prisoner rather than desert his brother. Of the other man I learned nothing. They were dressed in very dingy gray uniforms, and seemed not at all troubled at the fortune which had befallen them. The sick man said there was no medicine at the post, and he had suffered for the lack of it, adding that the surgeon told him there was nothing else to do but to trust in God. These men formerly were laborers in the turpentine woods of North Carolina, but coming down to Charleston some months ago, were impressed into the rebel service. Both admitted that they had had enough of secession. Lewis gave me some information respecting the number of troops at the post, and upon other subjects, which I have since had an opportunity of verifying.

The fortifications at Hilton Head and Bay Point were commenced as early as last July, and since that time the Ninth South Carolina Volunteers, Col. Heyward, and the Twelfth, Col. Elliott, have been stationed here. These troops were under the command of Brig.-Gen. Thos. F. Drayton, whose residence is upon Hilton Head Island, and who was present during the bombardment. This Gen. Drayton is said to be an accomplished soldier, having had the benefit of a West Point education, and a singular circumstance of the battle was the fact that his brother, Percival Drayton, commander of the United States war steamer Pocahontas, was arrayed against him. As soon as the fleet made its appearance off Port Royal Bay, Gen. Drayton sent to Charleston for reinforcements, and the day previous to the fight five hundred German artillerists, commanded by Col. Wagner, came down. Five thousand more troops, under Gen. Ripley, were expected; but for some reason they failed to appear, and the South Carolinians were forced into the fight with less than two thousand men at both their positions.

“NATIONAL INTELLIGENCER” ACCOUNT.

HILTON HEAD, PORT ROYAL ENTRANCE, S. C. }
FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1861. }

We reached this point on Monday morning last, after encountering a violent gale, (on Friday the 1st instant,) which dispersed our fleet, and caused the loss of four of the vessels composing it, viz., the Peerless, Governor, Osceola, and Union. Of these the two former were abandoned at sea, the crew of the Peerless being saved by the gunboat Mohican, the captain being the last to leave the wreck, and then astonishing his rescuers by boarding them with his trunk. The crew of the Governor and the marines embarked on it, under the command of Major Reynolds, (with the exception of about a dozen of the latter,) were likewise rescued by the frigate Sabine, of the Charleston blockading squadron. Of the Osceola nothing definite is known. The Union is reported to have gone ashore and its crew taken prisoners by the rebels.

By Wednesday most of the surviving vessels were safely anchored within the bar of the Port Royal entrance. On Tuesday morning a reconnoissance was made by Gen. Sherman, resulting in the discovery of a formidable battery at Hilton Head, on the south or left of the entrance to Broad River, and two others on the opposite or northern side of said entrance, which is about two miles in width—the one exactly on Bay Point, the other on the curve of the bay, about a mile nearer the ocean. In the vicinity of all the batteries rebel camps were plainly visible.

During the three days succeeding our arrival rebel gunboats were discovered through our glasses—some coming from the direction of Beaufort and others from Savannah—running down occasionally from Parry Island, which faces the entrance, into the outer harbor, and even stopping to send boats ashore to the batteries. After they had sufficiently roused our patriotic indignation by flaunting their rebel banners in our faces, some of our gunboats were sent up on Monday evening to disperse them. Considerable firing ensued, but it was at sufficiently long range to be, as far as we know, altogether harmless: the rebels retiring as our gunboats advanced, as if for the purpose of enticing them within the range of their batteries on Bay Point.

With this exception nothing occurred to enliven the interval of delay, during which, however, much work was quietly done in surveying and sounding the channel, collecting accessories to our naval force from the blockading squadrons off Charleston, Fernandina, and Savannah, arranging the preliminaries for an attack on the batteries from the water, and the subsequent, or possibly contemporaneous, disembarkment of the troops for the purpose of holding what the navy had acquired, or to aid in extirpating the enemy should he prove more than a match for the navy.

The impatience of the military was beginning to display itself, when a grand council of war was held on the Wabash, (the flag-ship of Com. Dupont,) at which Generals Sherman, Viele, Stevens, and Wright were present, soon after which, on Wednesday evening, it was whispered about that an engagement would take place on the following morning.

On Thursday the sun rose in an unclouded sky, a gentle breeze stirred the waters of the harbor in which lay rocking on the tide about fifty vessels, of every shape and size, from the little Mayflower, which showed by her shattered paddle-boxes how gallantly she had braved the stormy Atlantic, to the giant steamer (Vanderbilt) by her side, which had so much excited our admiration by towing with apparent ease, through the opposing waves and howling winds of the previous Friday, her noble sister the Great Republic, which was now coming up the bay; the smaller vessels of the naval squadron were forming into line in obedience to the order signalled from the Wabash; the transports were crowded on deck, and shroud, and spar with soldiers and officers of every grade; glasses were in great demand, and every eye was strained to witness the impending conflict.

At length the Wabash, which had been prepared for action two days before, was observed in motion; steaming slowly in on the northern side past the Bay Point batteries, followed by the Susquehanna, Vandalia, (in tow of the Isaac Smith,) Mohican, Seminole, Pawnee, and others.

A few shots were exchanged with the battery on their right and with the rebel gunboats that hovered around below Parry Island; but it was not until they had rounded above in a graceful sweep, and returned seaward past the Hilton Head fort, that our ships appeared really in earnest. The guns of the Wabash were opened upon this battery a few minutes before ten A. M. After delivering her broadside, she turned her head toward the centre of the channel, up again on the Bay Point side, again rounding above and returning as before to throw another torrent of shells into the enemy's position. The remaining ships-of-war followed her in beautiful order, so that while one was resting her men and cooling her guns, another was belching forth with terrible precision on the camps and cannon of the foe.

From twelve to two o'clock the firing from our side was perfectly terrific, and after the latter hour the enemy responded only at intervals.

At three o'clock (just five hours after the commencement of the engagement) a boat from the Wabash was seen making for the shore, with a white flag at the bow and the American ensign at the stern. She soon touched the sandy beach, and a moment after we thought we could discern our flag upon the ramparts. Our men could not help giving utterance to exclamations of hopeful joy; but the less sanguine waited a few moments in eager suspense, until suddenly, from the roof of a conspicuous old mansion by the fort, a great flag, that could not be mistaken, displayed the Stars and Stripes in all their glory, in beautiful contrast with the green woods beyond.

The unwonted emotion with which the assembled thousands beheld the emblem of their country's power floating serenely over the "sacred soil" that first dishonored and defied it, was quickly evinced by the loud and repeated cheers which rang from vessel to vessel throughout the magnificent harbor. Our joy was tinged with a feeling of sorrowful apprehension for the many who, we supposed, had helped to attain this result by the sacrifice of their lives; and it was not until a few hours later that we learned, with astonishment, that our loss in killed and wounded did not exceed thirty.

The enemy's loss is not exactly known, but is probably from fifty to a hundred. They left their batteries in extraordinary haste, not even delaying to spike their guns.

Upon seeing the Hilton Head battery abandoned, the rebel forces retreated from Bay Point—their commander assigning as a reason, (in a note, subsequently found in the hospital, addressed to the General commanding the forces of the United States,) that they could probably find an opportunity elsewhere to render more important services to the cause of the Confederacy than by endeavoring to hold a position which was no longer tenable, and thereby securing for themselves quarters in Fort Lafayette.

A great amount of property has fallen into our hands, comprising about forty guns of large calibre, considerable quantities of ammunition, provisions, tents, and personal baggage.

Gen. Wright's brigade was landed on Thursday evening at Hilton Head; that of Gen. Stevens at Bay Point early this morning; the rest of the troops will doubtless be landed to-morrow.

The work of the navy has been splendidly performed. The army will now have to put forth all its energies to secure the foothold we have gained against the forces which we fully expect will soon be sent to "exterminate" us. Being already in possession of fine fortifications, ready made to our hands, beside having almost undisputed control of the waters around us, commanded by Generals in whom we repose the fullest confidence, the forces now here will doubtless be able to maintain themselves against any force of the enemy. But in order to avail ourselves of this point as a base of operations against Charleston and Savannah, should any such operations be contemplated, large reinforcements should be promptly forwarded.

As a centre of operation by land or water, as a place of refuge for our blockading squadron, and for merchant vessels in distress, and as a port for the re-opening of the cotton trade, this position is unrivalled. That the moral effect of the victory will be great, both at home and abroad, can hardly be questioned.

Hoping that a death-blow has thus been dealt to the cause of the rebels, and to the tyranny and misery which at present prevail here, I remain, with much respect, yours,
G. M.

COST OF THE BATTLE OF PORT ROYAL.—The Wabash fired, during the entire action, nine hundred shots, being all eight, nine, ten, and eleven-inch shells, with the exception of a few rifled cannon projectiles of a new pattern, and which were used simply as a matter of experiment. The Susquehanna fired three hundred shots, the Bienville one hundred and eighty-five, and the average of the gunboats and the other smaller ships may probably be set down at one hundred and fifty each. There were, in all, sixteen vessels engaged on our side, and probably from all of them were fired not far from three thousand five hundred shots and shell at the two forts, Walker and Beauregard, the four-gun battery, and the three steamers.

The battle of Port Royal may be set down as having cost the country not less than twenty-eight thousand dollars. Reckoning, then, a few items of this battle, beginning with the immense cost of this fleet, which has been preparing since August last, the pay of the soldiers, the value of their food, and the expense of the two lost vessels on a very moderate scale, it will be seen that battles are an expensive amusement, even for a "great country." A few, a very few, items of the expense of the show would foot up something like this:

Rent of vessels, . . . . .	$3,600,000
Pay of soldiers, etc., . . . . .	630,000
Value of rations consumed, . . . . .	320,000
Value of clothing worn out, . . . . .	165,000
Value of powder burned, . . . . .	28,000
Value of the Governor and Peerless, . . . . .	160,000

Total, . . . . . $4,903,000

A REBEL ACCOUNT.

SAVANNAH, Friday, Nov. 8, 4 P. M.

The following particulars of the battle of Port Royal have been received here up to three o'clock P. M.:

Capt. Turner, of the Berry Infantry, and other officers who were in the engagement, have arrived in the steamer Sampson, which brought a number of the wounded up to the city.

The action took place on Thursday, between a portion of the enemy's fleet, consisting of fifteen vessels inside the entrance, and Fort Walker, beside a large number outside the island. There were five hundred men in Fort Walker, which was the total force engaged with the enemy, there being but about one thousand eight hundred men, all told, on the island. The steamship Minnesota (Wabash) was the first to enter the port, which engaged Fort Walker, discharging shot and shell from three positions, front and rear, beside discharging a terrible hail of shot and shell into the woods and thickets, as also into a cotton field outside the fort, where our men were stationed, expecting the enemy to land from their transports. After the second round from the broadside of the fleet, the principal gun of the battery was dismounted. The engagement lasted five hours, and all of our guns on Fort Walker excepting two being dismounted, the fort was no longer tenable.

Previous to the concentration of the fleet, however, an arrangement was made for the blowing up of the magazine, in case the enemy, on taking possession, should attempt to open it. Our men outside of the fort were exposed to a heavy fire during the whole action, without any means of defence or protection. The whole number of killed, wounded, and missing, did not exceed one hundred men. The names of the missing and wounded, as far as we have been able to collect them, are as follows:

Berry Infantry: Sergeant T. Parkerson, wounded in the hand; private Hess, wounded in the foot, slightly.

Georgetown Forresters: two missing.

Thomas County Volunteers: J. W. Fontaine, missing.

Seventeenth Patriots: private A. Thompson, missing.

South Carolina Volunteers: Captain Radcliffe, Company A; two missing.

DeSaussure regiment: fifteen missing from one company.

We learn, in addition, that Dr. Bnist, of Charleston, was killed by the explosion of a shell in Fort Walker, while dressing the wounds of a soldier. Lieut. T. H. Smack, of the South Carolina Volunteers, was struck in the leg, below the knee, rendering amputation necessary.

The total number killed in the fort was about fifteen.

In Capt. Reid's company of regulars there were sixteen killed, wounded, and missing, out of forty-eight. Private Kelly, while working one of the guns in the fort, had his head shot off. Capt. Reid's company, immediately on landing, pushed through the enemy's fire into the fort, and worked the guns of their battery in an admirable manner for four hours, and were highly complimented by the Commanding General. They drew their brass pieces on retreating twelve miles, and then abandoned them. Capt. Wagner's company of artillery was also engaged in working the batteries, and behaved with the utmost coolness and gallantry, and did effectual service. Capt. Wagner was slightly wounded in the face, and the blood was trickling from the wound as he was working the battery. One of Gen. Drayton's aids was shot from his horse, and a piece of shell grazed the General's cheek. He received also a slight wound in the arm. The force on the island consisted of Heyward's Nineteenth, and DeSaussure's and the Fifteenth South Carolina Volunteers, Style's Twenty-seventh Georgia regiment, and a company of regulars. The men were taken off the Bay Point battery to the mainland. No particulars relative to this battery have been received, only that it had been in constant action, receiving and returning a heavy fire.

CAPTURE OF BEAUFORT, S. C.

A CORRESPONDENT of the New York Herald, gives the following account of this capture:—

PORT ROYAL HARBOR, S. C., November 11, 1861. }
 FORT WALKER, }

On Saturday noon last, in pursuance of the orders of Flag-officer Dupont, the gunboats Seneca, Lieutenant-Commanding David Ammen; Pembina, Lieutenant-Commanding John Bankhead, and the Curlew, Lieutenant Whortmough, proceeded up the Beaufort River to reconnoitre, and to take possession of two light-boats, which had been removed there early in the summer. The boats proceeded rapidly up the stream, cleared for action, and ready for any emergency; but the banks of the river were found deserted save by groups of negroes, who were observed to gaze upon the novel sight of three war vessels bearing the Stars and Stripes on South Carolina waters, with curiosity, if not with lively fear. No whites could be seen, and no defences of any kind could be described, beside a battery near Beaufort, where the guns had been taken out and transferred to Bay Point. On arriving at a point about half a mile distant from Beaufort quite a number of persons were observed to leave the village, and hastily take to the woods. Soon thereafter, on approaching the village a little nearer, Captain Ammen, of the Seneca, sent Lieutenant Sprotson in a boat to the shore, with a flag of truce, to communicate to the people and to assure them of perfect safety to their persons and property, and inviting them to return to their homes. On landing, Lieutenant Sprotson was met by a number of negroes, who seemed greatly rejoiced to see him, and who cheered lustily for the Stars and Stripes. They informed Lieutenant Sprotson that there were but two whites left in the village, and took him to one, who met the Lieutenant at the door of his store waving a flag of truce, and exhibiting in his manner every indication of deep fear. This man, a Northerner by birth, reported that the negroes were perfectly wild, and were plundering stores and dwellings, wantonly destroying property of every kind, and carrying off every thing of a portable character that they could lay their hands upon. They had been worked up to a pitch of frenzy by their masters, who had shot several negroes who refused to accompany them into the woods, and away from the village, to prevent them from communicating with the United States forces; and that the negroes were retaliating in this manner, and that the lives of the remaining whites and their property were horribly insecure. A perfect saturnalia had begun.

The negroes reported that the rebel force which lately occupied the fortifications on St. Philip's Island had, with the Beaufort artillery, retired in a hasty manner to Port Royal ferry, about ten miles distant, where there was a force of about a thousand men.

On these facts being known to Captain Ammen, he returned, and reported them to Commodore Dupont, who immediately ordered the Unadilla, Captain Collins, the senior officer of the gunboats, to proceed to Beaufort and suppress any excesses that the negroes might commit in their efforts to retaliate against their masters, and to take particular pains to assure the white inhabitants that we had no intention to disturb them in their rights or in the enjoyment of private property, and in the spirit of these instructions, and, in accordance with these principles, to use every effort to restore confidence, to bring the people back to their homes, when order should be reestablished and personal safety and the rights of private property secured to all. We have not heard from the Unadilla as yet, but there will be no more excesses committed if Commodore Dupont and the forces under his control can prevent it; and I am sure that General Sherman is controlled by the same sense of duty.

While the Seneca was returning a boat load of negroes came aboard the vessel, and they were distinctly informed by Captain Ammen that we had not come for the purpose of taking them away from their masters, nor of obliging them to continue in a state of slavery, and that they might go to Beaufort or to Hilton Head, as they pleased. They left, saying that they would return to Beaufort and make arrangements to remove, and they thought that all the slaves would come down to Hilton Head. Some of them have already arrived, and others will pour in here until we shall be overrun by them. Nearly two hundred contrabands have already arrived within our lines, and the accessions increase daily. And these fat, sleek, well-to-do darkies are the favorite slaves of the wealthiest and largest slave-owners in South Carolina, where the institution is said to assume its mildest form, and where, consequently, the slaves are more contented and happier than in any other part of the South. The negroes here would never leave their masters, they would fight and lay down their lives for them, if necessary, before they would allow "Lincoln's hirelings" to land upon the sacred soil. How correct they were in their estimate of the strength of these black scoundrels' love and affection for massa, and the "little log hut," may be easily appreciated when I state that one of the first negroes that came in was the driver on Mr. Seabury's plantation, and among others were body servants of General Drayton and Coatesworth Pinckney, whose plantations are within ten miles of us. These come, and go into ecstasies of joy, when they feel that they are safe. There are a good many cooks among them, who can get up a "hoecake" in a style quite gay and festive, and who know how to give that exact turn to bacon which is arrived at only by long experience, and a peculiar talent that rises to the height of the science, and embraces within its comprehensive grasp the coordinate branches of turkey roasting and oyster-frying. Those there be among us to to-day.

These oleaginous darkies that come in are well cared for in every respect, and we expect at no distant day to see the results of their new freedom manifested in throwing up intrenchments and constructing fortifications. A couple of thousand negroes will be just the article we need in intrenching ourselves, and by the time we are ready every shovel, spade, and pick that we have will be in contrabands' hands, as they come in by fifties and hundreds.

But to return to the expedition up the Beaufort River.

It was ascertained that both of the lightboats for which the gunboats were sent, were burned by the rebels immediately after they had received intelligence of the capture of Fort Walker and battery Beauregard, on Bay Point. So one of the objects of the expedition was not attained. Lightboats will undoubtedly be sent down from Hatteras Inlet at an early day, so that one may be placed on Martin's Industry, and the other at another important point. The surveying steamer Vixen, with Captain Boutelle, is now engaged in laying out buoys at the entrance of, and in the harbor. This work will soon be completed, and no difficulty will be experienced by masters of vessels in getting into the harbor by aid of the chart, although there will be pilots to bring all vessels in.

The Ottawa, in command of Commander Stevens, is covering Scull Creek, and thus the water communication between Savannah and Charleston is effectually cut off. This will cause a great deal of trouble and annoyance to the rebels, as the railroad between the cities of Savannah and Charleston is miserable enough, and not capable of doing the business that will now be demanded of it.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT.

BY AN OFFICER OF THE FRIGATE PAWNER.

STEAM-FRIGATE PAWNER, }
PORT ROYAL BAY, November 11, 1861. }

Our gunboats went up to Beaufort yesterday, and found the town and the river banks deserted by the white residents. Parties of negroes were breaking open houses and plundering at leisure. The panic exceeds description.

We are informed that the families on the mainland as well as on this group of sea islands have fled to the interior, in some cases taking their negroes. These generally, however, remain, and some dozens have come into camp and have been set at work by the army.

Truly South Carolina's day of reckoning has come. She has sown the wind; she is reaping the whirlwind. There is a singular fitness in striking the effective blow at this bold iniquity here in its birthplace. In April last our flag was, for the first time, dishonored on her soil, that the palmetto might flaunt above it. On Thursday last it was raised again upon her soil, with such pealing shouts of triumph and such thundering salvos of artillery as made the whole State tremble. God grant that it may forever float there!

Hilton Head, upon which the south fort stands, is ten feet above high water. The parapet of the fort is some twenty feet higher. It is protected by a deep ditch with a stockade. It is constructed on approved scientific principles, with angles, traverses, a curtain, bombproofs, well-protected magazines, well supplied with ammunition and rifle-pits. Twenty-five guns were found in the fort, fifteen of which (with an equal number in the fort at Bay Point, on the north side) swept the channel of the entrance; of these the flanking guns were rifled pieces of the heaviest calibre, eighty-pounders; while an enormous ten-inch columbiad occupied the centre, with a nine-inch shell gun beside it. The remainder were forty-two-pounders and thirty-two-pounders, navy patterns, taken from the artillery park at Norfolk Navy Yard. There was a furnace for heating shot. The rifled guns were cast in the moulds of nine and ten-inch columbiads, and rifled with a six-inch bore. These and the columbiads are new, and bear the stamp of Anderson's Tredegar Iron Works at Richmond. Abundance of shot and shell, grape and canister, was left about all the guns. The scene on entering the fort was extremely interesting. Every thing bore testimony to the terrible effect of the "feu d'enfer" of the preceding four hours. The sand was strewn with fragments of exploded shells, which had perforated the wood-work and torn up the turf from parapet and traverses everywhere. Five guns, of the fifteen just named, were dismantled, the ten-inch columbiad among them. Two thirty-two-pounders were thrown down, with their carriages in fragments lying upon them. Twenty-four bodies were left unburied in the enclosure, while others and many wounded have been found in the groves beyond the camp.

I was more than ever surprised and gratified with our success after my visit, and well appreciated the remark of a veteran officer, who exclaimed, after examining the position and force of the batteries, "How did we ever survive that fire and take these forts!" But the very boldness of the attack assured its success. Instead of fighting the forts at anchor, and exposed to their enfilading fire in the channel, Flag-officer Dupont steamed the entire squadron through the passage and attacked the batteries in flank from the inside of the bay, thus preventing half their guns from being brought to bear upon us, and keeping entirely out of range of one fort, while raining shells upon the other. The vessels followed each other in slow circles, the Wabash leading, each delivering its fire as the guns would bear, and as long as within range. As the tide rose the circles swept nearer to the shore, and the most effective firing was done at one thousand or twelve hundred yards.

The enemy stood gallantly to their guns, but their hopes sank when the boast of their officers, that they would sink our ships if they tried to pass their line of fire, was falsified by our bold dash through. Our near approach saved us from being struck by most of their shot and shell, which were aimed high and whistled harmlessly over our heads. A movement of two gunboats up the bay, after their fire slackened, caused them to desert the forts and flee across the islands to avoid being cut off. Had we pilots for the creeks in which their steamers were concealed, the entire force of three thousand men might have been captured.

The fort on Bay Point is similar to the south fort, and as heavily armed. I have not visited it yet.

The bay is magnificent; it is as accessible as Hampton Roads, with as deep water, and our squadron rides as safely as there. We have heard but little of it, but there is not a better harbor on the coast.

THE SHELLING OF URBANNA, VA.

REBEL ACCOUNT.

ONE of the most recent outrages, worthy of being classified with the outrages of some of the bloody butchers who lived in centuries gone by, was visited on the little village of Urbanna, Middlesex County, Virginia, on Friday last, by some of the chivalry who now bear commissions in the Lincoln navy.

One of the steamers and a tug, that have been blockading the Rappahannock, steamed up to the quiet little town of Urbanna, which lies back a few hundred yards from the river, on the creek, and, without apprising the people in order to a removal of the women and children, commenced hurling their missiles of intended destruction in the shape of round shot and shell. After some hundred discharges of their cannon, the chicken thieves and lawless adventurers attempted a landing of their boats, but they were met by a small body of militia or volunteers stationed there, and soon sought shelter in their piratical craft, far out of the reach of the musketry of our soldiers.

Having been baffled in their thieving visitation, they sought revenge in trying to destroy the little town with bombshells; but we are happy to say not a house was injured, much less destroyed, except a small free church, which, we understand, was struck three or four times.

The Yankee shots were alike ineffectual in the destruction of life, as not a soldier or citizen was killed or wounded by the bombardment.

Urbanna is a village containing about one hundred, so that the attack was altogether one of those fiendish, malignant affairs worthy the instigation of the devil, and worthy the execution of the braves who now figure luminously in the Lincoln navy.

The attack was one most likely based upon pure piratical ideas. First, to drive out the few citizens, then rush in, spoil and plunder, and destroy what they could not carry off; but thanks to the invincible little band of soldiers there, the whole scheme was frustrated.

CAPTURE OF MASON AND SLIDELL.

CAPTAIN WILKES' REPORT.

UNITED STATES STEAMER SAN JACINTO, }
November 15, 1861. }

SIR: I have written to you, relative to the movements of this ship, from Cienfuegos, on the south coast of Cuba. There I learned that Messrs. Slidell and Mason had landed on Cuba, and had reached the Havana from Charleston. I took in some sixty tons of coal and left with all despatch on the 26th of October to intercept the return of the Theodora; but on my arrival at the Havana, on the 31st, I found she had departed on her return, and that Messrs. Slidell and Mason, with their secretaries and families, were there, and would depart on the 7th of the month in the English steamer Trent for St. Thomas, on their way to England.

I made up my mind to fill up with coal and leave the port as soon as possible, to await at a suitable position on the route of the steamer to St. Thomas to intercept her and take them out.

On the afternoon of the 2d I left the Havana, in continuation of my cruise after the Sumter on the north side of Cuba. The next day, when about to board a French brig, she ran into us on the starboard side at the mainchains, and carried away her bowsprit and foretopmast, and suffered other damages. I enclose you herewith the reports of the officers who witnessed the accident. I do not feel that any blame is due to the officer in charge of this ship at the time the ship was run into; and the brig was so close when it was seen she would probably do so, that even with the power of steam, lying motionless as we were, we could not avoid it—it seemed as if designed.

I at once took her in tow and put an officer on board, with a party to repair her damages; this was effected before night, but I kept her in tow until we were up with the Havana, and ran within about eight miles of the light, the wind blowing directly fair for her to reach port.

I then went over to Key West, in hopes of finding the Powhatan or some other steamer to accompany me to the Bahama Channel, to make it impossible for the steamer in which Messrs. Slidell and Mason were to embark, to escape either in the night or day. The Powhatan had left but the day before, and I was therefore disappointed, and obliged to rely upon the vigilance of the officers and crew of this ship, and proceeded the next morning to the north side of the Island of Cuba, communicated with the Sagua la Grande on the 4th, hoping to receive a telegraphic communication from Mr. Shufelt, our Consul-General, giving me the time of the departure of the steamer.

In this also I was disappointed, and ran to the eastward some ninety miles, where the old Bahama Channel contracts to the width of fifteen miles, some two hundred and forty miles from the Havana, and in sight of the Paredon del Grande lighthouse. There we cruised until the morning of the 8th, awaiting the steamer, believing that if she left at the usual time, she must pass us about noon of the 8th, and we could not possibly miss her. At forty minutes past eleven A. M., on the 8th, her smoke was first seen; at twelve M., our position was to the westward of the entrance into the narrowest part of the channel, and about nine miles northeast from the lighthouse of Paredon del Grande, the nearest point of Cuba to us. We were all prepared for her, beat to quarters, and orders were given to Lieutenant D. M. Fairfax to have two boats manned and armed to board her, and make Messrs. Slidell, Mason, Eustis, and McFarland prisoners, and send them immediately on board. (A copy of this order to him is herewith enclosed.) The steamer approached, and hoisted English colors, our ensign was hoisted, and a shot was fired across her bow; she maintained her speed and showed no disposition to heave-to; then a shell was fired across her bow, which brought her to. I hailed that I intended to send a boat on board, and Lieutenant Fairfax, with the second cutter of this ship, was despatched. He met with some difficulty, and remaining on board the steamer with a part of the boat's crew, sent her back to request more assistance: the captain of the steamer having declined to show his papers and passenger list, a force became necessary to search her; Lieutenant James A. Greer was at once despatched in the third cutter, also manned and armed.

Messrs. Slidell, Mason, Eustis, and McFarland were recognized, and told they were required to go on board this ship. This they objected to, until an overpowering force compelled them: much persuasion was used, and a little force, and at about two o'clock they were brought on board this ship, and received by me. Two other boats were then sent to expedite the removal of their baggage and some stores, when the steamer, which proved to be the Trent, was suffered to proceed on her route to the eastward, and at thirty minutes past three P. M., we bore away to the northward and westward. The whole time employed was two hours and thirteen minutes.

I enclose you the statements of such officers who boarded the Trent, relative to the facts, and also an extract from the log-book of this ship.

It was my determination to have taken possession of the Trent, and sent her to Key West as a prize, for resisting the search, and carrying these passengers, whose character and objects were well known to the captain; but the reduced number of my officers and crew, and the large number of passengers on board, bound to Europe, who would be put to great inconvenience, decided me to allow them to proceed.

Finding the families of Messrs. Slidell and Eustis on board, I tendered them the offer of my cabin for their accommodation to accompany their husbands; this they declined, however, and proceeded in the Trent.

Before closing this despatch, I would bring to your notice the notorious action of her British Majesty's subjects, the Consul-General of Cuba, and those on board the Trent, in doing every thing to aid and abet the escape of these four persons, and endeavoring to conceal their persons on board. No passports or papers of any description were in possession of them from the Federal Government; and for this and other reasons which will readily occur to you I made them my prisoners, and shall retain them on board here until I hear from you what disposition is to be made of them.

I cannot close this report without bearing testimony to the admirable manner in which all the officers and men of this ship performed their duties, and the cordial manner in which they carried out my orders.

To Lieutenant Fairfax I beg leave to call your particular attention for the praiseworthy manner in which he executed the delicate duties with which he was intrusted; it met and has received my warmest thanks.

After leaving the north side of Cuba, I ran through the Santaren passage, and up the coast from off St. Augustine to Charleston, and regretted being too late to take part in the expedition to Port Royal.

I enclose herewith a communication I received from Messrs. Slidell, Mason, Eustis, and McFarland, with my answer.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
your obedient servant,

CHARLES WILKES,
Captain.

HON. GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

INSTRUCTIONS TO LIEUT. FAIRFAX.
UNITED STATES STEAMER SAN JACINTO, }
At sea, November 8, 1861. }

SIR: You will have the second and third cutters of this ship fully manned and armed, and be in all respects prepared to board the steamer Trent now hove-to under our guns.

On boarding her you will demand the papers of the steamer, her clearance from Havana, with the list of passengers and crew.

Should Mr. Mason, Mr. Slidell, Mr. Eustis, and Mr. McFarland be on board, you will make them prisoners, and send them on board this ship immediately, and take possession of her as a prize.

I do not deem it will be necessary to use force; that the prisoners will have the good sense to avoid any necessity for using it; but if they should, they must be made to understand that it is their own fault. They must be brought on board. All trunks, cases, packages, and bags belonging to them you will take possession of, and send on board this ship. Any despatches found on the persons of the prisoners, or in possession of those on board the steamer, will be taken possession of also, examined, and retained, if necessary.

I have understood that the families of these gentlemen may be with them. If so, I beg you will offer them, in my name, a passage in this ship to the United States, and that all the attention and comforts we can command are tendered them, and will be placed in their service.

In the event of their acceptance, should there be any thing which the captain of the steamer can spare to increase the comforts in the way of necessaries or stores, of which a war vessel is deficient, you will please to procure them. The amount will be paid by the paymaster.

Lieutenant James A. Greer will take charge of the third cutter, which accompanies you, and assist you in these duties.

I trust that all those under your command, in executing this important and delicate duty, will conduct themselves with all the delicacy and kindness which become the character of our naval service,

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
CHARLES WILKES,
Captain.

Lieutenant D. M. FAIRFAX,
U. S. N., Executive Officer San Jacinto.

At sea, November 11, 1861. }

GENTLEMEN: You will report to me in writing all the facts which transpired under your observation on board the mail steamer Trent, bound from Havana to St. Thomas, whilst hove-to under our guns on the 8th inst., and boarded by you under my orders.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,
CHARLES WILKES,
Captain.

Lieutenant D. M. Fairfax; Lieutenant Jas. A. Greer; Second Assistant Engineer James B. Houston; Third Assistant Engineer Geo. W. Hall; Paymaster's clerk R. G. Simpson; Master's Mate Charles B. Dahlgren; Boatswain H. P. Grace, United States Navy.

REPORT OF LIEUT. FAIRFAX.

UNITED STATES STEAMER SAN JACINTO, }
At sea, November 12, 1861. }

SIR: At one twenty P. M., on the 8th instant, I repaired alongside of the British mail packet in an armed cutter, accompanied by Mr. Houston, second assistant engineer, and Mr. Grace, the boatswain.

I went on board the Trent alone, leaving the two officers in the boat with orders to await until it became necessary to show some force.

I was shown up by the first officer to the quarter deck, where I met the captain and informed him who I was, asking to see the passenger list. He declined letting me see it. I then told him that I had information of Mr. Mason, Mr. Slidell, Mr. Eustis, and Mr. McFarland having taken their passage at Havana in the packet to St. Thomas, and would satisfy myself whether they were on board before allowing the steamer to proceed. Mr. Slidell, evidently hearing his name mentioned, came up to me and asked if I wanted to see him. Mr. Mason soon joined us, and then Mr. Eustis and Mr. McFarland, when I made known the object of my visit. The captain of the Trent opposed any thing like the search of his vessel, nor would he consent to show papers or passenger list. The four gentlemen above mentioned protested also against my arresting and sending them to the United States steamer near by. There was considerable noise among the passengers just about this time, and that led Mr. Houston and Mr. Grace to repair on board with some six or eight men, all armed. After several unsuccessful efforts to persuade Mr. Mason and Mr. Slidell to go with me peaceably, I called to Mr. Houston and ordered him to return to the ship with the information that the four gentlemen named in your order of the 8th instant were on board, and force must be applied to take them out of the packet.

About three minutes after there was still greater excitement on the quarter deck, which brought Mr. Grace with his armed party. I, however, deemed the presence of any armed men unnecessary, and only calculated to alarm the ladies present, and directed Mr. Grace to return to the lower deck, where he had been since first coming on board. It must have been less than half an hour after I boarded the Trent when the second armed cutter, under Lieutenant Greer, came alongside, (only two armed boats being used.) He brought in the third cutter eight marines and four machinists, in addition to a crew of some twelve men. When the marines and some armed men had been formed just outside of the main deck cabin, where these four gentlemen had gone to pack up their baggage, I renewed my efforts to induce them to accompany me on board—still refusing to accompany me unless force was applied. I called in to my assistance four or five officers, and first taking hold of Mr. Mason's shoulder, with another officer on the opposite side, I went as far as the gangway of the steamer, and delivered him over to Lieutenant Greer, to be placed in the boat. I then returned for Mr. Slidell, who insisted that I must apply considerable force to get him to go with me; calling in at last three officers, he, also, was taken in charge and handed over to Mr. Greer. Mr. McFarland and Mr. Eustis, after protesting, went quietly into the boat. They had been permitted to collect their baggage, but were sent in advance of it under charge of Lieutenant Greer. I gave my personal attention to the luggage, saw it put in a boat, and sent in charge of an officer to the San Jacinto.

When Mr. Slidell was taken prisoner a great deal of noise was made by some of the passengers, which caused Lieutenant Greer to send the marines into the cabin. They were immediately ordered to return to their former position outside. I carried out my purpose without using any force beyond what appears in this report. The mail agent, who is a retired commander in the British navy, seemed to have a great deal to say as to the propriety of my course, but I purposely avoided all official intercourse with him. When I finally was leaving the steamer, he made some apology for his rude conduct, and expressed, personally, his approval of the manner in which I had carried out my orders. We parted company from the Trent at twenty minutes past three P. M.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
D. M. FAIRFAX,
Lieutenant and Executive Officer.
Captain CHARLES WILKES, U. S. N.,
Commanding San Jacinto.

REPORT OF LIEUT. GREER.

At sea, Nov. 12, 1861. }

SIR: In accordance with your instructions, I submit the following: On November 8th, between one and two P. M., I was ordered by Lieut. Breese, acting executive officer, to shove off with the third cutter, and go alongside of the English mail steamer which was then lying to under our guns. In the boat with me were Third Assistant Engineer Hall, Paymaster's Clerk Simpson, Master's Mate Dahlgren, one sergeant, one corporal, and six privates, of marines, four machinists, and the crew, consisting of thirteen men, the whole party being well armed. When I arrived on the steamer I was met on the guard by Mr. Grace with a message from Lieutenant Fairfax, (who had preceded me on board,) to bring the marines on board and station them outside of the cabin, which I did; also to keep the spare men on the guard, and to have the boats' crews in readiness to jump on board if needed. As soon as the marines were stationed, I had the space outside and forward of the cabin kept clear of passengers, and assumed a position where I could see Lieutenant Fairfax, who was then engaged in conversation with persons in the cabin. He shortly came out and told me to remain as I was. He then went back into the cabin, and in a few minutes returned with Mr. Mason. He had his hand on his shoulder, and I think Mr. Hall had his on the other one. He transferred Mr. Mason to me, and I had the third cutter hauled up, into which he got. Shortly after Mr. McFarland came out and got into the boat; I think he was unaccompanied by any of the officers. About this time I heard a good deal of loud talking in the cabin, and above all I heard a woman's voice. I could not hear what she said. Mr. Fairfax appeared to be having an altercation with some one. There was much confusion created by the passengers and ship's officers, who were making all kinds of disagreeable and contemptuous noises and remarks.

Just then Mr. Houston came to me and said he thought there would be trouble. I told him to ask Mr. Fairfax if I should bring in the marines. He returned with an answer to bring them in. At that time I heard some one call out "shoot him." I ordered the marines to come into the cabin, which they did at quick time. As they advanced, the passengers fell back. Mr. Fairfax then ordered the marines to go out of the cabin, which they did, Mr. Slidell at the same time jumping out of a window of a state-room into the cabin, where he was arrested by Mr. Fairfax, and was then brought by Mr. Hall and Mr. Grace to the boat, into which he got. Soon after Mr. Eustis came to the boat, accompanied by Mr. Fairfax. I then, by his order, took charge of the boat and conveyed the gentlemen arrested, viz., Messrs. Slidell, Mason, McFarland, and Eustis, to the San Jacinto, where I delivered them over to Capt. Wilkes. This was about two o'clock. I then returned to the steamer; when I reached her, the baggage of the gentlemen was being brought up and sent to the San Jacinto. Soon after Mr. Fairfax told me to send the marines and spare hands on board, which I did. He then left me in charge of our party and went on board the San Jacinto. About three o'clock she ran under the Trent's stern; I was hailed and directed to come on board, which I did with all excepting Mr. Grace, Mr. Dahlgren, and Mr. Hall, who came in another boat.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JAMES A. GREER,
Lieutenant.
Captain C. WILKES,
Commanding San Jacinto.

P. S. I desire to add that it was about twenty-five minutes to two P. M. when I went alongside the Trent. There were but two armed boats used during the day; a third boat, the crew of which were unarmed, went alongside during the detention. When I first went on board with the marines, and at intervals during my stay, the officers of the steamer made a great many irritating remarks to each other and to the passengers, which were evidently intended for our benefit. Among other things said were: "Did you ever hear of such an outrage?" "Marines on board! why, this looks devilish like mutiny!" "These Yankees will have to pay well for this." "This is the best thing in the world for the South; England will open the blockade." "We will have a good chance at them now." "Did you ever hear of such a piratical act?" "Why, this is a perfect Bull's Run!" "They would not have dared to have done it if an English man-of-war had been in sight!" The mail agent (a man in the uniform of a commander in the royal navy, I think) was very indignant and talkative, and tried several times to get me into a discussion of the matter. I told him I was not there for that purpose. He was very bitter; he told me that the English squadron would raise the blockade in twenty days after his report of this outrage (I think he said outrage) got home; that the Northerners might as well give up now, &c., &c. Most all the officers of the vessel showed an undisguised hatred for the northern people, and a sympathy for the Confederates. I will do the captain of the vessel the justice to say that he acted differently from the rest, being, when I saw him, very reserved and dignified. The officers and men of our party took no apparent notice of the remarks that were made, and acted with the greatest forbearance.

Respectfully, JAS. A. GREER.

REPORT OF ASS'T ENGINEER HOUSTON.

UNITED STATES STEAMER SAN JACINTO, }
At sea, Nov. 13, 1861. }

SIR: In obedience to your order of the 11th instant, I respectfully report:

That, upon going alongside of the English steamer Trent, on the 7th of this month, Lieutenant Fairfax went on board, ordering the boatswain and myself to remain in the boat. A few minutes after this my attention was attracted by persons speaking in a loud and excited manner upon the steamer's upper deck. While considering its meaning, the noise was repeated, which decided me to join Lieutenant Fairfax immediately on board, and found him surrounded by the officers of the ship and passengers, among whom I recognized Messrs. Mason, Slidell, and Eustis. The confusion at this time passes description. So soon, however, as he could be heard, the mail agent (who was a retired lieutenant or commander in the British navy) protested against the act of removing passengers from an English steamer. Lieutenant Fairfax requested Mr. Mason to go quietly to the San Jacinto, but that gentleman replied that he would "yield only to force;" whereupon I was ordered to our ship to report the presence of the above-named gentlemen, together with Mr. McFarland, and ask that the remainder of our force be sent to the Trent, after which I returned to her, and entering the cabin, saw Mr. Fairfax endeavoring to enter Mr. Slidell's room, which was then prevented in a measure by the excitement which prevailed in and around that gentleman's quarters. The passengers (not including Mr. Mason, Slidell, Eustis, or McFarland) were disposed to give trouble; some of them went so far as to threaten, and upon Lieutenant Greer being informed by me of this fact, he ordered the marines to clear the passage-way of the cabin, but as Mr. Slidell had now come out of his stateroom through the window, where we could get to him, the order to the marines was countermanded by Lieutenant Fairfax. Mr. Slidell was removed to the boat by Mr. Grace and myself, and no more force was used than would show what would be done in case of necessity. Mr. Mason was taken in charge by Lieutenant Fairfax and Third Assistant Engineer Hall. The two secretaries walked into the boat by themselves.

While we were on board of the Trent many remarks were made reflecting discreditably on us and the Government of the United States.

Vol. III.—Doc. 27

No one was more abusive than the mail agent, who took pains, at the same time, to inform us that he was the only person on board officially connected with her Britannic Majesty's Government, who, he said, would, in consequence of this act, break the blockade of the southern United States ports. Another person, supposed to be a passenger, was so violent that the captain ordered him to be locked up. A short time before leaving the steamer I was informed by one of her crew that the mail agent was advising the captain to arm the crew and passengers of his ship, which I immediately communicated to Lieutenant Greer. About half-past three P. M. we returned to the San Jacinto.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. B. HOUSTON,
2d Ass't Engineer U. S. Steamer San Jacinto.
Captain CHARLES WILKES, Commanding.

REPORT OF ASS'T ENGINEER HALL.

UNITED STATES STEAMER SAN JACINTO, }
At sea, Nov. 13, 1861. }

SIR: In obedience to your order of the 11th instant, I respectfully make the following report of what came under my observation on board the mail steamer Trent, whilst hove-to under our guns on the 8th instant:

I boarded the steamer in the third cutter, under the command of Lieutenant Greer. Immediately on reaching the steamer's deck I stationed four men, (an oiler, assistant oiler, and two firemen,) who accompanied me, in the port gangway. I then went into the cabin, where I saw Lieutenant Fairfax, surrounded by a large number of passengers and the officers of the ship. He was conversing with Mr. Mason, and endeavoring to get him to come peaceably on board this ship. Mr. Mason refused to comply unless by force, and, taking hold of Mr. Mason's coat collar, gave an order, "Gentlemen, lay hands on him." I then laid hold of him by the coat collar, when Mr. Mason said he would yield under protest. I accompanied him as far as the boat, which was at the port gangway.

Returning to the cabin, Lieutenant Fairfax was at Mr. Slidell's room. After a short time Mr. Slidell came from his room through a side window. He also refused Lieutenant Fairfax's orders to come on board this ship, unless by force. I, with several of the officers, then caught hold, and used sufficient power to remove him from the cabin. He was accompanied to the boat by Second Assistant Engineer Houston and Boatswain Grace. I then received an order from both Lieutenants Fairfax and Greer to retain the boat until Messrs. Eustis and McFarland were found. I remained in the gangway till Messrs. Mason, Slidell, Eustis, and McFarland shoved off, Lieutenant Greer having charge of the gentlemen.

There was a great deal of excitement and talking during the whole time, the officers of the steamer endeavoring particularly to thwart Lieutenant Fairfax in carrying out his orders.

They also used very hard expressions toward us, calling us pirates, piratical expedition, &c., and threatened to open our blockade in a few weeks. At one time the officers and passengers made a demonstration; at the moment the marine guard came hastily in the cabin, but were immediately ordered back by Lieutenant Fairfax.

As far as I am able to judge, every thing was conducted on our part in a peaceable, quiet, and gentlemanly manner, and most remarkably so by Lieutenant Fairfax, who certainly had sufficient cause to resort to arms. I remained on board the Trent till after the baggage belonging to the gentlemen had been sent, and finally returned to this ship with Lieutenant Greer.

Most respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEO. W. HALL,
3d Assistant Engineer U. S. N.

Captain CHARLES WILKES,
Commanding U. S. Steamer San Jacinto.

REPORT OF ROBERT G. SIMPSON.

At sea, Nov. 12, 1861. }

SIR: In compliance with your order of yesterday, I have the honor to state the following: Between the hours of half-past one and two P. M., on Friday, Nov. 8, I boarded the mail steamer Trent in the third cutter, under the command of Lieutenant James A. Greer of this ship. Immediately after my arrival on board the Trent I was called into the cabin by Lieutenant Fairfax, who was endeavoring to persuade Mr. Mason to go peaceably on board the San Jacinto, which he obstinately refused to do, and said he would only go by force. Lieutenant Fairfax then said, "Gentlemen," (addressing the officers of the ship then present, Mr. George W. Hall, third assistant engineer, Mr. H. P. Grace, boatswain, and myself,) "lay your hands on Mr. Mason," which we accordingly did. Mr. Mason then said, "I yield to force," or words to that effect, when a gentleman alongside in uniform, apparently an officer of the Trent, said, "under protest." Mr. Mason then said, "I yield to force under protest, and will go." There was a great deal of excitement on board at this time, and the officers and passengers of the steamer were addressing us by numerous opprobrious epithets, such as calling us pirates, villains, traitors, &c., &c. The above occurred on the port side of the cabin. Immediately after I was ordered by Lieutenant James A. Greer to take charge on the starboard side, as some of our boats were coming alongside to take the personal effects of the prisoners. I remained there until a quarter past three P. M., when I was ordered by Lieutenant James A. Greer to return on board the San Jacinto in charge of a portion of the prisoners' baggage.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your ob't servant,
ROBERT G. SIMPSON,
Paymaster's Clerk.
Captain CHARLES WILKES,
Commanding U. S. Steamer San Jacinto.

REPORT OF CHARLES B. DAHLGREN.

At sea, Nov. 12, 1861. }

SIR: In obedience to your order, I hereby state that I was one of those who boarded the Trent mail packet. Mr. Mason and Mr. McFarland stepped quietly into the boats, and were removed to the San Jacinto. Mr. Slidell, however, on a flat refusal to leave the ship in any other manner, was, by a gentle application of force, placed in the boat and removed.

Every thing was conducted in an orderly, gentlemanly manner, as far as it came under my observation.

I remain your obedient servant,
CHARLES B. DAHLGREN,
Master's Mate.

Captain CHARLES WILKES.

REPORT OF BOATSWAIN GRACE.

UNITED STATES STEAMER SAN JACINTO, }
At sea, Nov. 12, 1861. }

SIR: In obedience to your orders of the 11th instant, I have the honor to make the following statement:

On the 8th instant, about half-past one P. M., I was ordered to accompany Lieutenant D. M. Fairfax in the second cutter, to board the mail steamer Trent, then hove-to under the guns of the San Jacinto. Lieutenant Fairfax ordered Mr. Houston and myself to remain in the boat while he went on board. A few minutes after Mr. Fairfax boarded her we heard some loud talking on deck, and Mr. Houston went on board to see if Mr. Fairfax needed assistance. He shortly returned and delivered Lieutenant Fairfax's order that I should come on board with the crew. I came on board, found Mr. Fairfax surrounded by ladies and gentlemen, and reported to him. He ordered me to remain in the gangway with the men. He was talking at the time with Mr. Mason, persuading him to come on board the San Jacinto without further force being used. Soon after another boat came alongside, in charge of Lieutenant James A. Greer. He went in the cabin. Soon afterward Lieut. Fairfax ordered me to wait on Mr. Slidell to the boat. At this order some of the passengers began to shout, and the marines rushed into the cabin, but Lieutenant Fairfax ordered them back to the gangway. I saw Mr. Slidell in the second cutter. Messrs. Mason, Eustis, and McFarland were in the boat. Mr. Greer returned with those gentlemen to the San Jacinto, and I was charged to bring the baggage and effects of the gentlemen on board the San Jacinto, which I did, and reported my return to Lieutenant Breese. All the officers of this ship that boarded her have been grossly abused by the officers and passengers of the mail steamer.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your ob't servant,
H. P. GRACE,
Boatswain U. S. Navy.
Captain CHARLES WILKES,
Commanding U. S. Steamer San Jacinto.

PROTEST OF MASON AND SLIDELL.

UNITED STATES STEAMER SAN JACINTO, }
At sea, Nov. 9, 1861. }

SIR: We desire to communicate to you, by this memorandum, the facts attending our arrest yesterday on board the British mail steamer Trent, by your order, and our transfer to this ship.

We, the undersigned, embarked at Havana, on the 7th instant, as passengers on board the Trent, Capt. Moir, bound to the island of St. Thomas, the Trent being one of the regular mail and passenger lines of the British Royal Mail Steamship Company, running from Vera Cruz, via Havana, to St. Thomas, and thence to Southampton, England. We paid our passage money for the whole route from Havana to Southampton to the British consul at Havana, who acts as the agent or representative of the said steamship company, Mr. Slidell being accompanied by his family, consisting of his wife, four children, and a servant, and Mr. Eustis by his wife and servants.

The Trent left the port of Havana about eight o'clock A. M. on the morning of the 7th instant, and pursued her voyage uninterrupted until intercepted by the United States steamer San Jacinto, under your command, on the day following (the 8th instant) in the manner now to be related.

When the San Jacinto was first observed several miles distant, the Trent was pursuing the usual course of her voyage along the old Bahama or Nicholas channel; was about two hundred and forty miles from Havana, and in sight of the lighthouse of Paredon Grande, the San Jacinto then lying stationary, or nearly so, about the middle of the channel, and where it was some fifteen miles wide, as since shown us on the chart, the nationality of the ship being then unknown. When the Trent had approached near enough for her flag to be distinguished it was hoisted at the peak and at the main, and so remained for a time. No flag was shown by the San Jacinto. When the Trent had approached within a mile of the San Jacinto, still pursuing the due course of her voyage, a shotted gun was fired from the latter ship across the course of the Trent, and the United States flag at the same time displayed at her peak. The British flag was again immediately hoisted, as before, by the Trent, and so remained. When the Trent had approached, still on her course, within from two to three hundred yards of the San Jacinto, a second shotted gun was fired from your ship again across the course of the Trent. When the Trent got within hailing distance her captain inquired what was wanted. The reply was understood to be they would send a boat, both ships being then stationary, with steam shut off. A boat very soon put off from your ship, followed immediately by two other boats, with full crews, and armed with muskets and side-arms. A lieutenant in the naval uniform of the United States, and with side-arms, boarded the Trent, and, in the presence of most of the passengers then assembled on the upper deck, said to Captain Moir that he came with orders to demand his passenger list. The captain refused to produce it, and formally protested against any right to visit his ship for the purpose indicated. After some conversation, importing renewed protests on the part of the captain against the alleged object of the visit, and on the part of the officer of the San Jacinto that he had only to execute his orders, the latter said that two gentlemen (naming Mr. Slidell and Mr. Mason) were known to be on board, as also two other gentlemen, (naming Mr. Eustis and Mr. McFarland,) and that his orders were to take and carry them on board the San Jacinto. It should have been noted that, on first addressing the captain, the officer announced himself as a lieutenant of the United States steamer San Jacinto; the four gentlemen thus named being present, the lieutenant, addressing Mr. Slidell, and afterward Mr. Mason, repeating that his orders were to take them, together with Mr. Eustis and Mr. McFarland, and carry them on board his ship, which orders he must execute. Mr. Slidell and Mr. Mason, in reply, protested, in the presence of the captain of the Trent, his officers and passengers, against such threatened violation of their persons and of their rights, and informed the lieutenant that they would not leave the ship they were in unless compelled by the employment of actual force greater than they could resist, and Mr. Eustis and Mr. McFarland united with them in expressing a like purpose. That officer stated that he hoped he would not be compelled to resort to the use of force, but if it would become necessary to employ it in order to execute his orders, he was prepared to do so. He was answered by the undersigned that they would submit to such force alone. The lieutenant then went to the gangway where his boats were, the undersigned going at the same time to their state-rooms, on the deck next below, followed by Captain Moir and by the other passengers. The lieutenant returned with a party of his men, a portion of whom were armed with side-arms, and others appearing to be a squad of marines, having muskets and bayonets. Mr. Slidell was at this time in his state-room, immediately by, and in full view. The lieutenant then said to Mr. Mason that, having his force now present, he hoped to be relieved from the necessity of calling it into actual use. That gentleman again answered that he would only submit to actual force greater than he could overcome, when the lieutenant and several of his men, by his order, took hold of him in a manner and in numbers sufficient to make resistance fruitless, and Mr. Slidell joining the group at the same time, one or more of the armed party took like hold of him, and those gentlemen at once went into the boat. During this scene many of the passengers became highly excited, and gave vent to the strongest expressions of indignation, seeming to indicate a purpose of resistance on their part, when the squad armed with muskets, with bayonets fixed, made sensible advance of one or two paces, with their arms at a charge. It must be added here, omitted in the course of the narration, that before the party left the upper deck an officer of the Trent, named Williams, in the naval uniform of Great Britain, and known to the passengers as having charge of the mails and accompanying them to England, said to the lieutenant that, as the only person present directly representing his Government, he felt called upon, in language as strong and as emphatic as he could express, to denounce the whole proceeding as a piratical act.

Mr. Slidell and Mr. Mason, together with Mr. Eustis and Mr. McFarland, against whom force in like manner had been used, were taken to the San Jacinto as soon as they entered the boat. When they reached your ship you received them near the gangway, announcing yourself as Captain Wilkes, the commander of the ship, and conducted them to your cabin, which you placed at their disposal. When the undersigned came on board they found the men at their quarters, and the guns bearing on the Trent. After some time occupied in bringing on board our baggage and effects, the San Jacinto proceeded to the northward, through the Santaren channel, the Trent having been detained from three to four hours.

The foregoing is believed to be a correct narrative in substance of the facts and circumstances attending our arrest and transfer from the British mail steamer to the ship under your command, and which we doubt not will be corroborated by the lieutenant present, as well as by all who witnessed them.

The incidents here given in detail may not have been witnessed by each one of the undersigned individually, but they were by one or more of them. As for the most part they did not pass under your notice, we have deemed it proper to present them in this form before you, expressing the wish that, if considered incorrect in any part, the inaccuracies may be pointed out.

With a respectful request that you will transmit a copy of this paper to the Government of the United States, together with your report of the transaction, to facilitate which a copy is herewith enclosed,

We have the honor to be, very respectfully,
your obedient servants,

JOHN SLIDELL. GEORGE EUSTIS.
J. M. MASON. J. E. MCFARLAND.

Captain WILKES,
U. S. Navy, Commanding San Jacinto.

REPLY OF CAPTAIN WILKES.

UNITED STATES STEAMER SAN JACINTO, }
At sea, November 16, 1861. }

GENTLEMEN: Your letter dated the 9th inst. was handed to me yesterday. I shall transmit it, agreeably to your request, to the Hon. Secretary of the Navy, with my report of the transaction to which it refers.

In reply to your wish to have any inaccuracies it may contain pointed out, I deem it my duty to say the facts differ materially in respect to the time and circumstances.

1st. The facts in my possession are derived from the log-book, (the official record of the ship;) and 2d, from the reports in writing, of all the officers who visited the Trent; all which will form a part of my report.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
CHARLES WILKES.

MESSRS. JOHN SLIDELL, JAMES M. MASON,
GEORGE EUSTIS, and J. E. MCFARLAND.

CAPTAIN WILKES' FINAL REPORT.

UNITED STATES STEAMER SAN JACINTO, }
At sea, November 16, 1861. }

SIR: In my despatch by Commander Taylor I confined myself to the report of the movements of this ship and the facts connected with the capture of Messrs. Mason, Slidell, Eustis, and McFarland, as I intended to write you particularly relative to the reasons which induced my action in making them prisoners.

When I heard at Cienfuegos, on the south side of Cuba, of these commissioners having landed on the Island of Cuba, and that they were at the Havana, and would depart in the English steamer of the 7th November, I determined to intercept them, and carefully examined all the authorities on international law to which I had access, viz.: Kent, Wheaton, and Vattel, beside various decisions of Sir William Scott, and other judges of the admiralty court of Great Britain, which bore upon the rights of neutrals and their responsibilities.

The Governments of Great Britain, France, and Spain, having issued proclamations that the Confederate States were viewed, considered, and treated as belligerents, and knowing that the ports of Great Britain, France, Spain, and Holland in the West Indies, were open to their vessels, and that they were admitted to all the courtesies and protection vessels of the United States received, every aid and attention being given them, proved clearly that they acted upon this view and decision, and brought them within the international law of search and under the responsibilities. I therefore felt no hesitation in boarding and searching all vessels of whatever nation I fell in with, and have done so.

The question arose in my mind whether I had the right to capture the persons of these commissioners—whether they were amenable to capture. There was no doubt I had the right to capture vessels with written despatches; they are expressly referred to in all authorities, subjecting the vessel to seizure and condemnation if the captain of the vessel had the knowledge of their being on board; but these gentlemen were not despatches in the literal sense, and did not seem to come under that designation, and nowhere could I find a case in point.

That they were commissioners I had ample proof from their own avowal, and bent on mischievous and traitorous errands against our country, to overthrow its institutions, and enter into treaties and alliances with foreign States, expressly forbidden by the Constitution.

They had been presented to the captain-general of Cuba by her Britannic Majesty's consul-general, but the captain-general told me that he had not received them in that capacity, but as distinguished gentlemen and strangers.

I then considered them as the embodiment of despatches; and as they had openly declared themselves as charged with all authority from the Confederate Government to form treaties and alliances tending to the establishment of their independence, I became satisfied that their mission was adverse and criminal to the Union, and it therefore became my duty to arrest their progress and capture them if they had no passports or papers from the Federal Government, as provided for under the law of nations, viz.: "That foreign ministers of a belligerent on board of neutral ships are required to possess papers from the other belligerent to permit them to pass free."

Report and assumption gave them the title of ministers to France and England; but inasmuch as they had not been received by either of these powers, I did not conceive that they had any immunity attached to their persons, and were but escaped conspirators, plotting and contriving to overthrow the Government of the United States, and they were therefore not to be considered as having any claim to the immunities attached to the character they thought fit to assume.

As respects the steamer in which they embarked, I ascertained in the Havana that she was a merchant vessel plying between Vera Cruz, the Havana, and St. Thomas, carrying the mail by contract.

The agent of the vessel, the son of the British consul at Havana, was well aware of the character of these persons; that they engaged their passage and did embark in the vessel; his father had visited them and introduced them as ministers of the Confederate States on their way to England and France.

They went in the steamer with the knowledge and by the consent of the captain, who endeavored afterward to conceal them by refusing to exhibit his passenger list, and the papers of the vessel. There can be no doubt he knew they were carrying highly important despatches, and were endowed with instructions inimical to the United States. This rendered his vessel (a neutral) a good prize, and I determined to take possession of her, and, as I mentioned in my report, send her to Key West for adjudication, where, I am well satisfied, she would have been condemned for carrying these persons, and for resisting to be searched. The cargo was also liable, as all the shippers were knowing to the embarkation of these live despatches, and their traitorous motives and actions to the Union of the United States.

I forbore to seize her, however, in consequence of my being so reduced in officers and crew, and the derangement it would cause innocent persons, there being a large number of passengers who would have been put to great loss and inconvenience, as well as disappointment, from the interruption it would have caused them in not being able to join the steamer from St. Thomas to Europe. I therefore concluded to sacrifice the interests of my officers and crew in the prize, and suffered the steamer to proceed, after the necessary detention to effect the transfer of these commissioners, considering I had obtained the important end I had in view, and which affected the interests of our country and interrupted the action of that of the Confederates.

I would add that the conduct of her Britannic Majesty's subjects, both official and others, showed but little regard or obedience to her proclamation, by aiding and abetting the views and endeavoring to conceal the persons of these commissioners.

I have pointed out sufficient reasons to show you that my action in this case was derived from a firm conviction that it became my duty to make these parties prisoners, and to bring them to the United States.

Although in my giving up this valuable prize I have deprived the officers and crew of a well-earned reward, I am assured they are quite content to forego any advantages which might have accrued to them under the circumstances.

I may add that, having assumed the responsibility, I am willing to abide the result.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
 CHARLES WILKES,

HON. GIDEON WELLES, Captain.
 Secretary of the Navy.

UNITED STATES STEAMER SAN JACINTO, }
 November 15, 1861. }

SIR: Before leaving your ship, we think it proper that we should state that since we have been on board of her, we have uniformly been treated with great courtesy and attention.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,
 JOHN SLIDELL, J. M. MASON,
 J. E. MCFARLAND, GEORGE EUSTIS.

Captain WILKES,
 Commanding United States Steamer San Jacinto.

The following congratulatory letter was sent to Captain Charles Wilkes, of the San Jacinto, by the Secretary of the Navy:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 30, 1861.

Capt. Charles Wilkes, Commanding U. S. S. San Jacinto, Boston:

DEAR SIR: I congratulate you on your safe arrival, and especially do I congratulate you on the great public service you have rendered in the capture of the rebel commissioners, Messrs. Mason and Slidell, who have been conspicuous in the conspiracy to dissolve the Union, and it is well known that, when seized by you, they were on a mission hostile to the Government and the country.

Your conduct in seizing these public enemies was marked by intelligence, ability, decision, and firmness, and has the emphatic approval of this Department. It is not necessary that I should in this communication—which is intended to be one of congratulation to yourself, officers, and crew—express an opinion on the course pursued in omitting to capture the vessel which had these public enemies on board, further than to say that the forbearance exercised in this instance must not be permitted to constitute a precedent hereafter for infractions of neutral obligations.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,
 GIDEON WELLES.

STATEMENT OF THE PURSER OF THE TRENT.

ROYAL MAIL STEAMSHIP TRENT, }
 At sea, NOVEMBER 8, 1861. }

To the Editor of the London Times:

SIR: I hasten to forward you some particulars of the grievous outrage committed to-day against the English flag by the United States steam sloop San Jacinto, Captain Wilkes.

You have probably heard how, some three weeks ago, the little steamer Theodora, having on board the commissioners sent by the Confederate States of America to London and Paris, ran the blockade at Charleston, arriving safely in Havana. Once arrived there, they of course imagined that on neutral territory they were perfectly free and safe from all molestation, and therefore made no attempt to conceal their names, position, and intended movements. Mr. Slidell, the commissioner for Paris, was accompanied by his wife, son, and three daughters, and also by his secretary, Mr. G. Eustis, with his wife; Mr. Mason, the commissioner for England, being accompanied by his secretary, Mr. McFarland. It is well known in Havana that berths were booked for the whole party to proceed by this steamer to St. Thomas, there to join the homeward West India mail steamship for Southampton. They accordingly embarked yesterday morning, trusting to receive the same protection under the English flag which they had already received from that of Spain.

We left Havana yesterday morning at eight. This morning, about half-past eleven, we observed a large steamship ahead, and on a nearer approach found she was hove-to, evidently awaiting us. We were then in the narrowest part of the Bahama Channel, abreast of Paredon Grande lighthouse. As soon as we were well within range we had the first intimation of her nationality and intentions by a round shot being fired across our bows, and at the same moment by her showing American colors. We were now sufficiently near to observe that all her ports were open, guns run out, and crew at their stations. On a still nearer approach she fired a shell from a swivel gun of large calibre on her fore-castle, which passed within a few yards of the ship, bursting about a hundred yards to leeward.

We were now within hail, when Capt. Moir, commanding this ship, asked the American what he meant by stopping his ship, and why he did so by firing shotted guns, contrary to usual custom. The reply was that he wished to send a boat on board of us. This was immediately followed by a boat pushing off from the side of the San Jacinto, containing between twenty and thirty men heavily armed, under the command of the first lieutenant, who came up on the quarter-deck, and after asking for Capt. Moir, demanded a list of passengers. As his "right of search" was denied, the information required was, of course, preemptorily refused. He then stated that he had information that Messrs. Slidell, Mason, Eustis, and McFarland were on board, and demanded that they should be given up. This also being indignantly refused, Mr. Slidell himself came forward and said that the four gentlemen named were then before him, but appealed to the British flag under which they were sailing for protection. The lieutenant said that his orders were to take them on board the San Jacinto by force if they would not surrender. He then walked to the side of the ship and waved his hand; immediately three more heavily armed boats pushed off and surrounded the ship, and the party of marines who came in the first boat came up and took possession of the quarter-deck; these, however, he ordered down on the main deck, to take charge of the gangway ports. Capt. Williams, R. N., the naval agent in charge of the mails, who was of course present during this interview, then, in the name of her Majesty, he being the only person on board directly representing her, made a vehement protestation against this piratical act.

During the whole of this time the San Jacinto was about two hundred yards distant from us on the port beam, her broadside guns, which were all manned, directly bearing upon us. Any open resistance to such a force was of course hopeless, although from the loud and repeated plaudits which followed Capt. Williams' protestation, and which were joined in by every one, without exception, of the passengers congregated on the quarter-deck, men of all nations, and from the manifested desire of some to resist to the last, I have no doubt but that every person would have joined heart and soul in the struggle had our commander but given the order. Such an order he could not, under such adverse circumstances, conscientiously give, and it was therefore considered sufficient that a party of marines with bayonets fixed should forcibly lay hands on the gentlemen named. This was done, and the gentlemen retired to their cabins to arrange some few changes of clothing.

A most heart-rending scene now took place between Mr. Slidell, his eldest daughter, a noble girl devoted to her father, and the lieutenant. It would require a far more able pen than mine to describe how, with flashing eyes and quivering lips, she threw herself in the doorway of the cabin where her father was, resolved to defend him with her life, till, on the order being given to the marines to advance, which they did with bayonets pointed at this poor defenceless girl, her father ended the painful scene by escaping from the cabin by a window, when he was immediately seized by the marines and hurried to the boat, calling out to Capt. Moir as he left that he held him and his Government responsible for this outrage.

If further proof were required of the meanness and cowardly bullying in the line of conduct pursued by the captain of the San Jacinto, I may remark, first, that on being asked if they would have committed this outrage if we had been a man-of-war, they replied, "certainly not;" and, secondly, that Capt. Wilkes sent an order for Capt. Moir to go on board his ship, and a second for Capt. Moir to move the Trent closer to the San Jacinto. Of course not the slightest notice was taken of either order, nor did they attempt to enforce them.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
THE PURSER OF THE TRENT.

PROTEST OF COMMANDER WILLIAMS.

The following is a copy of the protest, as given in the London Star, of Commander Williams, of the British Navy, who was in charge of the English mails on board the steamer Trent, against the arrest of Messrs. Mason and Slidell:

"In this ship I am the representative of her Majesty's Government, and I call upon the officers of the ship and passengers generally to mark my words, when, in the name of the British Government, and in distinct language, I denounce this as an illegal act, an act in violation of international law; an act indeed of wanton piracy, which, had we the means of defence, you would not dare to attempt."

SPEECH OF COMMANDER WILLIAMS.

At a public dinner given by the Royal Western Yacht Club of England, at Millbay, Plymouth, on December 12th, Commander Williams, mail agent on board the royal steamer Trent, in response to the toast of "The health of our gallant and worthy guest, Commander Williams," made the following remarks:

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Vice-Chairman, gentlemen, and brother members of this the Royal Western Yacht Club, it is not with the feelings of arrogance and presumption which Mr. Fairfax has thought proper to impute to me that I will now endeavor, as well as severe illness will permit me, to convey to your minds the deeply-seated gratitude that I feel, not only to the chairman for the complimentary language and too partial language used by him, whom I have ever found for the last four or five years my kind and considerate friend, but also from the manner in which the mention of my name has been received by you—you, many of whom are old and tried friends of mine, and many whose faces I have never met before. Therefore I take it to be not so much a personal matter, but a national matter—(hear, hear)—that you have taken this opportunity of throwing around my shoulders the mantle of your approbation. (Renewed applause.) Gentlemen, if I fail to convey to you—if I fail to convey to you from the poverty of my language the throbbings that swell up from the well of my heart, I beg you to believe that I am sincere in all that I shall say. (Bravo, and hear, hear.) This compliment was never looked for by me. ("We believe it, Williams.") I will endeavor to be as little egotistical as possible, but in the present instance it may be necessary that I should speak, in some measure of myself, in consequence of what has been said about me in the New York papers, and which has been referred to by Punch. The New York papers have thought proper to allude to me in unwarranted language, and which I fear has been countenanced by Mr. Fairfax. Before I say one word about Mr. Fairfax, or the proceedings which took place on board the Trent, and which, perhaps, you would like to hear from my own lips—"We should," and applause)—and the manner in which the Trent was boarded, I crave your indulgence to allow me to refer to notes

I am not a practised speaker. I have never had to speak on any occasion like the present, and, therefore, I must crave your indulgence to allow me to refer to notes which I have this day made from extracts taken from different papers, in order that I might not omit any portion of such evidence as I should wish to lay before you. I throw myself on your indulgence. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) I believe, at all events, that I have on my side truth and power. To convince you of that truth—I cannot give you the chapter and verse of these extracts that I am going to read to you, because I have neither had time, nor have I had the health to put myself to the task of taking any notes of the particulars of the dates in such papers. (Hear, hear.) But I read in the press the opinions of the Americans—I mean the Northern portion of the Union, the Federal States. In alluding to the attack on the Trent it says: "If the act itself is justifiable, the manner in which it was performed is unexceptionable." (Oh! and derisive laughter.) As to the manner in which it was performed: I was, at the time Captain Moir came to me to say that a suspicious vessel was ahead, on the main deck, with a pipe in my mouth reading the "Essays and Reviews." I did not think for one moment that such an atrocious thing would have been done as that which was enacted by the gallant officers of the San Jacinto to take as prisoners of war, contrary and in violation of international law, the so-styled Commissioners from the Confederate States. The argument that appeared or presented itself to my mind—the argument of the moment—as a flash of lightning, was that if a slave, a fugitive slave, once succeeds in putting his foot in a free State—putting aside Great Britain—that slave from that moment was free from his bondage. (Enthusiastic cheering.) The manner in which it is performed is "unexceptionable." Shortly after the San Jacinto was seen, a very few minutes after the vessel was descried, we hoisted our ensign. It was not responded to. As we approached the San Jacinto a shot was fired across our bows. I appeal to you now—to you, officers of the army and navy—is it usual for a neutral power, when wishing to speak with another vessel, to fire a shot across her bows to order her to heave to? (No, no, certainly not.) We proceeded slowly. We put her helm a starboard and approached her. We were not half a cable's length from her; I would say she stopped—except that she had steerage way—when a shell was fired across her bows—(shame)—and that is the way which it has been thought proper to style as unexceptionable. (Ironical laughter.) I make them a present of that. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) Captain Wilkes says: "In the process of arrest he was glad to say every thing was conducted properly, and nothing occurred which did not do honor to the American navy." (Oh! oh!) I will not dilate upon that. If they think that honor, let them hug it to their souls; but God forbid that her Britannic Majesty's navy should hug as honor such an act to their souls. (Bravo, and repeated applause.) Now, gentlemen, I approach a subject with great diffidence, for it personally affects my honor, it personally affects my character. (Hear, hear.) Before I say one word regarding the notes which I have before me, I will tell you the manner in which Mr. Fairfax and I parted. (Hear.) Mr. Fairfax came to me on the main deck, hat in hand, and said: "Sir, I have had a painful duty to perform, and if in the excitement of the moment I have said aught that by possibility"—I can't say this is word by word what he said, but it is the substance—(hear, and "that's all we want")—"if I have said aught that by possibility can be construed into a personal offence or an insult toward you, I most humbly beg your pardon, sir, for I never meant it." I replied: "Mr. Fairfax, I have had a painful scene to witness—a scene of degradation to my country's flag. (Hear, hear.) I do not deny that my feelings have been greatly excited, but if by any gesture I have done aught to offend you as a man, there is my hand, sir, and I crave your forgiveness." I ask you now, gentlemen, that Mr. Fairfax—I do not say that he has said so—but I say he has countenanced it in the American papers, he has countenanced the expression, "Gasconader." (Loud cries, "Have they dared?" and shame, shame.) He (Mr. Fairfax) says "that my manner was so violent he was compelled to request Captain Moir to remove me from the deck"—(oh! oh!)—and "that there was no union existing between Captain Moir and myself." Gentlemen, I utterly deny that there ever occurred one single instance of a want of unity between Capt. Moir and myself—(bravo, and "that's a refutation")—and I am proud to have this opportunity of saying that I can bear testimony to the high character of Captain Moir—(cheers)—the most gallant sailor, the most urbane gentleman, with all the courtesies of life to endear him to those with whom he is associated, it has ever been my lot to meet in this world. (Repeated cheers.) I confess that I have been advised to speak at no length on account of my health. But I cannot help it, let the consequences be what they may. (Hear, hear.) I must explain to you what has never yet appeared in the public papers. (Hear, hear.) It is said by the American papers—but I cannot put my hand on it now, though I have read it over and over again—it is said, "That Captain Wilkes could not have received instructions from his Government at Washington, for that he was on his return from the Western Coast of Africa, wending his way through the Bahama Channel to New York." What do you think? I do not know whether it has come before your notice at all; but what do you believe? How will you put trust in the veracity of such men who will write such things, when on the 16th of October I saw the San Jacinto off St. Thomas? I cannot remember now whether it was on the night of the 16th or on the morning of the 17th. I went on my way to Mexico, going to Havana, Vera Cruz, Tampico. On my return to Havana, on the 6th of November, I found that the San Jacinto had been to Havana from St. Thomas; that she had coaled there, and that two of her officers, passing themselves off as Southerners in their hearts, had lunched with Mr. Slidell and family, and extracted from them their intended movements. (Sensation; "Hear, hear;" and "That never came out before;" "Bravo.") I again say that I am going to approach a subject with great diffidence. I am going to speak of Mrs. Slidell and her daughters. (Hear, hear, and "Cheers for them.") I tell you, sir, that Miss Slidell branded one of the officers to his face with his infamy, having been her father's guest not ten days before. ("Disgraceful," and "Bravo for Miss Slidell.") No words of mine shall pass my lips on a political point. I have no political feelings. I do as I am ordered. Mr. Fairfax denied that the marines made a rush toward Miss Slidell at the charge, with fixed bayonets. I believe when I lay my hand on my heart (suited the action to the word) and say, as I hope for mercy in the day of judgment, it is true that they did so. (Hear, hear.) Miss Slidell—and no girl in this world has been pained more at the mention of her name in the public papers than she has been by the manner in which some persons have alluded to it, not pained by their having stated the manner in which she acted—(cheers)—but some of the public papers described her as having slapped Mr. Fairfax's face. (Cries of "Serve him right if she did," and "Bravo.") She did strike Mr. Fairfax. ("Loud cheers for her then.") She did strike Mr. Fairfax—(cheers)—but she did not do it with the vulgarity of gesture which has been attributed to her. Miss Slidell was with her father in the cabin, with her arm encircling his neck, and she wished to be taken to prison with her father. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Fairfax attempted to get into the cabin—I do not say forcibly, for I do not say a word against Mr. Fairfax, so far as his manner is concerned—he attempted to get her away by inducements. In her agony, then, she did strike him in the face three times. I wish that Miss Slidell's little knuckles had struck me in the face. I should like to have the mark forever. (Oh! and laughter.) It has been argued in the public papers that if Captain Moir and I—I am not finding fault with the papers, I am finding fault with the letters which have appeared in the local papers; I am not finding fault with the feelings of the country, for the general voice of the country has thrown over me what you have done this night, as I said before, the mantle of your approbation which is dear to me. (Applause.) It has been argued whether we should not have done our duty more clearly if we had refused a passage to these so-styled Commissioners from the Southern States. Now on this point I have a very strong opinion. I know that there are at this table members of the legal profession, but I am not going to offer any opinion of my own. I am going to offer to your notice a fact of which I am perfectly cognizant, and which occurred in the year 1833—either at the latter end of the year 1833 or the beginning of the year 1834. At that time Donna Maria was on the throne of Portugal. In 1833, Dom Miguel was expelled from that country, and yet a noted agent of Dom Miguel applied to the Peninsular and Oriental Company for a passage to Lisbon in the Tagus steamer. The passage was refused. That agent prosecuted the company. I do not mean to say that this is decidedly a point in support, but a fortiori it strengthens my argument. He prosecuted the company for having refused him a passage, and after a long hearing the political agent was cast, but the only plea on which he was cast was the plea of the company that if they had not refused him they would have been refused admittance to the Tagus, and, consequently, have been subjected to a prosecution, collectively and individually, by passengers who had paid their money to be taken to Lisbon. A fortiori I say that it is a case in point. (Hear, hear.) It shows that Captain Moir had no right or power whatever to refuse these so-styled Confederate Commissioners passage to England. (Cheers.) Moreover, so far from any disunion between Captain Moir and myself, I should have had nothing to do officially with either accepting or refusing them as passengers. (Hear, hear.) But I should have offered my advice most strenuously to Captain Moir that he would have been subjected to a prosecution if he should refuse to take them. But I hold myself personally responsible for every thing that was done. (Cheers.) If what was done was wrong I am willing to bear it. (Cheers.) If what was done was right, he and I acted together. (Loud applause.) The Hampshire Advertiser says, "That I stepped out of my proper position, and presumed to make myself a diplomatic character"—that I was merely a deliverer of her Majesty's letters. (Oh.) Well, I am not ashamed to be a deliverer of her Majesty's letters. (Much applause, and cries of "Well done.") I have not shirked my duty to my country. I have served twenty-eight years under the pennant in my own service, and I am too old to undergo the expense of commanding a ship, even if I had the interest to get the appointment to one. I accepted my present appointment in order to educate my orphan boy—[his nephew. The young gentleman was sitting by his side, and the remark occasioned a continued outburst of applause of an enthusiastic character.] I thank you for allowing him to be present and sit by my side. Although some may blame me for it, I tender you my most humble thanks. (Cheers.) Well, I must speak of Mrs. Slidell. You may be aware that those ladies were under my charge for three weeks—three weeks of close intercourse on board ship with ladies under your charge give you a greater insight into their character and their feelings than casual intimacy on shore. (Hear, hear.) Whatever other people may say of Mrs. Slidell and her daughters, I assure you that so far as my humble judgment goes they were thoroughly well-bred ladies. (Applause.) Now, what will you think of this? When I landed I was sent up to London in a special train. I had previously recommended Mrs. Slidell and her daughters to a hotel in London, believing it to be a quiet hotel, and where they might get apartments en suite. (Hear.) Well, I was sent in a special train to report the circumstances to the Government. On the day after I had arrived in London, I dined with Mrs. Slidell; for on the day on which I did arrive in London I was engaged at the foreign office with Lord Palmerston and the Lords of the Admiralty until a late hour. I say then that on the day after I dined with Mrs. Slidell. I am somewhat diffident in telling you what took place. You will hardly believe that a gentleman of the Northern States, aye, a so-called gentleman, had called upon Mrs. Slidell that afternoon, and, as if their feelings were not harrowed enough by being separated from their father and protector, some demon must come to make the ranking in their hearts more bitter by telling them the decision of the law-officers of the crown. He said he came to offer his condolence (!) and to inform them that the law-officers of the crown had decided "that the seizure of her husband was not contrary to international law." (Cries of disgraceful and shameful.) Gentlemen, I was enabled to tell Mrs. Slidell—and perhaps you will pardon me if I repeat the expression here—(yes)—that it was a — infernal lie!—"Oh," and a laugh)—for I had just come from the foreign office, where I had learnt the decision of the law-officers of the crown—(hear)—and which was diametrically opposite to what the man dared to say. (Cheers.) Now, gentlemen, I have only one more subject that I know of on which to speak—the circumstances attending the gallant Federal marines rushing with the points of their bayonets at Miss Slidell. (Hear, hear.) It was at this point that she screamed, for her father snatched himself away from her—I do not mean snatched himself rudely; but he snatched himself away from her to break the window of his cabin, through which he thrust his body out. But the hole was so small that I hardly thought it would admit the circumference of his waist. It was then the lady screamed. I am charged by Mr. Fairfax, "that my manner was so violent that he was compelled to request Captain Moir to remove me." (Nonsense.) But when the marines rushed on at the point of their bayonets—and I believe it is not necessary that I should make a solemn asseveration that it is true—(no, no)—when they rushed on at the point of the bayonet, I had just time to put my body between their bayonets and Miss Slidell—(oh!)—and I said to them, and if Henry of Exeter were here I would ask him for his absolution for it—(laughter)—I said to them, "Back, you — cowardly poltroons." ("Bravo," and "Capital.") I need not ask you, gentlemen, if I am acquitted of bullying. I bullied no one. (Hear, hear.) I need not ask you whether you acquit me now. I beg once more to express my thanks to you for the mantle of your approbation which you have thrown over my shoulders.—Captain Williams then resumed his seat, amidst repeated applause, but immediately rose again and said: Allow me one moment. It is sufficient for me that I have received such approbation, but it may be satisfactory to you to know that I have received the approbation of my Government. (Hear, hear, and cheers.)

THE CRUISE OF THE SAN JACINTO.

UNITED STATES STEAMER SAN JACINTO, }
Wednesday, Nov. 20, 1861. }

The San Jacinto, a first-class screw steam-sloop, mounting fifteen guns, lately attached to the United States African Squadron, under the command of Flag-officer William Inman, left St. Paul de Loando on the 10th of August last, on her return to the United States, in the temporary command of Lieut. D. M. Fairfax, U. S. N., who was ordered to await at Fernando Po, the arrival of Capt. Charles Wilkes, U. S. N. On the 26th of August, Capt. Charles Wilkes took command of this ship, Lieut. Fairfax returning to his former position as executive officer. We left Fernando Po on the 20th August, cruising close to the shore for the purpose of ascertaining if any of the Confederate privateers had taken any prizes to that coast. Arrived at Monrovia, Liberia, on the 12th, and at St. Vincent, Cape Verd, on the 25th September. Seeing by the papers, that several Confederate privateers had run the blockade, and taken several prizes in the West India Islands, Capt. Wilkes determined to cruise about these islands, and to capture some of them before returning with the San Jacinto to New York. We arrived at St. Thomas on the 10th of October, and found the Powhatan and Iroquois there. On the 11th, the British brig Spartan arrived in port; her master called on Capt. Wilkes and informed him that on the 5th of October, while in latitude 9° 33' N., and longitude 47° 25' W., he was boarded by a steamer, evidently a war vessel in disguise, and after answering all questions, he could get no other information in return but that they were on a cruise. Capt. Wilkes showed him a photograph of the Sumter, which he immediately recognized as the vessel by which he was boarded. Capt. Wilkes then advised Com. Palmer, of the Iroquois, to cruise immediately after her, the Iroquois being the fastest steamer of the three, and to follow her as far as Rio even, if necessary, at the same time the San Jacinto cruised in the West Indies and Caribbean Sea to overhaul the Sumter, in the event of her returning there. The Iroquois left St. Thomas on the 13th, and we on the 14th of October, in company with the Powhatan. Since leaving St. Thomas, we cruised in the vicinity of the Windward Islands, and visited Port Royal and Kingston, in the Island of Jamaica, the Grand Cayman, Trinidad, Cienfuegos, Key West, Lobos, Sagua la Grande and the Bahamas. Although for twenty months engaged in an active cruise for slavers on the West Coast of Africa, and much reduced in the number of her officers and crew, the San Jacinto has been for the last six weeks continuously cruising in search of the Sumter. On our arrival at Cienfuegos, we learned by the papers, that the Theodora had run the blockade at Charleston, and arrived at Havana, after landing the Confederate Commissioners, Messrs. Mason and Slidell, with their secretaries, Messrs. Eustis and McFarland, and the families of Mr. Slidell and Mr. Eustis, at Cardenas, and that they would proceed overland to Havana. As soon as Capt. Wilkes heard of it, he determined to pursue the Theodora, and intercept her return to Charleston. He took, therefore, sufficient coal to go on a short cruise, and left Cienfuegos on the 26th of October, arrived at Havana on the 28th, and learned that the Theodora had departed on her return to Charleston, after being well received by the authorities of Havana, and being presented at the Tacon theatre, by the ladies of the Secession States, with a splendid Confederate flag. Messrs. Slidell, Mason and suite were still at Havana, boarding at the Hotel Cubana, kept by Mrs. Brewer. One of our officers visited the hotel with some of his friends, and met Mr. Mason in the parlor. We learned from our Consul-General, that the Confederate Commissioners were waited upon by H. B. M. Consul, Mr. Crawford, in full dress, and officially introduced by him to Capt.-Gen. Serrano, of Cuba. When Capt. Wilkes heard of their intention to take passage in the British packet for Europe, he conceived the bold plan to intercept the British mail steamer, and in the event of these four persons being on board, to make them prisoners. We filled up with coal in great haste, took in provisions, (as a part of our daily rations for the crew were exhausted,) and left Havana on the 2d inst. On the 4th, in the morning, a steam gunboat being in sight from the mast-head, we all were in hopes that it would prove to be the Theodora, and orders were given to beat to quarters. Scarcely four minutes elapsed, and the San Jacinto was ready to receive her foe; but we were doomed to disappointment—it turned out to be H. B. M. gunboat Stag, bound from Key West for Havana. We arrived the same day at Key West in search of the Powhatan or some other steamer to assist us in intercepting the British packet. There being another passage through the New Bahama Channels, Capt. Wilkes' plan was, that a steamer should cruise there, while the San Jacinto was cruising in the Old Bahamas, so that the mail packet could not escape our vigilance; but the Powhatan having left for Key West the day before, and no steamer except the Huntsville (and she caulking) being in port, our captain, nothing daunted, fully resolved to undertake the boldly-conceived enterprise alone. On the morning of the 5th, we left Key West, and running to the north side of the Island of Cuba, touched at Sagua la Grande, for the purpose of telegraphing to our Consul-General at Havana, Mr. Schufelt, to inform us of the time of the British mail steamer's departure from Havana, but received no information. From thence we steered for the Old Bahama Channel, about twenty miles from Havana, and about ten from the lighthouse of Paredon del Grande. The channel contracts there to the width of fifteen miles, and we could not very well miss the object of our search. There we lay off and on, during the night of the seventh, all our battery loaded, and the bulwarks around the pivot-gun on the fore-castle removed. Capt. Wilkes issued an order to Lieut. D. M. Fairfax, our executive officer, to have two boats ready manned and armed, to board the British packet as soon as she should be hove to under our guns, and in the event of Messrs. Mason, Slidell, Eustis, and McFarland being on board of her, to make them prisoners, and send them immediately on board the San Jacinto, and also to offer in his name to their families his cabin, in the event they should determine to take a passage to the United States in the San Jacinto, assuring them that all the attention and comforts we could command would be placed at their service, and closed the order with the following remark: "I trust that all those under your command, in executing this important and delicate duty, will conduct themselves with all the delicacy and kindness which become our naval service." In accordance with this order, Lieut. Fairfax had the second and third cutters of the ship manned, armed, and kept in readiness, he having the command of the enterprise. In the second cutter were the following officers: Lieut. D. M. Fairfax, commanding; Second Assistant Engineer James Buchanan Houston; Boatswain H. P. Grace, with an armed crew. In the third cutter: Lieut. James A. Greer; Third Assistant Engineer George W. Hall; Paymaster's Clerk R. G. Simpson; Master's Mate Charles B. Dahlgren, with an armed crew, marines, and a party of machinists. In the morning of the 8th inst., the officers and crew of this ship were anxiously and impatiently looking out for the mail steamer. About twenty minutes to twelve the lookout at the mast-head reported a smoke as from a steamer from the westward, and about twelve p. m. she was visible from the deck. We were all ready for her, beat to quarters, and, as soon as she was within reach of our guns, every gun of our starboard battery was trained upon her. A shot from our pivot-gun was fired across her bow. She hoisted English colors, but showed no disposition to slacken her speed or heave to. We hoisted the "Star-Spangled Banner," and, as soon as she was close upon us, fired a shell across her bow, which brought her to. Our captain hailed her and said he would send a boat on board, and ordered Lieut. Fairfax to board her. He went in the second cutter; at the same time Lieut. Greer was already in the third cutter, to shove from the port side should his assistance be required. On coming alongside the packet, Lieut. Fairfax ordered the other officers to remain in the boat with the crew until force should become necessary, and went on board alone. The captain of the mail steamer refused to show his papers and passenger list, knowing very well the object of our visit, and the character and mission of the four gentlemen above named. But Mr. Mason being recognized, a part of the armed crew was ordered from the boat and came on board. Messrs. Mason and Slidell were then persuaded to come on board the San Jacinto, but declined, and said that they would only yield by force, Mr. Slidell making the remark that "it would require considerable force to take him on board the San Jacinto." Lieut. Fairfax then ordered Mr. Houston to return to our ship, and report that the Confederate Commissioners were on board the mail steamer, and refused to come on board the San Jacinto by other means than force. Lieut. Greer then shoved off and went alongside the Trent, sent his armed crew and marines on board, and stationed them at both gangways, and then, after a "gentle application" of force, the four gentlemen were taken in the second cutter and conveyed on board of our ship, where they were received by Captain Wilkes at the gangway, and shown into his cabin, where they are at the present time. Two other boats were then sent on board to remove the luggage, and, the ladies having declined the hospitalities offered them, at half-past three o'clock we parted company from the Trent. During the time our officers were on board the Trent, the British passengers expressed their sympathies with the seceded States in the strongest possible manner, and our officers were much abused and threatened by the crowd; they were called pirates, robbers, and other opprobrious epithets, expressing great satisfaction at our loss at Bull Run and Leesburg. Our captain expressed much satisfaction at the gallant and efficient manner which Lieut. Fairfax, (a Virginian by birth,) and all the officers and crew under his command, displayed in the execution of this delicate and important duty, and called the particular attention of the Navy Department to it. After parting company with the Trent, we ran through the Santaren Passage, cruised to the northward along the shores of Florida and South Carolina as far as Charleston; our gallant captain, not satisfied with the important capture, fully determined to take part in the expedition against Port Royal, but, to the regret of "all hands" on board, we came too late. The Susquehanna and Alabama were off Charleston, and the Florida off Hatteras. After leaving Charleston Bay, we encountered strong head-winds, and our coal being exhausted, we put into Hampton Roads the next day, took in coal, and after battling forty hours with a severe north-wester, arrived at Sandy Hook, N. Y., about 7:30 P. M. on the 18th. On entering the Narrows, we were boarded by a steam-tug, with Marshal Murray and Deputy-Marshal Sanford on board. They delivered to Capt. Wilkes despatches from the Secretary of the Navy, Gideon Welles, and Secretary of State, William H. Seward. As soon as Capt. Wilkes read these despatches, he turned the ship's head to Boston, where Marshal Murray was ordered to deliver the "illustrious prisoners" at Fort Warren.

The following is a list of the officers of the San Jacinto: Captain, Charles Wilkes; Lieutenant and Executive Officer, D. M. Fairfax; Lieutenants, R. R. Breese, James A. Greer, A. P. Cook; Paymaster, L. I. Brown; Assistant Surgeon, James W. Herty; Chief Engineer, John Faran; First Assistant Engineers, William C. Wheeler, M. Kellogg; Second Assistant Engineer, James Buchanan Houston; Third Assistant Engineers, John Roop, George W. Hall, Benjamin Kavanaugh; Captain's Clerk, E. Mellich; Paymaster's Clerk, R. G. Simpson; Master's Mates, E. A. Noe, Charles B. Dahlgren; Boatswain, H. P. Grace; Gunner, J. B. Boorum; Carpenter, William F. Loughton; Sailmaker, George B. Boevum.*

THE BATTLE AT PIKETON, MO.

REPORT OF CHAPLAIN BAYLESS.

IVY MOUNTAIN, Big Sandy, Floyd County,
November 9, 1861.

ON the morning of the 8th we left Prestonburg, and took up the line of march for Pike-ton, and were in motion as early as five o'clock, moving forward rapidly. Col. Marshall's battalion, composed of Companies A, B, C and D, of his own regiment, and Capt. Berryhill's company of the Second Ohio Volunteers, constituted his command, and were placed in advance of the Second, Twenty-first and Fifty-ninth regiments of Ohio Volunteers. Upon our boys devolved the duty of climbing the mountains as scouts; to do which, and keep at the same time in advance of the main column, required of them the most exhausting toil. General Nelson, in order to form a junction with a force which he had moved forward in advance of us about twenty-four hours, was compelled to make a forced march. As our rout was somewhat circuitous, distance could only be overcome by speed.

All our movements were rapid—sometimes advancing at the double-quick step. Our boys who scaled the mountains, often making extended detours to head the gullies, had to bound like the deer, to keep ahead of those travelling in a straight road and on a plain surface. I felt for them, as they came in from the mountains, wet with perspiration, faint, exhausted, yet determined.

About twelve miles from Prestonburg we came upon about fifty of the enemy's cavalry scouts. The guard and Colonel Marshall opened fire upon them, and put them to flight. Suspecting that some of the foe were still lurking in ambush, the moral effect of a shell was tried, with what effect upon their nerves, if any were near, I cannot tell. After this little episode, we urged our way toward Piketon, the expected field of definite action; but when we had proceeded between two and three miles, and the head of Colonel Marshall's battalion was approaching the upper part of the mountains, the guide and Captains Gault and Reed, being considerably in advance, discovered that the foe, who were a thousand strong, were concealed behind rocks, trees and bushes, reserving their fire for a further advance of the column.

Captain Gault, who fortunately was armed with a five-shooter Colt's revolving rifle, opened fire upon them, discharging the contents of his gun, and about the same time both the guide and Mr. Reed discharged their muskets upon the foe, which brought them into a more precipitate action than was laid down in their programme. The horse of Captain Gault was shot from under him, and the guide received two of the enemy's balls, which brought him to the ground. Reed's horse was also killed; and such was their perilous and exposed condition, that both were under the necessity of taking shelter under the cover of a shelving rock, which induced Reed to suggest to the captain, in his peculiar style, "that they were both gone up, sir!" Colonel Marshall urged on his column, which was between a quarter and a half mile in advance of the Second Ohio, when the battle commenced.

Captain Gault was cut off from his command, and in order to rejoin it, with the least prospect of safety, had to swim the river, encumbered with his sword and carrying Col. Marshall's revolving rifle in his hand, and then return, and reach this side of the river at a point lower down. By this time the engagement between Col. Marshall's command, on the narrow road at the base of the mountain and immediately on the banks of the river, and the foe, who had intrenched themselves upon the top and along the brow of the mountain, became general, and three of Capt. Gault's men fell at the very commencement of the action, and a number more of them were wounded. This company, from their position, had to bear the brunt of the battle, and courageously and persistently did they do so.

Captain Berryhill's company of the Second Ohio, which had been placed in Col. Marshall's command, bore themselves most gallantly, and rendered most effective service by scaling the mountains, where, under the command of their fearless and intrepid captain, they accomplished deeds of noble daring. In point of suffering the company stand second on the list, as will be seen by the more detailed account of the result of the engagement. It is copied from Major Harris' official report, prepared to be submitted to General Nelson. It soon became evident that the foe was faltering before our fire, when we were opened upon from the opposite side of the river, and thus exposed to both fires, our command maintained their ground until the artillery was brought into action, greatly to our relief. The slain of the enemy left on the battle-field on this side of the river, whom we buried, are nine, and of the three wounded prisoners who were cared for by us, two have died, making the number of their dead, so far as our personal knowledge extends, to be eleven. It is stated, however, that they acknowledge their loss in wounded, prisoners, and slain as many as sixty. The Second and Twenty-first Ohio participated in the action, doing good service. The Fifty-ninth, who came up later, by a well-directed volley, silenced the foe, who, by their fire, were trying to pick off the artillerymen from the other side of the river.

In this contest our boys faced the fire, and showed a spirit of determined bravery, every way worthy of Kentucky's ancient fame. They fought—they conquered. Among the incidents not detailed in Major Harris' report, I must mention that he is among the slightly wounded. That he is alive is doubtless owing to the fact that a silver spectacle-case and a well-filled pocket obstructed the passage of the ball, so that only the point of the bullet was imbedded in the flesh. Col. Marshall's Kentucky jeans are badly riddled; both his upper and nether garments look decidedly the worse for the contest. Even his cap was ventilated, and his noble steed fell a victim to the enemy's fire. To the great gratification of all his command, he still lives unscathed and unharmed. I know that he will ever cherish with the most grateful emotions the many instances of devotion shown him by the gallant soldiers whom he led and cheered by his voice and presence during the battle. He heard the cry time and again, as he passed along the line among his soldiers: "Colonel, we are with you;" "Colonel, we will stand by you;" "Colonel, get out of the way, they are shooting right at you," etc.

This engagement lasted one hour and a half. After our men were brought into action, they never yielded one inch of ground, although they were exposed to the enemy's cross fire, both from their mountain ambuscade and the opposite side of the river. The advance, under Col. Marshall, including Captain Berryhill's company, was less than five hundred, while our information is that the assault was made upon us by a force of one thousand, who had chosen their ground well. We routed them, taking four prisoners, beside the three who were founded.

Among the wounded was a Captain Rust, since dead, late a Senator from Greenup County. Captain May was doubtless in command. List of the killed and wounded.—Co. A, Captain Gault, Col. Marshall's regiment, four killed and ten wounded, viz.: Edward Hall, Wm. Prather, Peter Bentz, John McCarty, killed. Corporal Thomas Donaldson, Amos Stevenson, George Burton, H. D. Collins, William Hall, Martin Grimes, William N. Collins, Charles Dillin, (slightly,) and Lieut. John S. White, wounded.

Company B, Captain Luman: one killed, three wounded. Killed.—William Hartley. Wounded.—William Hall, S. Browning, and Joseph Bailey.

Company C, Captain Wiley: one wounded, Alfred Dougherty.

Wounded of the Second Ohio, mostly belonging to Company A, Captain Berryhill: Captain Berryhill, David Hilt, Patrick Flaherty, John Elstrip, Haw. Wilson, Joseph Carter, Corporal E. B. Simpson, Corporal Fesh, Henry Giese, ponceur; Stephen A. Coleman, scout, all abed.

GEN. NELSON'S ORDER

HEAD-QUARTERS CAMP HOPELESS CHASE, }
PIKETON, KY., NOV. 10, 1861. }

SOLDIERS: I thank you for what you have done. In a campaign of twenty days you have driven the rebels from Eastern Kentucky, and given repose to that portion of the State. You have made continual forced marches over wretched roads, deep in mud; badly clad, you have bivouacked on the wet ground in the November rains without a murmur. With scarce half rations, you have pressed forward with unflinching perseverance. The only place that the enemy made a stand, though ambushed and very strong, you drove him from in the most brilliant style. For your constancy and courage I thank you, and with the qualities which you have shown that you possess, I expect great things from you in the future.

W. NELSON.

SECESSION REPORT.

REPORT OF COLONEL WILLIAMS.

CAMP NEAR POUND GAP, NOV. 13, 1861.

GENERAL: Since my last report to you, I have been compelled to abandon Piketon by an overwhelming force, that advanced upon me in two columns—one directly up the river from Prestonburg, sixteen hundred strong, with a battery of six pieces; and the other from Louisa, up John's Creek, a branch of the Sandy, numbering one thousand eight hundred men, with a battery of field-pieces. Both of these columns converged upon Piketon. My whole force consisted of one thousand and ten men, including sick, teamsters, and men on extra duty. I did not believe that the advance of the enemy would be so rapid, and hoped that the artillery and reinforcements promised would arrive before they could disturb me at Piketon.

Under this confident hope, I commenced gathering supplies, explored the leather resources of the country, found them abundant, organized a corps of shoemakers, and had them at work. Major Hawes had purchased a thousand fat hogs, and a number of beef cattle, and was making preparation to salt them. My men were badly clad and badly armed, with not a knapsack, haversack, or canteen; they carried their powder in horns, gourds, and bottles. This was our condition when the enemy commenced the advance upon us. Retreat was inevitable, but there was too much public property to be abandoned without an effort to save it.

I at once ordered all the transportation possible to be collected, and sent the sick, the wounded, and the live stock to the rear, on the Pound Gap road, for the Tazewell route was no longer safe. I sent a small armed force immediately on the Tazewell route, with written orders to turn back the artillery and all public wagons to a point of safety in Virginia.

I then sent Capt. Holliday, with a small mounted party, on the John's Creek road, and Captains Thomas and Clay on the river road to Prestonburg, to observe the movements of the enemy. This was on the night of the 8th. Capt. Thomas discovered the advanced guard of the enemy about fifteen miles from Piketon. I went in person with Captains May and Hawkins, with their companies of infantry, and Lieut. Van Hook with twenty mounted men, to the position of Capt. Thomas, near Joy Creek. I found that Capt. Thomas had burned the bridge there. The men were allowed to refresh themselves, and the horses secured in a deep mountain cave, and the whole party of two hundred and fifty men moved on foot to a strong position half a mile in front of the burnt bridge, here to await what we supposed to be the advanced guard of the enemy's force.

I returned to our camp at daylight, and met the report of Capt. Holliday, who had been fired upon by an advanced guard of the enemy of about one hundred and fifty men. He gave them a gallant fight, killed eight of them, having only one of his number wounded, and one horse killed.

I despatched Capt. Shawhan, with his own and Capt. Cameron's companies, to observe the movements of the enemy on John's Creek, with instructions to engage any party not more than twice his number, but not to attack the enemy's full force.

At half-past one o'clock, on the 9th inst., the enemy moved up to Capt. May's position with a force of sixteen hundred men and a battery of six pieces; and were received by two hundred and fifty rifles, and shot guns, in point-blank range, every one of which took effect. Their column wavered and fell back; but returned in good order, and attempted to carry the pass by assault under cover of their cannon, but were repulsed again with terrible slaughter. They then withdrew beyond the range of our shot guns; and threw their infantry up the hills, soon outflanking our little band, and compelling them to fall back behind the burnt bridge. Here our force made a stand; but the enemy advanced no further. I then ordered three more companies of infantry to sustain Capt. May's command, or to cover his retreat if necessary. At twelve o'clock at night, Capt. Shawhan reported to me that the enemy were advancing in full force on the John's Creek road with great rapidity. I then ordered Capts. May and Shawhan and all the outposts in. I made a display of the forces in Picketon, sent the exhausted infantry in the direction of our retreat, and waited with the balance of the command the arrival of the enemy. They came up slowly and cautiously, but were detained for an hour by Capt. Thomas' company of sharpshooters, stationed near the ford, which repented their artillery from getting into position to rake the town. As they approached, I moved the rear guard of four hundred men off in good order. They opened upon us a tremendous fire of artillery and musketry, and were replied to by our sharpshooters. We had one killed and three wounded, while the enemy had six killed. In the Joy fight our loss was ten killed, fifteen wounded, and forty missing—some of the missing men have gone back to their homes, and others join us daily. We lost Lieut. Rust, who fell gallantly in the discharge of his duty. My first belief was that the enemy had lost but one hundred and fifty men; but from subsequent information received from spies, Union men, escaped prisoners who have joined us, and others who have examined their burial ground, I am satisfied the enemy lost over three hundred in killed, with the usual proportion of wounded.

I cannot speak in terms of commendation so high of the gallantry of Capts. May, Thomas, Perkins and Clay, and Lieut. Van Hook and Wm. Clay—indeed, the officers and men behaved with so much courage and coolness that to discriminate at all would be invidious. If we had had one thousand men more, and a battery of six pieces, we could have whipped and destroyed both columns; but with the small force I had, it was impossible to fight both at once, and to have opposed my whole force to one, would have exposed my rear to the other. Our cartridge-boxes arrived the day after the fight. We had powder and lead, and made our own cartridges and moulded our own bullets. The enemy had six thousand troops near Picketon—one thousand of them advanced ten miles this side of that place. They have not more than one thousand five hundred at Prestonburg; what they have below as reserves I know but little of, for all communication is cut off and the whole country is frightened out of its wits, and but few men will act as scouts or guides. I am satisfied that this large force was not moved up the Sandy merely for the purpose of dispersing the unorganized, and half-armed, and barefooted squad under my control.

They intended to move upon the Virginia and Tennessee railroad, I think, by way of Tazewell Court House. They fortify their positions, and have a large number of wagons. The Sandy is now navigable for steamboats to a point above Picketon.

We want good rifles, clothes, great coats, knapsacks, haversacks and canteens—indeed, every thing almost, except a willingness to fight. Many of our men are barefooted, and I have seen the blood in their tracks, as they marched from Joy to this place. You know what we want. General: send such articles as we need to Abingdon. There is little subsistence here, and I fear I shall be compelled to fall back to a point where I can subsist until our organization is perfected. We have been so constantly fighting that we have not had time to complete our muster-rolls. I have now over twelve hundred men. If I could make a forward movement, the effect would be good upon the country.

Mr. Thomas has just received from the Governor of Florida, a commission as "aide-de-camp," with the rank of colonel. I cannot insist upon retaining him from such increased rank. Send somebody else. If the enemy should move by way of the Pound, I have not a sufficient force to resist them—no artillery—no intrenching tools, nor axes, spades, nor picks. If they come we will give them a fight, but this will do us no good but to destroy a few of them. I have just learned from a spy that a steamboat arrived at Picketon yesterday with supplies to the enemy. Maj. Howes wants more money; he has bought hogs, horses, wagons, &c., &c. Your obedient servant,

JOHN S. WILLIAMS,
Colonel C. S. A.

H. W. CHILTON, A. A.—General.

ACCOUNT BY A "PARTICIPANT."

The following description is given by a Union soldier who participated in the battle:

CAMP "HOPELESS CHASE," PIKEVILLE, }
PIKE COUNTY, KY., NOV. 11, 1861. }

I take the first opportunity of writing to you that I have had since I sent my last to you. I have been in an engagement; have heard the cold lead balls fly past my ears; I have seen men struck dead by my side by those same balls; and yet, by the goodness of God, have escaped unhurt.

Let me now give you a full description of the fight. We marched from Salyersville the day after I wrote my last, and after marching one whole day and a half, we arrived at Prestonburg, fording the Big Sandy about a mile from town. We stayed there two days, and then received orders to march to this place. We were to start at twelve m., every thing being got ready, as it was to be a forced march. Norris and myself got our horses ready, brought them into the yard, and hitched them up ready, but near nightfall news came that we would not go till the next day. Oh, how glad we were that we could have a little sleep. We went to bed, leaving every thing ready for the march, as we did not know what might take place, or what might influence Gen. Nelson.

It was well enough that we did so, for at four o'clock in the morning there came a rap at our door! "Who comes there," shouted Major McCook. Col. Harris and Adjutant Vandegrift immediately got up and opened the door. "You must all be ready to march in twenty minutes." So up we all sprang, and then began the hurrying. I kept cool, and soon had every thing ready. In less than half an hour the whole brigade, over two thousand strong, was ready to move—the Kentucky regiment in the advance. Then came the "Bully Second," and the remainder of the force brought up the rear. We took three days' rations, expecting to be back in that time.

On we marched, and after having passed four or five miles of our distance, Gen. Nelson sent orders to throw out our "flankers," and now came the Second's turn. Out went two of our companies, and they scoured the woods and mountains, climbing, creeping, jumping, and leaping through the underbrush; over logs, stems of trees, over rocks and over rills, more like squirrels than men; now you could see them through the foliage, as they half walked, half crept, half ran. After two hours' duty the skirmishers were withdrawn, and on we went as brisk as larks on our march. We made a short halt about eight o'clock a. m., to give the men breakfast; after which we took up our marching again. As we were marching through some open woods our scouts caught sight of some thirty or forty cavalry. They fired and it was returned by us. Just then our cannon came up and opened on them. After three or four rounds, just as we were getting their range, they dispersed. After examining their position, we found that no harm had been done on either side. Now the battle.

Still on we marched, (this was about two p. m.,)

the Kentucky regiment being in the advance, the Second next to them—and now to the details. We were marching along a road cut into the solid rock—on one side a steep bank, seventy-five feet high, and on the other side a perpendicular rock from twenty to forty-five feet high, above which the hill ran up about nine hundred or one thousand feet, very steep. The rebels were posted on a kind of embankment, and had strengthened it by piling rocks in the front. They were about seventy-five or eighty yards from the road, and when the Kentucky regiments came in a good view, they let fly a volley, killing four and wounding eleven—they were thrown into confusion, when our men, the Second, came up, and now commenced the fight in earnest; our men firing up at them and they firing down at us; their balls rattled about our men's ears thick and fast. Now our artillery came up and opened fire; they threw a few shells into the woods and on the first ridge, but we did not yet know just where they were, and we shot over them. At this period of the fight a company of rebels, who had succeeded in getting on the other side, got position in a cornfield, and commenced dropping their balls about us, in rather too close a proximity for our well-being; now our men turned in in right good earnest. Col. Harris coming up, sent five companies up the hill. Up, up they went, firing and loading as they climbed. The rebels soon gave out, and retired to the first ridge, but they were soon compelled to flee from that also, and retired further up, to the second ridge, and as our men reached them, they fled in hopeless confusion. The rebels, having their position in a cornfield, were treated respectfully with a few shells and a couple of volleys or so of bullets, when they also fled, leaving the field in our complete possession. Our brigade loss is thirteen killed and mortally wounded, and about thirty-five wounded slightly and otherwise. You will perceive it was quite a battle, (although the loss was not so very great,) and we all think so. We have found fifteen of the rebels killed, and some twenty-five wounded; so as far as we know, the loss is about equal in numbers. We do not know for certain what their loss was; I only speak from what we do know. Our loss was not from their bravery, but from the wonderfully strong natural position; and the surprise is that our loss was not greater, especially when we examine the plan of the ground. On equal ground, where would they have been? Annihilated! As it is, we call it a great victory. All hail to the glorious Stars and Stripes! Long may they wave and be the ensign to lead us on to victory, and peace, and happiness.

And now for my share in the battle. I was riding along somewhat carelessly, when crack! crack!! crack!!! went their rifles, and down fell our men. Crack! crack!! crack!!! they came. Off I jumped from my horse, when along came the major, and gave me his horse to hold; but I soon hitched them both to a tree down by the river, and sprang again up the bank, when whiz! went a bullet past my face, about three inches from it, and made me draw my head back in a hurry, I can assure you. I looked up the hill, but could see no one for the smoke, which was plenty, so I levelled in the direction of the enemy and fired—loaded again and fired. I got my rifle in readiness again. Ah! that ball was pretty close. Here comes another—buzz, buzz—(you can hear their whiz for fully a hundred yards as they come)—get out of the way. But where is it to go to? Whew! that was close. But, great God! it has gone through a man's shoulder within a few yards of me! He falls! some of his comrades pick him up.

Now a horseman comes past in a hurry. He is right opposite me—when whiz, crack! a ball strikes his horse in the forehead. Off tumbles the man; down falls the horse, stiffened out and dead. If the bullet had gone through the animal, it would doubtless have struck me.

Here come a dozen or more. How they whiz as they go past! "Load and fire!" "Load and fire!" is the order—and load and fire it is. My attention was especially drawn to a very fine-looking man, who stood close to me, and he truly acted like a hero—loading and firing just as if he was on parade, when whiz! whiz!! comes a bullet. My God! how close. It almost stunned me! When I looked toward my soldier, I saw his comrades lifting him up. He was shot through the breast, he died in less than half an hour. Oh! the horrors of war. Vengeance on the heads of those who initiate it.

I directed my attention up the hill; a little puff of smoke was dying away: "Boys," says I to the squad of his fellows, "you see that smoke, aim for it, a rebel's in its rear." I raised my Enfield, and glanced through its sights, when I for a moment caught sight of a man through the bushes and smoke there. Crack went our guns, and all was over.

(We crossed to the place afterward, and found the man's body; he had four out of twelve musket balls, and one Enfield rifle ball—mine, as mine was the only rifle ball fired. They all went through him; either of which would have killed him—mine through his breast. Thank God, I had done my duty for the poor fellow who fell beside me.)

Now the firing grew weak, so I went up the road and found Henry, and we, with John How, second lieutenant of Company A, with some forty skirmishers, took a little reconnoissance up the creek, (Ivy Creek.) We caught sight of six or seven rebels running up a hill; we levelled our pieces, but they got behind the trees and out of sight, and although we fired, we were not certain we killed, although we must have hit somebody, as we found blood. As I ran along to get a shot, I picked up a revolver and a double-barrelled shot-gun. The revolver will do me service, as I was lacking one. We now returned to the battle-field, and I counted eight corpses in one hundred and fifty yards, and twelve wounded, all of the Kentucky regiment. The loss of the Second was two killed and thirteen wounded; and so it was, as I said before, a considerable battle.

I find that the rebels had only one hundred and fifty men well armed with Minié rifles, the remainder with squirrel rifles, shot-guns, &c. We know that they lost sixteen killed and twenty-eight wounded. Their number killed, we know, too, was much larger than ours, which is owing to our superior weapons that shatter terribly with their balls. Our entire loss in the brigade was nine killed, five mortally wounded, and thirty-four not seriously. Allowance must be made for our not making a greater destruction of the rebels, to the position of their ground, which gave a decided advantage in a battle of this kind.

If they had had effective weapons, the loss would have been terrible on the part of the Kentucky regiment, and also pretty considerable in ours. If our positions had been changed, we could have wiped them out of existence.

We marched, after the battle, about three miles, and encamped. The next morning we started early, in the midst of a terrible rain, which continued all day. It was one of the heaviest falls of rain I ever saw, and I had a most disagreeable ride; and to add to the discomfort, the secesh had cut down some thirty trees across the road, and we had to move them before we could proceed. It delayed us a long time. We came across two barrels of apple brandy, which Major McCook stove in for fear they were poisoned, (we are almost certain they were, as the rebels had been inquiring for arsenic along the road; so we had a pretty sure thing on them.) When we encamped at night, we were all wet through to the skin. I was completely saturated; but, for all that, slept well, and do not feel any inconvenience from it; indeed, I feel in very good health, saving a little cold.

When we arrived here, we found that the detachment that had started the afternoon before us, had had a little skirmish, killing six and wounding two of the rebels, without any loss whatever on our side. We expect to follow them in a day or two, when our baggage comes from Prestonburg; and if we overtake them, I assure you we shall give them fire and death.

Col. Harris is every inch a gentleman and a soldier, and much liked by all his comrades. I am sure, from what I have seen, he is qualified, and would make an excellent brigadier-general.

Hoping time will shortly bring continued and greater victories, I close.

HORATIO.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT.

The correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette, writing from Piketon, says:

On Tuesday evening, the 5th Nov., after a long march from Licking Station, our regiments

—the Thirty-third, the Twenty-first, and Fifty-ninth Ohio—and a light battalion, composed of six picked companies from all the regiments of the brigade, and under command of Major Hart, arrived at the ferry nearly opposite Prestonburg. The Second Ohio preceded us one day, and was in occupancy of the town, of all of which you have, no doubt, been informed in detail.

On the following evening the Thirty-third, under Colonel Sill, and Major Hurt's light battalion, were ordered to prepare two days' rations and be ready to move across the river during the night. Accordingly, the morning of the 7th found us in a line of march through Prestonburg, and, as we suspected, toward Piketon, distant by direct route twenty-five miles. A section of artillery, consisting of two rifled six-pounders, under command of Colonel Rohler Vacher, accompanied us; also, one hundred and fifty mounted men, under Colonel Metcalf. We soon ascertained that our course was deviating from the direct route up Sandy River, and was leading us up John's Creek, which route led us a distance of forty miles around, and entered the town of Piketon nearly opposite from the river route. The object was to attack the enemy in the rear, whilst General Nelson, with the Second, Twenty-first, and Fifty-ninth Ohio, with Colonel Marshal's fragment of a regiment, who started the day following, would attack them in front.

The march was truly a severe one, as the order of General Nelson's intimates. The rations, which were intended for two days, did not, on an average, last one day. We took no train but one wagon and our ambulances, accordingly our men were without tents or means of shelter. The road was very narrow, and in many places precipitous. Often it was difficult to find sufficient room for our cannon, and more than once the expediency of not only unlimbering, but of making artificial carriage-ways was calculated, so narrow was the road on the mountain side.

On our first day's march the men were compelled to ford the creek, which is about twenty-five yards wide. The water came up to their waists. At night we bivouacked on a mountain side. It was very cold, and we deemed it advisable to have as few camp fires as possible, from the fact that the hills were full of rebel scouts. They had fired on our cavalry advance from a hill during the day, which was returned vigorously, and with the effect of killing one, wounding another, and of killing one horse. In this skirmish we received no injury whatever. But in the evening, near our camping-ground, one of the cavalry was fired upon from an ambush, and wounded by an oblique shot through the neck.

The second day we marched all day, with nothing to eat, unless it may have been a very few who economized to a better advantage than their fellows. At night, we received rations of meat, but had neither salt nor bread—meat alone. We bivouacked again in a narrow meadow spot, and our men had disposed themselves as comfortably as possible for the night, when the long roll was beat, and notwithstanding it was the first time this sound had ever been heard by most of them, yet in less than ten minutes we were in line of battle. It was at this time that Colonel Sill, who had command of this part of the expedition, displayed to his men and the officers present the talent he possessed to command, and convinced his own regiment still more of their good fortune in having such a commander over them. A company, variously estimated at two hundred to three hundred, moved down the creek to surprise us, when our pickets fired upon them and gave the alarm. This fire wounded their captain in the chest, and they immediately retreated. But, anticipating their continued advance, our line of battle was formed. Our infantry was arranged along the hill-side, so as to completely command the left of the enemy as they would advance. The cannon were placed in position on the right of the infantry, in such a manner as to pour a deadly fire into the narrow pass beyond. For an hour our men stood silent upon the hill-side, and the camp-fires slumbered in the little meadow spot. Once more they were formed into line of battle before morning.

By daylight the next morning we were on the march again. The rain began to fall in torrents, and continued until afternoon. The mountain streams ran swiftly, and the mountain sides grew deep in mud. Through all this our men marched for thirteen miles. Speaking literally, they marched for miles in water knee-deep and over, and through mud over shoe-top, and all upon no subsistence but meat without salt. It was a terrible march, and nothing but the prospect of a fight could have sustained the energies of the troops.

In spite of the great number of strategical points that we passed unmolested, we did give the enemy some credit for courage and military capacity, and, accordingly, moved with far greater caution than we need to have done as we neared the town. At one point, just as we passed by a long, narrow, and winding road, over the last mountain that brought us down to near the ford opposite the village, we thought that we would surely encounter a force. Two pickets only were met, who fled and gave the alarm, but not too soon to prevent us from firing a volley across the river, and exploding a shell or two in their midst.

As they fled beyond the hills a few shells more were sent after them, with serious effect. Four bodies, it is said, were found in one spot. It is impossible to say how many were killed and wounded. I was told by a respectable citizen that blood was found scattered for some distance along the road which they fled. One fell into our hands, mortally wounded.

I have it from good authority that the officers are sworn not to disclose their losses in battle, and I am sure they take every precaution to conceal the bodies of their killed.

We immediately took possession of the town—I should think, in time of peace, a pleasant little village, picturesquely situated—and secured some very important papers of the General commanding. But for one more day our men had meat rations only to subsist upon. Thus you have a meagre account of one of the most laborious marches of the war.

In the mean time, the forces under General Nelson had advanced up the river, and encountered an ambuscade of about seven or eight hundred of the enemy, who, suspecting our forces to be weakened by the division into two columns, hoped to destroy one and rush to the rear of the other. But, as your despatches will show, they were defeated and dispersed, and only about the same number was left at this point to be likewise dispersed by the forces under Colonel Sill.

Thus is Eastern Kentucky ridden of her oppressors, who claim to be her only protection. They have completely exhausted the country, and our only supplies must come from above.

I will add that we passed a great deal of magnificent mountain scenery—high cliffs and toppling crags. In many places, one would think that he viewed the ruins of some mighty castle on the mountain tops, as the rocks would rise in walls and spires high above the parti-colored forest.

A. J. P.

The Louisville Journal published the following details, compiled from the reports of General Nelson and Colonel Sill:

On the 7th November General Nelson despatched Colonel Sill with his own regiment, the Ohio Thirty-third, and the light battalion under Major Hart, Kentucky Volunteers, composed of a flank company from each of the regiments, the Second, Thirty-third, and Fifty-ninth O. V. U. S. A., and two Kentucky companies, together with one hundred and forty-two mounted men, under command of Colonel Metcalf, Kentucky Volunteers, made up of men mounted from the wagon teams, and thirty-six gentlemen volunteers, under Colonel Apperson, and a section of artillery, to march by the way of John's Creek and pass to the left of Pikeville, where the rebels had taken position—a distance of forty miles—and turn or cut them off. Colonel Sill marched at eleven A. M. on the 7th. At five A. M. of the 8th General Nelson moved forward with the Second regiment O. V. U. S. A., Colonel Harris; Twenty-first regiment O. V. U. S. A., Colonel Norton; Fifty-ninth regiment O. V. U. S. A., Colonel Fyffe; the battalion of Kentucky Volunteers under Colonel Charles A. Marshall, and two sections of artillery, Captain Konkle, and took the State road direct to Pikeville, twenty-eight miles. Some eight miles from Prestonburg they met a picket of about forty cavalry and fired on them, but, having no cavalry, they escaped easily.

At one P. M. the column had advanced along the narrow defile of the mountain that ends at Ivy Creek. The mountain is the highest along the river, very precipitous, and thickly covered with timber and undergrowth, and the road, which is but seven feet wide, is cut along the side of it, about twenty-five feet above the river, which is close under the road. The ridge descends in a rapid curve and very sharp to the creek, or rather gorge, where it makes a complete elbow. Behind this ridge, and all along the mountain side, the enemy, seven hundred strong, lay in ambush, and did not fire until the head of Colonel Marshall's battalion, himself leading, was up to the elbow. The skirmish was very sharp. The mountain side was blue with puffs of smoke, and not an enemy to be seen. The first discharge killed four and wounded thirteen of Marshall's men. General Nelson ordered the Kentuckians to charge. Colonel Harris, whose regiment was immediately behind the General, led his men up the mountain side most gallantly and deployed them along the face of it. Colonel Norton, whose regiment had just reached the defile, anticipating an order from the General, led his men up the northern ridge of the mountain, deployed them along the creek, and went at the rebels. Two pieces of artillery were got in position in the road and opened upon them. Owing to the steepness of the mountain all this required time. On the opposite side of the river, which at that point is narrow, deep, and swift, there were also rebels who annoyed our men. In an hour and twenty minutes the rebels were dispersed and fled, leaving a number of killed and wounded on the ground and six prisoners unhurt. As General Nelson marched immediately in pursuit, the rebel loss was not ascertained accurately, but thirty were found dead on the field. Among the wounded prisoners was H. M. Rust, late State Senator from Greenup County. Our loss in killed was six, and twenty-four wounded. If General Nelson had had with him any cavalry, he feels confident he would have taken or slain the whole of them. As it was, the enemy retreated, cutting down trees across the narrow road and burning or cutting all the bridges, which are numerous. General Nelson bivouacked four miles beyond the Ivy Creek. It rained and the men had to wade through mud and in a heavy rain all the day of the 9th, the march being heavy and slow on account of the felled trees obstructing the road, and the necessary repairing of bridges. At night the army again bivouacked in the November rain, and the next morning they reached Pikeville, where Colonel Sill had arrived the previous night. Captain Berryhill of the Second Ohio was wounded severely at Ivy Creek, while leading the column up the mountain side. During these operations the command of Col. Sill executed Gen. Nelson's orders and occupied Pikeville by a circuitous route on the 9th, at four P. M. Col. Metcalf's mounted men in advance exchanged shots with a reconnoitring party which had just crossed the river, but immediately retreated. Metcalf and Hart's forces were then thrown out, deployed as skirmishers on the hill-side, flanking the road which debouches at the ford. They found the enemy's camp deserted and the main street of the village occupied by mounted men, who were making off by the Shelby road. A few rounds of shell were sent after them, and Metcalf's men took possession of the town, fording the river on horseback. The rest of the force crossed on a raft bridge. The enemy were occupied all the previous day in evacuating the place. Gen. Williams was there when the skirmishers opened fire, but he retreated, and Col. Sill subsequently occupied his head-quarters. The only casualty was one man killed. On the route, Col. Sill twice encountered a party of mounted men; the first fire killed a horse and wounded two of the rebels. On the night of the 8th a party of ten, sent out by Col. Metcalf, encountered Capt. Shawhan's rebel cavalry, about one hundred and fifty strong, and it was reported that Capt. S. was wounded. His party fell back in great haste. The troops in Pikeville were not well off for provisions; all they could get was beef, but there is a mill in the vicinity, which they intended to set in motion and supply themselves with corn-meal. It was impossible to obtain any accurate account of the number of the dispersed rebels, but they were most effectually cleared out. Among the effects of Colonel Williams left behind at Pikeville, in his hasty retreat, was a letter from the Confederate Secretary of War, J. P. Benjamin, dated October 28th, introducing Mr. Lewis, a special agent for the Confederate Government, who would make a communication to Colonel W. "about young Clay," in relation to which Colonel W. was to use his discretion. The Secretary was anxiously awaiting Williams' muster rolls, and stated that he had sent to him on the 27th a company of artillery with its battery, and would send him a regiment of armed Virginians to Prestonburg in a few days. From all we can glean, "Cerro Gordo" will not for the present have occasion for their use, as his men must be completely demoralized by the bad thrashing and worse fright which they received.

MEETING OF GERMAN CITIZENS

AT CHICAGO, ILL., NOV. 9, 1861.

A. C. HESING called the meeting to order, and on motion John H. Muehlke was elected President, and Ed. Seckel Secretary. The first speaker was Caspar Butz, who, after making a telling speech, moved that a committee of five be appointed by the chair, to draft resolutions. The President appointed C. Butz, H. Eschenburg, B. H. Bruns, Jos. Brosch, and L. Lamperts as such committee, who retired and afterwards through their chairman, C. Butz, reported the following resolutions, which were adopted under a storm of applause:

In view of the tremendous crisis in our national affairs, when the fate of the Republic trembles in the balance, a mass meeting, chiefly composed of German-American citizens, assembled at North Market Hall, Chicago, and adopted the following resolutions:

Resolved, that, while disclaiming every intention to resuscitate old and obsolete issues, and pledging to the Government of our choice our undivided support in the prosecution of the war against the black monster of secession, we nevertheless, as free citizens of this Republic, claim our right to express our sentiments and opinions in regard to the carrying on of this war and the measures of the Administration;

Resolved, that, as every day it becomes more and more evident, that this war is a grapple for life and death between two principles hostile to each other since the first day of creation, we warn and counsel the Government, that the triumph of liberty can only be final and lasting by the destruction of slavery;

Resolved, that, in the measures of the Administration for the suppression of this insurrection, we have so far seen nothing but indecision and vacillation and a desire to shirk the true issue of the contest, and to decline a responsibility which the rulers of a great nation like ours ought to, and which the people expect them to assume;

Resolved, that in the recent proclamation of Gen. Fremont, which was unfortunately mutilated by the order of the President, we saw a harbinger of better days and the surest means, to bring this war to a speedy close;

Resolved, that when, as if in the intention to add insult to injury, the idol of the Western army, the man who created order out of chaos, Gen. John C. Fremont, when he was on the point of reaping the fruits of his giant labors, was removed from his command, we were loth to believe the almost incredible news, and had to bow our heads in silence before a proceeding so unparalleled in history and so detrimental to the best interests of the country;

Resolved, that, after carefully sifting the accusations against Gen. Fremont, we have found in them nothing but an ex-parte statement of his enemies, not supported by proofs, devoid in many instances even of the semblance of truth, refuted as to many charges already long ago, and bearing in every word the stamp of the malignity of the accuser;

Resolved, that, in our opinion, even if the charges against Gen. Fremont had been proved by unquestionable evidence, the Government might have found other means of correcting them than the removal of the chieftain who never was heard in self-defence, and whose only crime in the opinion of the people is, that he stands in the way of the ambition of other men;

Resolved, that, by the act of the removal of Gen. Fremont, we have lost all confidence in the Administration, and that the people will hold them responsible for the evil consequences resulting from their acts, and particularly from this most injudicious and most unjust measure;

Resolved, that, while thus expressing our grievances, we solemnly declare our unalterable devotion to our adopted country and to the glorious flag of freedom, under the folds of which we found a new home. The adopted citizens have already shown their zeal in the cause of liberty, but for liberty alone and not for the schemes and compromises of designing and corrupt politicians are they ready to fight to the bitter end; and for this, in the language of the forefathers, they pledge "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor."

On motion of Mr. Rapp the following resolution was added to the series already adopted:

Resolved, that we assure Gen. Fremont of our unchanging love and admiration, and of our most sincere thanks and of our approbation for the immortal services he rendered to the cause of science and of his country, for the giant energy and the self-sacrificing patriotism with which he created the army of the West, for the great and humane principle of his proclamation of emancipation, for the vigor and quickness with which he, in spite of all the obstacles thrown in his way by the authorities at Washington, marched from St. Louis to Springfield, and cleared the State from the hordes of the rebels, and for his self-denying, truly antique, and republican civic virtues, in which he received the blow aimed at him by the President.

Mr. Lamperts offered a resolution censuring the "Chicago Tribune" for its course in the Fremont controversy, which on motion of N. Eisdendath was laid on the table; the ground alleged for the rejection being, that it would be beneath the dignity of the meeting, after having declared their views in such momentous and important matters, to pay any attention to such a small concern as the above-named paper.

It was moved to send a copy of the resolutions to President Lincoln through our Representative in Congress, Hon. I. N. Arnold; but it having been remarked by a number of speakers that Mr. Arnold was a warm friend of Gen. Hunter, it was not thought advisable to request the services of the gentleman in his behalf.

While the committee on resolutions were out, Sheriff Hensing, Wm. Rapp, and T. Hielscher made eloquent speeches, and the meeting adjourned with tremendous cheers, proposed by C. Butz, for John C. Fremont, the next President of the United States.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S SPEECH,

ON LEAVING HOME FOR WASHINGTON, FEB. 11, 1861.

MR. LINCOLN left Springfield, Ill., at half-past seven A. M., accompanied to the depot by a large concourse of citizens. About one thousand persons were collected at the depot, and after he had shaken hands with a number of friends, he spoke as follows:

MR FRIENDS: No one, not in my position, can appreciate the sadness I feel at this parting. To this people I owe all that I am. Here I have lived more than a quarter of a century; here my children were born, and here one of them lies buried. I know not how soon I shall see you again. A duty devolves upon me which is, perhaps, greater than that which has devolved upon any other man since the days of Washington. He never could have succeeded except for the aid of Divine Providence, upon which he at all times relied. I feel that I cannot succeed without the same Divine aid which sustained him; and in the same Almighty being I place my reliance for support, and I hope you, my friends, will all pray that I may receive that Divine assistance, without which I cannot succeed, but with which, success is certain. Again, I bid you all an affectionate farewell.

During the speech, Mr. Lincoln betrayed much emotion, and the crowd was affected to tears.

THE LORD MAYOR'S BANQUET.

SPEECHES OF MR. ADAMS AND LORD PALMERSTON.

Saturday, Nov. 9th, being Lord Mayor's day, conformably with a custom which had obtained for more than six hundred years, Alderman Cubitt went in state from Guildhall, London, to Westminster, attended by members of the Court of Aldermen, all the principal officers of the Corporation, and representatives of most, if not all, of the ancient livery companies, to be presented to the Barons of the Exchequer on his election, for the second time in succession, as Lord Mayor of London. The day, which was as sunny and genial as one in midsummer, attracted an enormous crowd to see the pageant, in addition to the interest which, in the popular estimation, has always been peculiarly its own. As usual, the chief interest of the occasion at first centred in Guildhall, with its precincts, as the place from which the procession was to start. About twelve o'clock, the procession, marshalled according to order, moved off on its way to Westminster, with a flourish of trumpets. The Lord Mayor, (Right Hon. William Cubitt,) accompanied by his chaplain, and by Mr. Sewell and Mr. Beddome, his sword and mace bearers, in the state carriage of the Corporation, drawn by six horses, and attended by a cavalry escort, was of course the principal person of interest in the pageant. Next to him in point of attraction, were the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, with their chaplains, each in a splendid chariot, drawn by four horses. The Lord Mayor having been sworn in, the accustomed inaugural entertainment took place in Guildhall in the evening, which was appropriately decorated for the occasion, under the tasteful direction of Mr. J. B. Bunning, architect to the City of London. The corridors and lobbies, from the entrance to the hall, were adorned with trophies, statues, mirrors, and flowering plants. The hall itself was profusely decorated.

After the usual loyal toasts had been responded to, the Lord Mayor rose and said :

I have now to propose to you the health of a distinguished body of men, whose mission is the loftiest which can be committed to any class. To the gentlemen whose health I am now about to propose, is committed the charge of preserving the peace of the world. I allude to the diplomatic body. But for their exertions, their talents, tact, and ability, there would have been hundreds of occasions, during the last fifty years, in which we might have been involved in war. We have here to-night several gentlemen, the elite of their respective countries, chosen for their great ability and knowledge, who are sent here to represent their respective countries, to negotiate all questions, difficult or easy, to save us from that resource which would land us in great calamities. I am about to associate with this toast the name of a gentleman whose mind must necessarily, under the circumstances, be occupied much with the affairs of his own country, which, unhappily, is at this moment in a condition to require the sympathies of the world. In no country will those sympathies be yielded more readily than in this. (Cheers.) I need not say I allude to America. I will associate with this toast the name of the American Minister, and I can assure him—taking on myself for the moment, to be the exponent of the feelings and sentiments of this great city, over which I have the honor to preside—I can assure him of the entire sympathy of the citizens of London, and I think I may say of the whole British people. I can assure him that our most earnest desire is to see the day when those difficulties, which we hope are only temporary, shall be entirely eradicated from the soil of that great and free country. (Loud cheers.)

SPEECH OF MR. ADAMS, U. S. MINISTER.

His Excellency, the American Minister, who was most cordially received, in reply to the toast, said :

My Lord Mayor, Ladies, and Gentlemen: In behalf of my brethren of the Corps Diplomatique, I desire to express our grateful thanks for the compliment which you have paid it. I take pride in being a member of that body, not for any trifling personal distinction it may give me, but because it opens an opportunity for doing good. Whatever may have been said of diplomacy, it has ever seemed to me one of the great inventions of modern times. Its mission is to preserve peace. In antiquity, the quarrels of nations were immediately followed by war. The sword was the only negotiator, and the victorious chieftain commonly ended by dictating terms of humiliation to his fallen enemy. All this has been materially changed now that negotiation always precedes war, and very often averts it altogether.

Indeed, it may safely be said, that the chain of relations established by diplomacy furnishes perpetual means for the restoration of friendly feelings between nations. When they are rushing into a state of mutual irritation, either accidentally or by the agency of ill-tempered mischief-makers on both sides, (for such people will always be found in every community,) then is felt the value of an authorized agency over the present to explain mistakes, to correct misrepresentations, and to retract errors in season—to check the growth of the trouble, and restore good feeling. In these later days, few Governments go to war for the mere love of it. The prodigious exhaustion it soon brings on, not less than the growing influence of public opinion throughout the civilized world, teaches a lesson of patience and forbearance that gives full play for the active intervention of a wise negotiator. A friendly voice may then soothe the waves in the midst of their agitation, and reduce the surface once more to sunny calm. (Cheers.)

There is, moreover, another beneficial change, of a still later date, which I will take the liberty to notice as having happened to the diplomacy of nations. Not a great while ago, it had the reputation of being tricky and false—of taking advantage of the secrecy with which it was conducted to play an unfair game. The history of the past is filled with examples of eminent men who considered it the height of merit to show skill in outwitting their neighbors in negotiation. Indeed, there is an anecdote told of a very distinguished public character of the last age in France—I know not with what justice—that such was the reputation he had obtained as an adept in deception at one part of his life, that from that time he made up his mind always to tell the truth, being confident nobody would ever think of believing him, and that thus he might the better conceal his objects. (A laugh.) Be this as it may, I prefer to appeal from the old example of Prince Talleyrand to the later one of a veteran diplomatist of your own country, who, after serving a long career of distinction abroad, has come back to enjoy the honors he has won so well in a green old age at home. I allude to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe—(cheers)—who, in the testimony he gave before a committee of Parliament, recorded his deliberate opinion that the present practice in negotiation, so far as his experience went, was plain and straightforward, and in good faith; that there was little desire for secrecy merely as a screen for deception, and that most countries acted under a sense of their share of responsibility for honesty of conduct before the world. I say that I prefer to adopt this later theory on my coming in as a member of the Diplomatic Corps, because I should scarcely know how to act upon any other.

In America we are so used to speaking what we think—perhaps with too much freedom—and I have got into such a habit of it, I should not be fit to come to play my part here if I were expected by my employers to say what I did not mean. (Cheers.) Permit me, then, to assure you that my main object has been, and is, to endeavor to continue and perpetuate the friendly relations that have so long existed between the two countries. (Cheers.) Indeed, I see the strongest reasons why they should never be changed. (Cheers.) To be sure, there are many points in which we materially disagree, and there will be people on both sides whose disposition will be to magnify them. You do not approve our democracy; we do not appreciate your distinctions of rank. You think us altogether too free and easy in our ways; we consider you as far too stiff and stately. All this may be so, and yet, so long as there is a broad ocean between us, I see no reason why we may not indulge our respective tastes without risk of difficulty. On the other hand, I perceive many and vastly higher particulars in which we harmonize. (Cheers.) Surely it must be remembered that, with only the exception of the last eighty years, we claim to be joint heritors with you in all that is great and noble in your past history. Every bold stroke for liberty, whether civil or religious, is matter of pride for us as it is for you. Magna Charta is a common landmark for us all.

And if from this I turn to the field of literature or science, where, I ask, is there a great name in England which is not equally venerated in America? It was but the other day that I took a little trip to the banks of your little river Avon, to visit the birthplace and the last resting place of your great poet, and there I found on the record of the pilgrims who go to that shrine that a great proportion are from America. (Cheers.) So, among philosophers we know no greater guide than Bacon, in science no higher authority than Newton; and if I may be permitted to come down to the limits of your own municipality of London, there is not a street, nor an alley, nor a lane, which is not scrutinized with eagerness by my countrymen on account of their associations with persons and events of which they have read at home in the historical or the literary productions of the mother country. (Cheers.)

Neither is there a deed of heroism recorded here that does not elicit its tribute of applause in the remotest hamlet of the western hemisphere. I have myself met with the story of Grace Darling's courage stuck up in the small public room of an inn in an obscure American town; so the example of self-devotion of your Florence Nightingale—(cheers)—has raised the admiration and stimulated the ardor of imitation of quite as many of my fair countrywomen as it has done of her own. And perhaps I may be permitted here to make an allusion to a higher character, so far as to say that through the breadth of the United States, from sea to sea, the name of her Majesty the Queen is held in the highest honor,—(cheers)—not because she is a queen—no, that's not the reason, for there have been many queens whom we do not admire at all, but because, while a pattern of a daughter, and an example of a wife and a mother, she yet rules like a Christian sovereign over a noble people. (Loud cheering.)

It is, then, a community of descent, of language, of literature, of sympathy in all that is good, and noble, and true, that teaches the lesson of harmony between our respective peoples. I therefore cannot but echo the sentiment with which my Lord Mayor did me the honor to accompany the mention of my name; and, glancing around to the various points where I see the word inscribed along these walls, I say also, peace here, peace there, and peace everywhere. (Loud cheering.)

The Lord Mayor said: The citizens of London think it the highest honor to be allowed to entertain any of her Majesty's Ministers. (Cheers.) This evening we have great reason to rejoice; for, among other distinguished personages who are the great functionaries of the Government of the country, we have the honor to meet her Majesty's Prime Minister. The name of Lord Palmerston (cheers) never can be uttered within this hall without eliciting plaudits such as I have just heard. You, and I, and all of us rejoice in the excellent health which his lordship at this moment exhibits. Long may he continue to enjoy such good health! (Cheers.) Her Majesty's Ministers are at all times charged with duties involving great anxieties. Upon them devolve the entire labor and responsibility of Government. So long as every thing goes on smoothly, a Minister may be happy, but woe betide him if they go wrong. The sleepless nights and anxious days which a Minister must endure are but poorly compensated by the honors and emoluments of office. In conclusion, I beg to propose to you "The health of her Majesty's Ministers," coupling the toast with the name of Viscount Palmerston.

The toast was drunk with all the honors and with the utmost cordiality.

SPEECH OF LORD PALMERSTON.

Viscount Palmerston, who was much cheered on rising to acknowledge the compliment, said:

My Lord Mayor, my Lords, Ladies, and Gentlemen: For myself and my colleagues I beg you to accept our most heartfelt thanks for the honor which you have done us by so accepting the health which the Lord Mayor has just proposed. I can assure you, gentlemen, that it is always a matter of sincere pleasure to those who are engaged, as we are, in the turmoils and labors of public life, to mix here with those who are employed in laying the foundations for the wealth, the prosperity, and the happiness of the country by carrying on in the way in which the citizens of this great commercial metropolis of the world do carry on those commercial transactions of which their countrymen are so justly proud. (Cheers.) It is always a great pleasure to those who are engaged in the strife of political life occasionally to be invited to these social boards, where they meet in friendly association those to whom they may be opposed in the more active scenes of their public occupations. (Cheers.) You have pointed out that the interior abounds with emblems of peace, indicating the anxious desire of the country to preserve to it the blessings of peace, (cheers;) but as we entered these walls we saw at the portals armed men—volunteers—(cheers)—aye, volunteers, who are an emblem of the resolution of the country to bar the entrance of the land to any who might wish, with rude and profane step, to disturb the peace and tranquillity within, (loud cheers;) and that band of volunteers was not less emblematical of the feeling of the country because it consisted of men of mature age and of boys hardly yet able to wield the musket which they had upon their shoulders—a proof, therefore, that young and old combine in this country in a firm determination to guard the entrance of the land and preserve that peace which we all so anxiously desire to maintain. (Cheers.)

My lords and gentlemen, I may also say that we have here peace and plenty, (cheers,) and I trust that the present condition of the country is not altogether unanalogous to that state; for we have had a harvest which, generally speaking, has been good. The condition of our revenue is altogether satisfactory, (cheers;) and, although circumstances beyond our control may threaten for a time to interfere with the full supplies of that article so necessary for the productive industry of the country, yet no doubt that temporary evil will be productive of permanent good, (cheers,) and we shall find in various quarters of the globe sure, and certain, and ample supplies, which will render us no longer dependent on one source of production for that which is so necessary for the industry and welfare of the country. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, when we look without we see, no doubt, in many parts of Europe circumstances which, if not dealt with by prudence and discretion, may lead to local disturbances, which I trust will not, at least, extend themselves to bring us within their range. (Cheers.) On the other side of the Atlantic we witness, with the deepest affliction, (cheers,) with an affliction which no words can express, (cheers,) differences of the most lamentable kind among those whom we call our cousins and our relations. (Cheers.) It is not for us to pass judgment upon these disputes; it is enough for us to offer a fervent prayer that such differences may not be of long continuance, and that they may speedily be succeeded by the restoration of harmony and of peace. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I will no longer detain you. I will only assure you for myself and for my colleagues that we feel proud of being invited to attend upon these occasions; that we are proud of the manifestation of good-will on the part of so large and so powerful a portion of our fellow-countrymen, and that we look upon this day, when we are permitted to meet you in this hall, as one of the most agreeable and most honorable of the year.

The noble viscount resumed his seat amid loud cheers.

GOV. HARRIS' PROCLAMATION,

CALLING FOR FIRE-ARMS.

NASHVILLE, NOV. 2, 1861. }

THE State must, and to the full extent of its resources shall, be defended. Threatened with invasion, all good citizens will regard it as a patriotic duty to make any reasonable sacrifices to repel the invaders. Regiments are now in camp and organized, while others are ready to organize, but, for want of arms, are not prepared to take the field.

Prompted by the noblest impulses of patriotism, these men are ready to take the field to defend your homes and to prevent the theatre of this cruel and vindictive war being brought within our borders. They appeal to you, who quietly remain at home, to place arms in their hands, that they may give you protection and security.

If you fail to respond to this appeal, I shall be compelled by the sternest convictions of duty, charged as I am with the responsibility of seeing that the State is defended, to disband these regiments of brave soldiers, and call you, who have arms, into the service as militia.

I earnestly entreat that the people will bring forward and deliver to the clerk of the county court of their respective counties, or to such other agents as I may send to the various counties, every effective double-barrel shot-gun and sporting rifle which they may have, to be immediately shipped to the arsenal at Nashville, Knoxville, or Memphis, where the same will be valued by a competent ordnance officer, and the value paid to the owner by the Confederate Government.

I urge you to give me your aid in the important work of arming our troops, with which we can repel the invaders; but if you refuse, prepare to take the field, for I am resolved to exhaust all resources before the foot of the invader shall pollute the soil of Tennessee.

Respectfully, ISHAM G. HARRIS.

EXTORTION AT THE SOUTH.

THE Southern (Ga.) Confederacy of Nov. 9th, publishes the following on this subject:

Some time ago we published an extract from the Message of the Governor of Tennessee upon the extortions which have of late been introduced by those who have at heart their own interests more than the good of their fellow-mortals and of the country.

A few days ago Mr. Jones presented to the Tennessee Legislature the proceedings of a meeting of a portion of the citizens of Nashville, in regard to the extortions now practised, at which the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Tennessee be requested to pass some law that will prevent the ruinous prices now sought to be placed upon the staples of life, even if it shall be necessary to place the same in the hands of the military authorities.

Resolved, That we recommend that by law a tax be levied upon every gallon of spirituous liquors distilled from wheat, corn, rye, or potatoes, that shall be sufficient to prohibit the same during the present war and blockade—the proceeds thereof to be applied to the support of families with us of our soldiers on the tented field.

We approve these resolutions, and hope our Legislature, at its present session, will devise some wise and equitable plan, to put a stop to the evil. There is a wrong doing upon this subject, that ought to be reached in some way and regulated by law.

On the same day, in the Tennessee Legislature, Mr. Caruthers, from the Committee on Judiciary, to whom was referred that portion of the Governor's Message, reported two bills on the subject of frauds, speculations, and monopolies. One was "a bill to suppress buying and selling on false pretences," and the other was "a bill to suppress monopolies." These bills have fines and imprisonments in county jails and penitentiaries as the penalties for various grades of offences under these acts.

The Governor of Alabama recently issued a proclamation condemning the practice which is doing so much mischief, in which he instructed the agents of the State to purchase nothing from men so engaged; and in his recent Message to the Legislature he says: "Complaints have been made to me from many portions of the State, that there were persons engaged in purchasing articles indispensable to the support of the army and of our poor people, for the purpose, and with the intent, of extorting extravagant prices from those who might be compelled to purchase these articles. Upon this information I issued a proclamation denouncing such conduct as unpatriotic and wicked, and instructed the quartermasters and other agents of the State to purchase nothing from such persons. Merchants and tradesmen, in common with persons engaged in every legitimate pursuit, are entitled to a fostering care of the Government; but when so forgetful of social duty and regardless of the interest of their country, as to monopolize the trade in those commodities most necessary for the comfort and subsistence of our soldiers and citizens, it becomes the duty of the Legislature, as the public guardians, to adopt such measures as will prevent, as far as possible, the State and people from becoming the prey of such harpies."

The Mayor of Augusta, Georgia, has lately issued a proclamation on this subject, and public meetings have been held in Macon, Savannah, and elsewhere, to inaugurate some movement to suppress the unjust and unpatriotic speculations in the prime necessities of life—the greatest wants of the soldiers who are now fighting for the liberty which these men so abuse, and the wants of their poor families, who have already suffered much, and will suffer more unless a stop is put to it by the strong arm of the law.

Governor Brown, of Georgia, in his late Message, has also recommended the Legislature to take this matter in hand, to regulate so as to cure the evil and do justice to all. The Governors of Mississippi and Louisiana have also. These are some of the indications of public opinion.

We will now clearly define our own position on this subject. In ordinary times every man should be allowed to buy and sell any article of merchandise, or any farm productions, for just such prices as he can or will. But the times now upon us are extraordinary, and impose upon all such obligations of patriotism and duty to their fellow-citizens, as do not exist in times of peace and prosperity, and there should be some way of enforcing a compliance with these obligations and duties to the extent of their existence and no further.

For instance, our fellow-citizens have left their homes and their families to fight our battles for us. They must be clothed, and they have to buy their own clothing. It is notorious that a few men have bought up all the material that could be had, out of which their clothing could be made, and have asked the most exorbitant prices for it. The Government must feed them, and their families at home must be fed; but men with a speculative turn of mind have bought up largely the bacon and salt of the country—articles of prime necessity—which the soldier who fights, bleeds, and dies for his country, and the poor wife and children which he leaves behind him, must have or perish—and have demanded exorbitant prices for them. It is wrong and unpatriotic, and men should not do it; and our Legislature should not allow it to be done.

Before this war commenced bacon could be bought for ten and twelve and a half cents per pound. It is now selling at thirty cents. Nothing has transpired to increase the cost of making it, and its transportation costs no more. And our Government should have it to feed the soldiers; and their poor families at home should have it at a more reasonable rate; and those engaged in the sale of it should have that much patriotism in them. If they have it not, the law should furnish them with it.

Country jeans could be had for fifty cents per yard before the war, now it is from one dollar twenty-five to one dollar fifty. The labor of making it and the material out of which it is made cost no more now than then; and the soldier should have it to clothe him while he fights for us at more reasonable rates. Patriotism demands this much at the hands of those who deal in such articles. It may be difficult to frame a law to meet the exigencies of this case; but the necessity is great, and we are in favor of the Legislature making the attempt.

Coffee is selling from fifty to sixty cents per pound; but we say let it sell for whatever people are willing to give for it. It is not an article of prime necessity. It is a luxury; and let those who indulge in it get it as cheap as they can. Fine dress goods are luxuries, not necessities; let those who wear them pay what dealers see fit to ask. We would make no restrictions on any such articles as these. But during the war, when our national existence, our greatest interests, and personal honor are at stake, we would put a check upon the disposition to speculate upon such articles as the Government and the soldier must have or perish.

And now, in conclusion, we deprecate the spirit manifested by some in relation to this matter. Our neighbor, the Intelligencer, a few days ago, indulged in what we consider intemperate strictures, which, if heeded, would excite the people to deeds worse than those complained of. Such subjects should not be dealt rashly with, and the rights and equity of dealers should not be run over rough-shod by a mob, or an enraged populace, so long as any thing else will avail. We are in favor of abiding by law and recognizing every man's legal rights as long as they exist. These times, however, have imposed upon us obligations toward each other, and toward the Confederate Government, which our present laws do not exact. We are in favor of having the authorities take this matter in hand, and deal with it so as to respect the rights of dealers, while justice is secured to those who are needy. There is a line of demarkation—a golden mean—that should be carefully observed in this matter.

FIGHT ON THE WATAUGA RIVER,

NOVEMBER 10, 1861.

SECESSION REPORTS.

RICHMOND, VA., Nov. 11.

In consequence of private intelligence received at Bristol of the doings of the Union men in East Tennessee, Captain Miller picked up a party of twenty-two young men, accompanied by Mr. J. R. Howard as a volunteer, and started from Bristol by the railroad at six o'clock. They sent lanterns ahead of the train and found the track torn up between Watauga and the Union Station Bridge; but the damage was soon repaired, and they passed over safely. Arriving at Carter's Station, they stopped and threw out pickets, and about midnight the little scouting party, under Captain Miller, started to explore the country. They had proceeded some three and a half miles through Carter County, Tennessee, when they were met by a pretty heavy fire from rifles and shot-guns, which was promptly returned, and the skirmish was kept up with spirit for half a hour. The Lincolmites were some three hundred strong, and constituted the advance of a body of eight hundred stationed at Elizabethtown, the mountain stronghold of the traitors. We may state here that these men, as has been since ascertained from prisoners, expected a reinforcement of five hundred men from Watauga County, North Carolina, a disaffected region adjoining Johnson County, Tennessee. In the fight the enemy were driven out of the woods, nine killed and five taken prisoners. The remainder retreated, and our scouts returned toward their camp. Captain Miller received a charge of buckshot through his coat, and two of his men were slightly wounded in the feet. The prisoners were taken to the cavalry camp at Carter's Station.

LYNCHBURG "VIRGINIAN" ACCOUNT.

We are indebted to Captain H. H. Miller, of the Twelfth Mississippi regiment, for the following particulars of an engagement between twenty-two Virginians, under his command, and three hundred of the enemy, supposed to be under the command of — Taylor, a former member of Congress from Tennessee, which occurred at Taylor's Ford, on the Watauga River, about two o'clock Sunday morning.

Captain Miller arrived at Bristol on Saturday last, en route to Mississippi, when intelligence reached there of the depredations that were being committed by the Union men in East Tennessee. He was requested by General Clark, who was in command, to make a reconnaissance with twenty-two Virginians who had volunteered their services, and ascertain the position and numbers of the enemy on Watauga River. Captain Miller with his force arrived at Taylor's Ford, and had nearly succeeded in crossing the river, when they discovered the enemy on the opposite side in large numbers. A fight ensued, when our force got within thirty yards of the enemy. Captain Miller ordered his men to return to the shore and attack the enemy from that position. Our men were so enthusiastic that it required his utmost exertions to restrain them from crossing the river and making a charge upon the enemy. We sustained no loss. Captain Miller received a slight wound in the hand and one in the back, the ball glancing from his sword belt. One or two others were slightly wounded. The enemy's loss, as reported by two prisoners captured Monday, was nine killed and seven wounded, and their force is said to have been about seven hundred. The people are gathering in large numbers, armed with every available weapon, and express great determination to resist any invasion.

DRAWING LOTS AT RICHMOND, VA.

THE HOSTAGES FOR THE PRIVATEERSMEN.

The following is the official correspondence relating to the selection, by lot, of hostages for the prisoners of war :

C. S. A. WAR DEPARTMENT. }
RICHMOND, NOV. 9, 1861. }

SIR: You are hereby instructed to choose, by lot, from among the prisoners of war of highest rank, one who is to be confined in a cell appropriated to convicted felons, and who is to be treated in all respects as if such convict, and to be held for execution in the same manner as may be adopted by the enemy for the execution of the prisoner of war Smith, recently condemned to death in Philadelphia.

You will also select thirteen other prisoners of war, the highest in rank of those captured by our forces, to be confined in the cells reserved for prisoners accused of infamous crimes, and will treat them as such so long as the enemy shall continue so to treat the like number of prisoners of war captured by them at sea, and now held for trial in New York as pirates.

As these measures are intended to repress the infamous attempt now made by the enemy to commit judicial murder on prisoners of war, you will execute them strictly, as the mode best calculated to prevent the commission of so heinous a crime. Your obedient servant,

J. P. BENJAMIN,
Acting Secretary of War.

To Brig.-Gen. JOHN H. WINDER,
Richmond, Virginia.

HEAD-QUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF HENRICO, }
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, NOV. 11, 1861. }

SIR: In obedience to your instructions contained in your letter of the 9th instant, one prisoner of war of the highest rank in our possession was chosen, by lot, to be held for execution in the same manner as may be adopted by the enemy for the execution of Smith, recently condemned to death in Philadelphia. The names of the six colonels were placed in a can. The first name drawn was that of Col. Corcoran, Sixty-ninth regiment N. Y. S. M., who is the hostage chosen to answer for Smith.

In choosing the thirteen from the highest rank to be held for a like number of prisoners of war captured by the enemy at sea, there being only ten field-officers, it was necessary to draw by lot three captains. The first names drawn were Captains J. B. Ricketts, H. McQuade, and J. W. Rockwood.

The list of thirteen will therefore stand: Colonels Lee, Cogswell, Wilcox, Woodruff, and Wood; Lieutenant-Colonels Bowman and Neff; Majors Potter, Revere, and Vogdes; Captains Ricketts, McQuade, and Rockwood. Respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN. H. WINDER,
Brigadier-Genue.

HON. J. P. BENJAMIN,
Sec. of War.

RICHMOND, VA., November 12, 1861. }

SIR: In obedience to your instructions, all the wounded officers have been exempted as hostages, to await the result of the trial of prisoners captured by the enemy at sea. I have therefore made selections, by lot, of Captains H. Bowman and T. Keffer to replace Captains Ricketts and McQuade, wounded.

The list of thirteen will now stand: Colonels Lee, Cogswell, Wilcox, Woodruff, and Wood; Lieutenant-Colonels Bowman and Neff; Majors Potter, Revere, and Vogdes; Captains Rockwood, Bowman and Keffer. Respectfully, your obedient servant, JOHN H. WINDER,
Brigadier-General.

HON. J. P. BENJAMIN,
Sec. of War, Richmond.

HOW THE BALLOTS WERE DRAWN.

ACCOUNT BY AN OFFICER.

RICHMOND PRISON, VA., NOV. 11, 1861.

SIR: This lets you know that I am in as good health and spirits as could be expected under confinement so long. It is now sixteen weeks since I was taken, with many more, on the battle-field at Bull Run, and since that many more have been taken and brought here. They number in all, who have been brought to Richmond, as many as two thousand six to seven hundred. Some arrived as late as last night—a few from Fairfax and Leesburg; and before, over 700 from the Leesburg battle of the 21st of October, and on the north side of the Potomac, which no doubt you have got the news of. I think that through and by the same flag of truce that this comes, other versions and the details of the battle will be sent by officers in full knowledge of the facts, from the spot, which of course you will become acquainted with.

There is one thing I wish to let you know, which is this: the General in charge of this post, Richmond, Brigadier-General Winder, with five or six other officers, came into prison yesterday at four o'clock P. M., called us officers to order, and stated that he had an order from the War Department to ballot one out of the highest rank of the six colonels now prisoners of war in their possession, and the one balloted and drawn to be placed in a cell in prison, similar to that in which the condemned pirate Smith at Philadelphia is placed, and to be disposed of according to his fate. The ballots being prepared, the names of the six were as follows:

1. Col. Lee, Twentieth regiment Massachusetts Volunteers.
2. Col. Cogswell, Forty-second New York Zouaves.
3. Col. Corcoran, Sixty-ninth New York State Militia.
4. Col. Woodruff, Second Kentucky regiment.
5. Col. Wilcox, First Michigan regiment.
6. Col. Wood, Fourteenth New York State Militia, Brooklyn.

They were placed fairly in a tin or ballot box, a cap covering it, and then well shaken. The drawer appointed by the General was the Hon. Alfred Ely, M. C., of Rochester, N. Y. It so happened that the said lot fell on Michael Corcoran, colonel of the Sixty-ninth regiment New York State Militia, now at Castle Pinckney, near Charleston, S. C. Then the other five colonels were to stand with others next in rank to them against and in lieu of the other thirteen under trial for piracy, and also to be dealt with accordingly. The officers next in rank, to make up the thirteen, are:

- Major Potter, Thirty-eighth regiment N. Y. Volunteers.
 Lieut.-Col. Neff, Second Kentucky Volunteers.
 Major Revere, Tenth regiment Mass. Volunteers.
 Lieut.-Col. Bowman, Pennsylvania.
 Major Vogles, U. S. First Artillery.

Then out from among the captains were drawn three to make up the thirteen, the drawing done by Mr. Ely. It happened that the first three drawn from the box were these:

1. Capt. McQuade, Thirty-eighth regiment, N. Y.—not expected to survive from wounds received at the battle of Manassas.
2. Capt. Rockwood, Fifteenth Mass.
3. Capt. Ricketts, U. S. First Artillery; he still lies in a critical condition since the 2d July in one of the hospitals here. His wife has been his attendant ever since she could get to him.

It was emphatically stated that whatever course was taken with those fourteen pirates by our Government, the same course would be followed in dealing with those selected in this way—so that we wait impatiently to know the fate of our brother officers. I remain yours, most respectfully,
 JOHN WHYTE,
 First Lieut. Seventy-Ninth Regt. N. Y. S. M.

P. S.—10 A. M. Nov. 12.—Gen. Winder has just come to the prison and called the captains, eleven in number, and balloted two out from them in place of the two whom I have mentioned as not fit to be removed from the hospital to the prison cells. The two drawn happened to be:

1. Capt. Keffer, Co. N, First California regt., Philadelphia.
2. Capt. Bowman, Co. E, Fifteenth regt. Mass. Vol.

Preparations are being made to put the selected in the cells of the county prisons. We trust there will be no hanging, and we are all in pretty good spirits.

AFFAIR AT CLARK'S STATION, MO.

CAMP OF THE FIRST KANSAS,
 TIPTON, MO., November 11. }

LAST night a band of rebels, armed and mounted, broke open and plundered the store of a loyal citizen, at Clark's Station, seven miles east of this post. They fled toward the South, taking with them a large amount of valuable goods. On receiving information of the robbery, Col. Deitzler sent a squad of cavalry in pursuit, under charge of Lieut. Shriver. Toward night, ten of the party returned, bringing three prisoners, four horses, one mule, six guns, a portion of the stolen goods, and some money. On emerging from a piece of timber they came upon the robber gang, some ten miles out, at a house where they had halted. Four of the rebels were caught trying to beat a retreat, leaving the plunder scattered about the place. The rest of the herd, numbering twelve or fifteen, scampered off with forty of our party in hot pursuit. One of the prisoners, persuaded by the sight of a rope and some remarks from the Lieut.—the nature and force of which will be conceived by those who know this plucky officer—made a clean breast of it, giving information of a large portion of the booty stored in the house of an accomplice eight miles beyond, and consented to act as a guide to the place.

This evening the rest of the party came in with five more of the robbers, their horses and their arms, four Government mules found in their possession, and a large quantity of the plunder, having travelled about thirty miles, and visited many houses scattered over the country through which they passed, in which nearly all the inhabitants are virulent secessionists. They captured all of the gang engaged in the depredation of whom they got sight, except one who, being well mounted, made his escape.

FIGHT AT GAULEY BRIDGE, VA.

NOVEMBER 10, 1861.

At daylight on the morning of the 10th November, Col. De Villiers crossed the New River, with the first detachment from his regiment, the Eleventh Ohio. The river was swollen and rapid, but in spite of the difficulties which it presented, the colonel had passed over before noon, nearly the whole available force under his command. At 12 o'clock he drove in the enemy's pickets, planted our flag in their breastworks, and posted guards all along the ridge overlooking our communications. In driving in the pickets, John Roe, private of Company A, pressed forward far in advance of his companions, and received a ball from a Mississippi rifle through his head, killing him instantly. It required a long, extended line of sentinels to guard the ridge of its whole length; consequently the posts in each were weak and widely separated from their reserve. At eight o'clock in the evening the enemy in full force made an attack upon these outposts, driving some of them back over the ridge, while others held their position until the morning. Satisfied with this dash, and not waiting the advance of our reserve, the enemy withdrew to their camp. In the morning, Col. De Villiers, with a part of his regiment and a detachment from the Second Kentucky, made a bold movement toward the enemy's camp, exchanging fire with their outposts and still advancing. A ball grazed the colonel's ear, slightly abrading the skin. The enemy withdrew at his approach, abandoning their principal encampment at Cotton Hill. Thus the first aggressive movement was successfully made by the Eleventh Ohio regiment, supported in the latter part of the engagement by reinforcements from the other two regiments of Gen. Cox's brigade, the First and Second Kentucky.

General Cox took the initiative and fairly and alone drove the enemy from their position, by a bold movement across the river at its widest point, and up precipitous ascents which would have discouraged any less enthusiastic soldiers than those under his command, and these, too, stimulated to heroism by the example and presence of Col. De Villiers. The Eleventh lost eight men in killed and missing, one severely wounded, and ten slightly injured. Robert Bachelor, of Yellow Springs, received two mortal wounds while holding his position against overwhelming odds. Before going into action he said that he had heard so much of the cruelties practised by the enemy upon their prisoners, that he was determined he would never surrender.

There were many instances of personal bravery displayed by our men. One deserves prominent record. Sergeant Carter, of Tippencanoe, Ohio, was upon the post first attacked by the enemy. The advance guard of the Second Virginia, consisting of twelve men, came suddenly upon him and his three companions. The bright moonlight revealed the flashing bayonets of the advancing regiment. He was surrounded and separated from his reserve. With great presence of mind he stepped out and challenged, "Halt! Who goes there?" The advance guard, supposing they had come upon a scouting party of their own men, answered, "Friends, with the countersign." At his order, "Advance one, and give the countersign," they hesitated. He repeated the order peremptorily, "Advance and give the countersign, or I'll blow you through." They answered, without advancing, "Mississippi." "Where do you belong?" he demanded. "To the Second Virginia regiment." "Where are you going?" "Along the ridge." They then in turn questioned him, "Who are you?" "That's my own business," he answered, and taking deliberate aim he shot down his questioner. He called for his boys to follow him, and sprung down a ledge of rock, while a full volley went over his head. He heard his companions summoned to surrender, and the order given to the major to advance with the regiment. Several started in pursuit of him. He had to descend the hill on the side toward the enemy's camp. While he eluded his pursuers, he found himself in a new danger. He had gotten within the enemy's camp pickets! He had, while running, torn the U. S. from his cartridge box, and covered his belt plate with his cap box, and tore the stripe from his pantaloons. He was challenged by their sentinels while making his way out, and answered, giving the countersign, "Mississippi," Second Virginia regiment. They asked him what he was doing there. He said that the boys had gone off on a scout after the Yankees; that he had been detained in camp, and in trying to find them had got bewildered. As he passed through, to prevent further questioning, he said, "Our boys are up on the ridge, which is the best way up?" They answered, "Bear to the left and you'll find it easier to climb." Soon again his pursuers were after him, as he expresses it, "breaking brush behind him;" this time, with a hound on his trail, he made his way to a brook, and running down the shallow stream, threw the dog off the scent, and as the day was dawning he came suddenly upon four pickets, who brought their arms to a ready, and challenged him. He gave the countersign, Mississippi; claimed to belong to the Second Virginia. His cap box had slipped from his belt plate. They asked him where he got that belt. He told them he had captured it that night from a Yankee. They told him to advance, and as he approached, he recognized their accoutrements and knew he was among his own men, a picket guard from the First Kentucky. He was taken before Col. Enyart and dismissed to his regiment. Such acts ought to be recorded, such men rewarded with promotion. I asked him what his motive was in halting a whole column of the enemy. He said his plan was to give intimation to the reserve of their advance that they might open upon them on their left flank, and so, perhaps, arrest their progress.

Colonel Benham is preparing to-day to move in pursuit of the retreating force under Floyd.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT.

CAMP LOUP CREEK, NEAR GAULEY, VA. }
November 11, 1861. }

In my last letter I informed you of an early preparation for a general battle, but up to this time nothing of the sort has transpired, although we are momentarily expecting it; and will surely have it, if some unforeseen event does not transpire. If such a thing as a battle takes place, it will be one of extermination on either side. For it will be the great battle for supremacy in the Kanawha Valley. The strength of the Southern forces is variously estimated at from seven to eight thousand, not including cavalry and artillery. Our forces must be at least thirteen thousand. The Southern forces are commanded by Generals Floyd and Henningsen, and are now situated between Cotton Mountain and Fayetteville.

General Benham's brigade, some three thousand five hundred strong, are at this point, Gen. Schenck's is at Camp Ewing, near Mountain Cave; Col. McCook's brigade a few miles from them; Gen. Cox is at Gauley, and Gen. Rosecrans at Tompkins' farm. The men are all in good spirits, and anxiously awaiting the coming contest. The truth of the matter is, they are willing to meet double their number, so as to get out of Western Virginia; and if they are foiled in this attempt to capture Floyd, they will feel worse than crazy.

They are all now well uniformed, and have plenty to eat. They are neat, clean, and tidy. I don't suppose that a single man is now unequipped in the whole division.

Since writing the above, I have learned that the rebels have vamoosed from the Fayetteville road, and are now making tall tracks for Lewisburg. Floyd was too "wide awake" to put his head into the trap laid for him. Several of our officers are terribly exasperated at being thus deprived of capturing the arch-thief; and among them all, I saw none more excited than the brave Gen. Benham. He felt almost confident that his brigade alone would be able for Floyd, and to be thus deprived of seeing him excited him considerably. It was surprising to me to see how expeditiously he marched his whole brigade across the Kanawha at night. Not a murmur escaped the lips of a single man—not a sound hardly was heard—all was done in a quiet, easy, and knowing manner.

The men have the greatest confidence in him. He is an old soldier, having served twenty-eight years in the regular army; was second in his class, and is now about forty-five years of age.

MASSAORE AT GUYANDOTTE, VA.

ADJUTANT WHEELER'S REPORT.

THE undersigned, acting as Adjutant of the Ninth Virginia regiment, would beg leave respectfully to report, that, on Sunday evening, the 10th Nov., a little after seven o'clock, the said regiment, consisting of only one hundred and fifty men yet in camp, was completely surprised by seven hundred cavalry, under command of Jenkins, the guerilla chief, and cut to pieces or captured, with the loss also of about thirty horses, a small stock of Government stores, and two hundred Enfield rifles. The dead and wounded on either side could not be clearly ascertained, but supposed to be ten or twelve killed, and twenty or thirty wounded. The enemy captured seventy prisoners, and their loss in killed and wounded was equal to, if not greater than ours. They left one of their captains dead in the street. His name was Hubbell, or a name similar in sound.

Three other bodies of the enemy were found in the street, and they were seen to throw several from the suspension bridge into the Guyandotte, killed by our men while they were crossing the bridge, besides a wagon load was hauled off in the night. Three of our dead were found—one was known to be shot one mile above town, on the bank of the Ohio River, and four in crossing the Guyandotte River. Several others are missing, and are supposed to be killed. Among the number is Capt. G. W. Bailey, of Portsmouth, who commanded a company in the railroad masked battery affair at Vienna, and also at Bull Run. Among those taken prisoners, are the Hon. K. V. Whaley, who was in command of the place; T. J. Hey-slip, Clerk in the Quartermaster's Department; Capt. Paine, of Ohio, who was one of the first three to plant the Stars and Stripes on the walls of Monterey, in Mexico; and Capt. Ross, of Ironton, an intelligent Scotchman. Captain Thomas, of Higginsport, Ohio, is supposed to be taken; and also Dr. Morris, of Ironton, the first Surgeon.

The rebels also arrested and took with them the following Union citizens, after having first taken and destroyed their goods: Wm. Dowthit, merchant, and his son; Dr. Rouse, druggist, who was also a Commissioner of the Federal Court; Albert White, and perhaps some others. At Barboursville they captured John W. Alford, candidate for the Legislature; Matthew Thompson and all his goods; old Mr. Kyle and Morey. These prisoners were lashed together and compelled to walk. Among their other cruelties, I will mention one incident: James E. Wood, a citizen of the place for many years, but now in the army, had his hand shot off. He was then run over by the cavalry and his hips put out of place, but he managed to get to the middle of the suspension bridge, jumped off and swam to the opposite shore of the Guyandotte, where he was taken and his hands tied behind him and refused any thing to eat, until a secession woman almost compelled them to allow her to minister to his wants; and when they marched off, he was compelled to march afoot in his disabled condition.

The attack was so sudden and unexpected, that not more than forty of our men got into line to resist them. Others, however, fought them singly, and those only made their escape, who were satisfied at the start that the number of the enemy was too great to contend against, and fled immediately, except in a few instances, where they hid under houses and log piles until the enemy retired. Some fifty or sixty are known to have got away, and perhaps others will turn up.

The rebels held the place until about ten o'clock the next morning, when the S. B. Boston came up with about two hundred of the Fifth Virginia regiment, under Col. Zeigler. They were joined by a number of the Home Guards, of Lawrence County, Ohio, who had assembled at Proctorsville, opposite, to prevent the rebels from landing in Ohio, which they had threatened to do.

On the arrival of the Boston, some shots were fired at her from Guyandotte, which were answered by a shot from a small two-pounder, sending a ball through a rebel's brick house. The rebels immediately left on double-quick time, and the hypocritical secession citizens, who had been instrumental in getting up the attack, came on the bank of the Ohio with a great number of white flags, which they waived quite enthusiastically, supposing they could still deceive our brave Union men, who had plead for them and saved their property from destruction, but it was all in vain.

Their destruction was decreed by an indignant people, and three regiments would not have prevented them from burning the town. Our troops passed over; a few shots were fired at the rear guard of the retreating rebels, and a few arrests made of leading secessionists, among them H. H. Miller, who had been for some time with the rebel army, and came in with Jenkins and got trapped at home; E. A. Smith, who was seen firing with a revolver on our soldiers in the street; John S. Everett, who shot at one of our soldiers swimming the Guyandotte, and several others. And then the town was soon in flames. No Union man's house was set on fire, but several caught from the others. The town is, at least three-fourths of it, burnt up. All the stores, the hotel, and the finest dwelling houses, are in ashes.

It is supposed that Jenkins went with his force to his own plantation, as the next night his warehouse was thrown open, a large fire burning in front of it, and a man with a lantern under the bank, hailed the steamboat Moderator, but our captain was not quite green enough to be caught in that secessh trap. He, however, rang the bell twice, as though he were going to land. But ten or twelve men showed themselves, and there is very little doubt that the warehouse was full of his ragamuffin crew.

When I left, there was a report that three thousand infantry of the rebel army were at Proctorsville, marching on Guyandotte, but I supposed it to be a false rumor.

Yours, most respectfully,

J. O. WHEELER.

Mr. Wheeler says, in addition to what he has written, that the first intimation he or any one else had of the attack upon the town—all was confusion, and indiscriminate fighting was going on in the streets. The attack was made about seven o'clock in the evening, and in a short time the rebels had formed their lines around the town. Mr. Wheeler made his escape, in company with his little boy, by running into a cornfield with a heavy fire in his rear. He walked all night before he met a man whom he dared to approach upon the subject of crossing the river. When he did finally encounter a Union (?) man, he had to employ the persuasive chink of the almighty dollar before he could be accommodated. Congressman Whaley acted gallantly, appearing in the streets and urging his men to resistance. The secession citizens who knew of the contemplated attack, had succeeded in completely deluding Whaley's men. There was not a single picket out at the time of the attack, and no alarm was given.

IRONTON "REGISTER" ACCOUNT.

Our neighboring town of Guyandotte, Virginia, opposite the upper part of this county—a town of about one thousand inhabitants when the war began—was the theatre of tragic events and terrible scenes last Sunday night and Monday. The town is two-thirds in ashes—hotels, business houses, and dwellings, all in one dreadful ruin. The people—nearly all of the bitterest and most violent secessionists and rebels, with scarcely "ten righteous" among them, far in advance, in rebel work, of any in all Western Virginia—the people have met with a terrible retribution, awfully severe, yet the fruit of their own works. What a reward is theirs! Ten of its leading men now prisoners in jail, their stores, hotels, and fine residences in total ruins, their families wanderers!

Col. K. V. Whaley, of Wayne Co., Va., was forming the Ninth Virginia regiment, with his camp at Guyandotte. He had altogether about one hundred and fifty men, but many were absent on furlough last Sunday. On Saturday, thirty-five men of the cavalry of Col. Zeigler's Fifth Virginia, under Lieuts. Feazzel and Shanley, joined him; and probably Col. Whaley had on Sunday night, when attacked, not to exceed one hundred and thirty-five or one hundred and forty men under his command in Guyandotte. Eighteen were in the hospital, mostly with the measles. The attack was sudden, and entirely unexpected, and his men were "taking it easy"—some at church, some sauntering about town, some asleep in their quarters, and only a "camp guard" out, no "pickets" out. In short, they were in a criminally careless condition, and, so far as Col. Whaley was concerned, merited to be "cleaned out," and it was done, although there was abundant evidence of his gallant conduct in the fight. About eight o'clock in the evening the rebel guerilla cavalry of Col. Jenkins, in force estimated from four hundred to eight hundred—very good authority puts it at eight hundred, but probably four hundred is nearer the actual number—suddenly fell upon Col. Whaley, from different directions. "Rally!" was instantly the word in Whaley's camp; the men gathered in squads, sheltering themselves behind buildings, embankments, and from the darkness of their various places of making "stands," made a gallant resistance of over an hour, pouring a dreadful fire in upon their assailants in the streets. From their scattered condition at the onset, probably not many over one hundred Union men got to their guns—Enfield rifles, but those that did, fought desperately against four to one, and they only gave up the fight, at last, when overwhelmed by the superior numbers.

There was a sanguinary struggle at the bridge over the Guyandotte River, and those who have since visited the bridge report it covered with blood, as in a slaughter-house. Some of the Federal troops were killed here, and their bodies are said to have been thrown off the bridge into the river by their rebel antagonists. A reliable man, who was in the fight, tells us that one wounded man begged not to be thrown over, but he says, "I heard a splash." Three of our men attempted to swim the Guyandotte River; two of them are reported shot; one did swim the river, but he received a bullet in the leg. One man was pulled out from under a house. Another concealed near says: "I heard an officer yell, 'Here, shoot this d—d Yankee!'" Wm. Wilson, of Marion, in this county, is said to have been thrown from the bridge. He swam out, concealed himself, and after daylight the next morning, he with another man, having passed up under the bank of the Ohio, was shot from the house of Robert Stewart, a notorious rebel, just above Guyandotte, and wounded severely in the thigh. Wilson was lying at Fuller's, in Quaker Bottom, Monday night. Yells of the infuriated rebels were often heard, such as: "Don't let a man escape!" "Give 'em hell!" "Take no prisoners!" and language not best to repeat. There are reports of firing on our men from the windows in town; so men in the fight say.

The rebels pursued the squads, charging upon them around the corners, running down individuals, killing some, wounding others, taking others prisoners; and after the fight was over, they hunted many from places where they had attempted to conceal themselves. The rebel troops held possession of the town until about eight o'clock Monday morning, when they left, just as the steamer Boston, with a portion of the Fifth Virginia, under command of Col. Zeigler, was about arriving, and other Union soldiers were gathering in; for the country, for thirty miles above and thirty below, had been alarmed.

We find it a difficult matter to arrive at the exact loss on either side, but probably can get fully as near to it as usual in such cases, perhaps nearer. The dead bodies of six—four Union, two rebels—have been brought down to Ceredo, one of them a rebel captain. They carried off their wounded, except one we hear of, said to be mortally wounded in the side. Also, they carried away, in wagons that belonged to Col. Whaley's men, several dead bodies. The names of the dead on our side, as far as we can learn, are James Massie, Wm. Vititoe, Pleasant Lunsford, all from the northeast part of this county, and John Malloy, an Irishman. We can arrive certainly at ten wounded on our side—among them Wm. Wilson, Clement Nance, George Sines, and Amos Lambert, of the northeast part of this county. The leg of Sines was broken by a ball. Also a man named Bragg was among the wounded. Dr. G. B. Bailey, of Portsmouth, who commanded the Portsmouth Company in the First Ohio, at the Bull Run defeat, is said to have been shot in the chin, and taken prisoner. He was acting as assistant surgeon in Col. Whaley's command. We know, leaving out of account any reported thrown into the river, that of the Federal troops five were killed, ten wounded—this positive; others probably killed and wounded. The rebel loss was probably greater, for they were exposed in the open streets, while our men fought from sheltered positions.

P. S.—The dead body of Dr. Bailey, of Portsmouth, was found in the river, at the mouth of the Guyandotte. The wound in the chin was not serious; and probably he was either thrown from the bridge, or drowned while attempting to swim the Guyandotte River.

Of prisoners, the rebels took about forty-five, Col. Whaley of the number. Among them were Dr. Jona. Morris, surgeon; Thos. Ross, sergeant-major; Hamilton Smith, (son of John K.,) Jacob Black—all of Ironton. Capt. Uriah Payne, who had a company there from the back part of this county, which suffered severely, was among the prisoners. Captain A. T. Brattin, of Ironton, after the fight, concealed himself under a house, and escaped the next morning. Ol. McClure escaped in the same way. It was McClure who shot the rebel captain. We are indebted to Captain Brattin for much of this narration, corroborated by several others. In leaving Guyandotte Monday morning, the prisoners had their arms bound behind with strong cords or ropes, and, in some instances, where they did not step to suit their guard, we are quite reliably informed they were kicked; one was seized by the hair of his head and kicked.

The rebels captured about two hundred Enfield rifles, thirty-eight cavalry horses, and all the saddles and horse equipments, which had just been received, and were new; also, they took some commissary stores. When they first made the attack, a strong party went directly to the stables where our men had their horses, in their manner showing that they had been fully "posted." Several of their horses were killed.

There is no doubt that the rebels in town had accurately informed the rebel troops of the condition of all things there; and that the rebel people of that place were expecting the attack at the very time it was made, and had governed themselves accordingly. One of our concealed men, who escaped, heard the rapturous congratulations between Col. Jenkins and John W. Hite, a notorious secession citizen, on Monday morning. A rebel family, under whose house one of our escaped men was hidden, heard them, over his head, getting an "early breakfast" for a squad of the victors, and heard the women of the house laugh and carry on in great glee about the whipped Yankees. When our troops were there the next day, theirs was a "Union house, and had ever a any thing else!"

BURNING OF GUYANDOTTE.

About nine o'clock, Monday morning, Nov. 11, Colonel Zeigler, of the Fifth Virginia regiment, arrived at Guyandotte, from Ceredo, with a force of Union troops—the last of the rebel soldiers leaving as he arrived. Stories of the night before were heard; the general rebel conduct of Guyandotte through the nine months past, many women included, was recollected; Guyandotte, as the head-quarters of rebel spies and as a nest of traitors, called by many "vipers, and rattlesnakes," was thought of; there was much excitement and exasperation, and soon—the town was in flames! The compact part of the town—all the business portion—was committed to the "devouring element." The flouring mill, at the upper part of the town, was also burnt. Robert Stewart's residence, above town, from which Wilson was shot in the morning, also his stable, went the same way. As near as we can judge, from one-half to two-thirds of all the houses in town were burnt, probably safe to say over one hundred houses.

Whether the town was fired by Col. Zeigler's men, (he is a resident of the adjoining county Wayne,) we are not advised. No pity is due rebels there—the men, and some of the men—for their hard fate. They brought it on themselves. They were at peace; they fight—not peace.

Colonel Zeigler arrested ten leading citizens of Guyandotte as prisoners, to wit: John W. E. Henry H. Miller, A. P. Chapman, Elijah McKetts, E. A. Smith, Jacob Bumgarner, H. H. Bumgarner, E. H. Walton, Kiah Thornburg, Stewart, a son of Robert Stewart. These were sent to camp Chase, Columbus. Tuesday, Saint Russel and O. O. Ong also arrested, and taken that night to Ceredo.

GALLIPOLIS "JOURNAL" ACCOUNT.

Monday evening, Nov. 10, about half-past nine o'clock, nine hundred secession cavalry, under A. G. Jenkins, made a descent upon the town of Guyandotte, garrisoned by one hundred Federal infantry of the Ninth Virginia regiment, and thirty cavalry belonging to the First Virginia. Most of the troops, at the time of the attack, were at church, or scattered about town, least suspecting an enemy, thus giving the rebels every advantage; but, notwithstanding the disparity of numbers, the brave little band rushed to their arms, and contested the ground against this formidable force for the space of one hour, when they were compelled to yield to superior numbers.

The rebels divided their forces at Barboursville, and, coming down each side of Guyandotte River, united—those on the lower side crossing the railroad bridge near the town.

A. G. Jenkins commanded the rebels in person, and their cry as they entered the town, was, "Take no prisoners," "give no quarter." Jim Hereford seemed to be the most conspicuous cut-throat among them, insisting that all should be killed.

Capt. Hunter and two privates ran for the Guyandotte River, pursued by a number of rebels. The privates plunged into the water and were shot in the middle of the stream while swimming for the opposite shore; the captain lay down at the edge of the water, and after the miscreants left, quietly slipped into the water, swam over, and made his way to Ceredo.

From the best information, only seven of the Federalists were killed, and it is supposed the rebel loss was equally as great. They carried off all their killed and wounded except one captain, who was found dead in an alley, shot through the heart.

A keel boat loaded with wheat, belonging to Wm. H. Langley, was lying at the wharf. It was in charge of Mr. John Lawson, a miller in the employ of Mr. Langley, and three hands from Gallipolis—Thomas Berridge, Andrew Langley, and John Blagg. Lawson and Berridge were at church when the attack was made, and the latter were on board the boat. Several Union citizens, together with Mr. Berridge, took refuge in this boat and shoved her in the stream, when a large force of rebels made their appearance on the bank and opened an indiscriminate fire upon them, threatening at the same time to kill every man on board if they didn't land. At this juncture young Langley and Blagg jumped into a skiff attached to the boat and rowed for the Ohio side amidst a shower of bullets. The firing became so hot that they felt the greater safety was in jumping in the river and towing the boat, which they did amid a continuous shower of bullets until they reached the Ohio shore. Just as they landed a bullet struck the bank within a few inches of Mr. Blagg. The keel boat was landed and all on board taken prisoners.

The steamer Liberty, bound for Cincinnati, was hailed above Guyandotte by loyal citizens, and turned back. She brought the news to Gallipolis, and about six hundred of the Fourth Virginia regiment, stationed at Point Pleasant, under command of Col. Lightburn, together with the Gallipolis Artillery, Captain McClurg, proceeded immediately by steamboat to the scene of action. When they reached there a large force from Ceredo and points below had already assembled, and the rebels, anticipating a warm time, scampered to the hills with about one hundred and thirty prisoners, among whom are Lieutenant-Colonel Bailey of the Ninth Virginia regiment, Dr. Jonathan Morris, formerly of Gallipolis, John Lawson, and Thomas Berridge, in the employ of Wm. H. Langley, and all the Union men the scoundrels could lay hands on.

Col. Zeigler, of the Fifth Virginia regiment, ascertaining that a trap had been laid by the secesh citizens of Guyandotte to ensnare the Federal troops, and that they had actually fired upon the troops from their dwellings, ordered the match to be applied, and every house, except two in a remote part of the town, was laid in ashes.

BATTLE OF LITTLE BLUE, MO.

A CORRESPONDENT gives the following account of this action:

CAMP JENNISON, KANSAS CITY, NOV. 12, 1861.

The Jayhawkers have already vindicated their reputation for daring, celerity, vigor, and pluck. Night before last, two companies, B and H, and part of Company A, under Capt. Swoyer and Pardee and Lobnis, commanded by Col. Anthony, left camp for Majors' Farm, about ten miles south, where the Government wagons and oxen were coralled. Reports had come in that a force of rebel guerillas, under Col. Hays, which were reported encamped on the Little Blue, had threatened to attack the train. Yesterday morning early, Company C, Capt. Jenkins, was sent to reinforce.

Information was soon after received that a fight had taken place, and some of our boys killed. This latter was confirmed by the arrival of messengers for the surgeon.

It appears that Col. Anthony, receiving information Sunday night that there was a rebel camp at a point eight or ten miles southeast of Majors', after consultation with his officers, determined to make an attack early in the morning. By six A. M. the command, consisting of one hundred and ten men, was composed of parts of Companies A, B and H, the first under Lieut. Lobnis, the others under Capt. Swoyer and Pardee. The rebel encampment was located at some distance from any main road, and in a very dangerous and strong place. The exact force was not known, but supposed to be double our own. After a sharp ride, the pickets of the enemy were discernible. They fled at our approach, and gave notice to the camp. About three-fourths of a mile from the creek, the command dismounted; the horses were left in charge of Company H. The guide, a secesh named Gray, broke and ran back, but was stopped by Col. Anthony, who compelled him to remain by his side throughout the fight.

Pushing through the brush, Company A charged down the river bank, through a narrow and rocky ravine, driving the bushwhackers from their hiding places as they advanced. Company B, under Capt. Swoyer, swung round to the top of the bluff.

To show the position of the rebels, a slight explanation may be necessary. After passing the undergrowth, some half mile from the horses, two deep ravines were discernible, running to the right and left, winding down to the stream round a high bluff, the top of which formed a plateau, upon which a large number of rebel horses were picketed. It was on this plateau, and through the upper part of the right ravine, that Swoyer's men charged. Down the left one to the stream went Colonel Anthony and Company A. On the east side of the creek they found a number of tents encamped between the bluffs and jutting rocks. On the opposite bank of the stream, on the bluffs commanding the east camp, was another encampment, which, with the force at command, it was impossible to reach. Col. Anthony drove the secesh from their holes below, while Capt. Swoyer did so above. Every rock and stump was used for cover. The natural defensive strength of the place was very good, and the fighting was almost hand to hand, men on both sides bringing the muzzles of their rifles against each other. It was evident that the rebels were over four hundred strong, and well armed.

The individual cases of bravery were somewhat surprising. In the fight below, several were killed on both sides, as also above. At this, Col. Anthony issued orders as a feint to bring up the reserve. The bugler, mistaking the purport, rode back, sounding the advance, and Pardee's men rushed on to the ground. By this time Company B had swept up on the bluff again, and a charge was again made under a severe fire from the concealed foe. Company H suffered severely under the fire, and, though in it but a few minutes, lost more men than any other. They fought like tigers. Cheer after cheer was given by the different companies for each other, and the continuous yelling was startling. Though wild with the frenzy of battle, the boys were under perfect control, and when the order was given for a retreat, they did so in excellent order. This, however, was not done until all the firing on the east side had ceased. On the plateau spoken of, nearly one hundred horses were picketed. Col. A., finding himself too far from his horses, which were liable to be cut off, and perceiving that with the force under his command, it would be useless to attempt to cross the stream under the fire of the western camp, and endeavor to scale the precipitous bluffs, which there were at least fifty or sixty feet high, privately gave the order for the men to secure the horses fit to ride—many being wounded. At the same time the bugler sounded a charge, and under cover of the movement and of a brisk fire from the other encampment, the boys left the battle ground of the Little Blue.

A number of tents were found, but in the position of affairs it was not deemed prudent to risk more lives in an attempt to carry them off. Our dead, which were mostly in exposed positions, had also to be left. The men reached their horses, and leisurely returned to camp.

Col. Anthony took one prisoner early in the battle, a fellow named Estes. When Company H had reached the bottom, he rode furiously down the other gully up to the colonel, shouting, "They are coming! they are coming!" "Who's coming?" "The Federals!" was the answer. "You are my prisoner," shouted Col. Anthony. The fellow drove his spurs in his horse, but as it jumped he was fired at, and a ball passed through the neck of the animal—not the man, unfortunately, though he fell.

Col. Anthony was not wounded, though two balls struck his sabre, one passing through the handle, the other striking the sheath. It is certain, from a comparison of the different reports, that no less than thirty of the rebels were killed and many wounded. A large number of their horses were also killed.

The following are the dead and wounded on our side: Company A—Killed, Robert Henderson, Corporal Eye, supposed to be killed; wounded and missing, Steve Stilwell, — Anderson, both of Douphan County. Company B—Killed, Isaac Merrick, William Popjes; wounded, Fred. Kimball, William Bowman, Robert Barry, W. T. Johns, James A. Hunter, J. P. Swan, severely, all of Illinois. Company C—Killed, Wallace Holmes, of Linn County, — Johnson, of Leavenworth, — Dillon, Leavenworth, — Reese, orderly sergeant, and since reported wounded and a prisoner.

RECONNOISSANCE AT MATTHIAS PT.

COL. GRAHAM'S OFFICIAL REPORT.

HEAD-QUARTERS FIFTH REGT. EXCELSIOR BRIGADE,
CAMP FENTON, NEAR PORT TOBACCO, MD.,
Monday, November 11, 1861.

GENERAL: Shortly after my arrival at this point, Capt. Arthur Wilkinson, of Company I, this regiment, by my orders seized several boats, and manned them with crews of sailors taken from his company. They were employed in reconnoitring the Potomac shore and neighboring creeks, and in keeping a general surveillance over the movements and actions of secession sympathizers on this shore. In numerous reconnoitring expeditions Capt. Wilkinson was frequently materially assisted by Lieut. Daniel Magaw, of the U. S. steamer Freeborn, and Acting-Master Arnold Harris, of the U. S. steamer Island Belle.

As on board these steamers in several of our explorations, and from information gleaned from reliable sources, I became convinced that there were no batteries at Matthias Point sufficient to oppose the landing of troops. The commanders of the gunboats above named agreed with me in this opinion, and also as to the desirability of a thorough reconnoissance of this point. They very kindly placed their vessels at my disposal for such a purpose. Sunday evening was the time agreed upon for this service, but Lieut. Magaw was unfortunately prevented by orders from his superior officer from carrying out his intention in this particular; but Acting-Master William T. Street, of U. S. cutter Dana, volunteered the services of himself and vessel.

The Island Belle, with the Dana in tow, ran up Port Tobacco Creek to Chapel Point, and on the 11th I embarked about four hundred picked men of my regiment. The embarkation was conducted silently and in good order. Arrived at Matthias Point, I landed my force, under the admirable direction of Masters Harris and Street, and made a most thorough inspection of the point for several miles around.

Master Arnold Harris, of the Belle, was the first to land, and, accompanied by a squad of skirmishers, pushed forward and took possession of "Grimes' House." About a quarter of a mile from shore he came suddenly upon three of the enemy's pickets, one of whom raised his musket and was about to fire, when Master Harris shot him dead in his tracks with his revolver. The other two pickets ran. We secured the musket (flint lock) of the slain, and the horses of all. The main body of the command, under my own guidance, then made a thorough inspection of the point for some four miles inland; we met two more of the enemy's pickets (mounted) and endeavored to capture them, but they escaped; one of them, however, wounded by a musket ball. We discovered a few rifle pits and a battery partially masked, but with no guns mounted. We burned a number of rebel houses and barns. Beyond this point there were no batteries or troops to be seen, except a party of perhaps twenty cavalry, who retreated precipitately as we advanced. We were informed, however, that a rebel camp existed at Hamstead, at which was located, also, a battery of three pieces of rifled artillery. Capt. Street tendered the use of his twelve-pound howitzer and crew, but I preferred not to expose my command, by the risk of a too great advance over the enemy's country, to attack his camp nine miles distant, the force not being sufficient to keep the avenues of retreat open in case of an attack by overwhelming numbers. A large amount of forage and grain was burned, and several horses and some cattle belonging to the enemy were captured. It also fell to the lot of the Fifth to capture Mr. George Dent and son as prisoners, and bring them to this camp. We found them armed, and under circumstances which leave no doubt of their complicity with treason. I shall transmit them to you, with the papers found in their possession, as soon as possible. Several attempts were made to burn the heavy growth of timber on the point; but, owing to their non-inflammable nature at this season, with but qualified success; by this means, however, the only earthwork on the point was unmasked.

After having completed my reconnoissance, the force was withdrawn in good order to the beach, and reëmbarked on the gunboats, and reached camp about one P. M., without injury of any kind. A large number of negroes followed, some on board of the gunboats, but a majority in a large launch, which, by some means, they had obtained.

I cannot close this report without again referring to the valuable services rendered by Master Harris, of the Island Belle, and Master Street, of the Dana. Both gentlemen exerted themselves to the utmost to render the expedition a complete success, and all that their vessels afforded was cheerfully placed at my disposal. The bravery of Master Harris in boldly advancing as he did upon the rebel pickets cannot be too highly spoken of. Master Street personally supervised the embarkation and landing, and the orderly manner in which it was accomplished is chiefly due to him.

Of the officers and men of my regiment concerned in the expedition, I cannot speak in too high terms. Not the slightest trepidation was evinced by any, and all vied with each other in striving for the posts of danger. Had we met the enemy, as we had hoped to, in force, the coolness and bravery of the little force with me, I doubt not, would have been still more manifested. I need not particularize the officers, as all did so well; it is proper to state, however, that to Capt. Arthur Wilkinson, of Company I, much of the credit of arranging and carrying out the general plan of the expedition is due. Quartermaster O'Kell, Lieut. C. W. Squier, and Master's Mate John McMillan (of the Island Belle) accompanied me as aids.

This successful reconnoissance, by so small a force, and upon so important a point, cannot fail to inspire the enemy with fear for the large portion of the unprotected coast along the Potomac, and will, no doubt, cause them to scatter their forces along the exposed points, and thus prevent them concentrating a large force at any one position. The following is a list of the officers employed in the expedition:

Colonel, Charles K. Graham; Assistant-Surgeon, J. Theodore Calhoun; Quartermaster, Wm. O'Kell, Acting Aid; Lieut. C. W. Squier, Company F, Acting Aid; Capt. George Quartermaster, Company C, Acting Major; Capt. A. Wilkinson, Company I; Capt. George A. Morey, Company E; Capt. Henry M. Allen, Company B; Capt. William F. Mew, Company F; Lieut. James H. Stewart, Company A; Lieut. Purchase, Company C; Lieut. Lounsberry, Company D; Lieut. R. D. Andrews, Company F; Lieut. Conway, Company G; Lieut. Harrison, Company H; Lieut. Bonnan, Company B; Lieut. Francis Tyler, Company A; Lieut. Loicq, Company B; Lieut. F. Corse, Company C; Lieut. Willard Bullard, Company I.

I have the honor to remain your obedient servant,
 CHARLES K. GRAHAM,
 Col. Com'dg Fifth Regiment Excelsior Brigade U. S. V.
 To Brig.-Gen. D. E. SICKLES, Head-quarters
 Excelsior Brigade, Asbury, near Mattowoman Creek, Md.

A correspondent of the New York Times gives the following circumstantial account of this reconnoissance:

CHARLES COUNTY, Md., Tuesday, Nov. 12, 1861.

There is no place on the whole Potomac about which so much has been said, and so little known, as Matthias Point. It was off this point that the lamented and gallant Ward met his untimely death, and within more recent dates rumor has variously ascribed to it batteries of enormous or of Lilliputian size. Gunboats shelled it mercilessly, and it was presumed, and generally believed, that there was upon it a battery of eighteen heavy guns. But nothing was positively known about it. The Fifth Excelsior regiment, under the command of Col. Graham, was sent down to watch it, and encamped in full view of the point, on Port Tobacco Creek, about a mile below the village of Port Tobacco.

Here they lay encamped several weeks, apparently inactive, but really keeping an open eye on the Maryland rebels and their Virginia neighbors. Two small boats were captured. One of them was placed under command of Capt. Arthur Wilkinson, well known to the merchant marine, but now the captain of Company I, of the Fifth regiment. With this little boat Capt. Wilkinson thoroughly explored the shores of both sides of the river, frequently availing himself of the kind offices of Capt. Harris, of the Island Belle, Magaw, of the Freeborn, and Street, of the Dana. These officers convinced themselves that the rebels were not in any very great strength immediately on the point, and that a force could be successfully landed on the point, and an attack, if thought advisable, made on the rebel camp a few miles inland.

In conjunction with the officers of the flotilla just mentioned, Col. Graham determined to make the attempt. He was aware of the hazardous nature of the service, but deemed that important information could be obtained with but little loss, if successful. The plan, as arranged, was for the colonel to embark his force on the Island Belle, Freeborn, and Dana, and to land them with the howitzers of the Freeborn and Dana, and their respective crews, under cover of the cannon of the gunboats; but the Freeborn was ordered off to another station by Commodore Harral, and it was determined to make the attempt with the other two vessels at midnight, the Freeborn promising to come down the next morning and assist, if her services should be needed.

The greatest secrecy was observed. Beyond the commander of the flotilla and assistant-surgeon of the regiment, none were aware of the expedition, with the exception of the officers above named. At about nine o'clock in the evening, four hundred men were detailed from the various companies of the regiment, and provided with forty rounds of ball cartridge. They marched some four miles to Chapel Point, where the gunboats were lying. Here they embarked in good order and fine spirits. The moon was hidden by the clouds, and a fresh breeze was blowing. The Island Belle took the Dana in tow, and in a short time the expedition was lying off the point.

The gallant Capt. Harris, of the Belle, insisted on landing with the skirmishers or advance guard. These consisted of twenty-six men under Lieut. Loicq, of Company B. Col. Graham immediately followed in the second boat. Capt. Harris, with a few picked men from his own crew, and some picked men from Company I, pushed rapidly forward to what is known as "Grimes' House," a large house used as a station for the rebel pickets. After proceeding about a quarter of a mile, they came suddenly upon three rebel pickets, one of whom aimed his musket at Capt. Harris; but the captain was too quick for him, shooting him dead with his revolver, while his men fired, but unsuccessfully, at the other two, who were retreating on the full run. The picket's musket (an old flint lock) was brought away, as were also their three horses, found tied near by.

Grimes' House has long been known as a station for the rebel pickets, and standing fully exposed, it has frequently been fired at by the gunboats, which have attempted to set fire to it with shell, but in vain. The doors and windows were barricaded, so as to afford a good shelter for riflemen. No person was, however, found in it.

As soon as the shots were fired, Assistant-Surgeon Calhoun was put on shore ready to render any assistance to the wounded that might be needed, and the whole force was speedily landed under the able direction of Capt. Street, of the Dana, and master's mate, John McMillan, of the Island Belle; forming in line, and preceded by an efficient band of skirmishers, the party proceeded rapidly forward. After proceeding two or three miles, two mounted men rode up, and were taken for some of the skirmishers, who, it was supposed, had captured the horses, and were returning with them. One of the men inquired, "How many men were coming?" When the question was asked, "Who are you?" He replied, "Oh! we are all right—we are pickets." "Then you are just the men we want," said Capt. Harris, seizing the horse by the bridle. The fellows found that instead of being the Thirtieth Virginia, whom they expected, it was a party of these "cussed Yankees," and clapping spurs to their horses, scampered off to the woods, followed by a volley of balls. One of them was evidently wounded, as he dropped his gun, (a double-barrelled shot gun,) and blood could be traced some distance.

The party proceeded several miles, but finding that the rebels were encamped at Hampstead, nine miles from the Point, and that they had the evening before been reinforced by Walker's battery of three pieces of artillery, and that they were hourly expecting Col. Carey's Thirtieth Virginia, from Brooks' Station, it was deemed advisable to return. A portion of Company E had, however, in the mean time, surprised Mr. George Dent and his son, prominent Maryland rebels, for whom the authorities have long been searching. Mr. Dent was fully armed, and at first attempted to draw a revolver, but he saw resistance to be useless. He has long been connected with the Confederate signal service, and on his person were found the cards of several of the officers of the rebel navy, and a pass signed "Brig.-Gen. Holmes, C. S. A."

The party, on its return, burned a large amount of forage for the rebel cavalry, and several houses which had been used for signalling purposes. Grimes' House, and the adjacent barns, were also burned. A mile or so from the point, a small battery, with no guns mounted, was discovered. It was masked by trees and cord-wood piled up. These were burned, and the gunboats will destroy the earthworks at their leisure. The woods were set on fire in several places, but they were not very inflammable, and no very definite results were obtained. It was now about nine o'clock A. M., and the party had returned to the landing-place, where were still to be seen the rifle pits from which was fired the fatal shot that killed Capt. Ward. The look-out on the gunboat detected a large force of rebel infantry advancing, on a hill-top, several miles distant.

The command were immediately drawn up in line, and the guns of the Dana and Island Belle shotted and manned. But after waiting an hour, no enemy appeared, and the men were all safely re-embarked and again landed on Chapel Point, without the slightest injury to a single person of the force. They were followed by a large frigate's launch, filled with contrabands. These poor darkies were discovered approaching the gunboats shortly before the embarkation to return. Over a hundred must have been huddled into it, while from a pole in the stern waved a shirt, which may in its better days have been white. Their boat was of some value, and was retained.

About daylight the Freeborn hove in sight, and was coming to fulfil the duties assigned to her, when, much to the chagrin of the gallant lieutenant commanding, (Magaw,) she was opened upon by a heavy rebel battery, a short distance up the river, and forced to return. Since that time it has been discovered that the battery is located at Boyd's Hole, not over two miles from the point reached by the reconnoitring party. The battery mounts six heavy rifled guns, and the soldiers seen from the gunboat were three regiments advancing to its support. Had its location been known, it could and would have been taken at the point of the bayonet, and its guns, as well as those of the three gunboats, turned upon the party advancing to its relief.

This is the first time that any of the Excelsior regiments have been on Virginia soil, as this brigade has been assigned to the important but onerous work of guarding and protecting the Lower Potomac. But the behavior of the detachment of the Fifth, on this occasion, was excellent. Landing at night, at a point clothed with mystery, and in the presence of an unknown force, not a man hesitated, and officers and men vied with each other in seeking the post of danger.

The many friends of Chaplain Boole will regret to learn that, while riding a day or two since, his horse stumbled and fell, and the chaplain sustained a fracture and dislocation of the wrist. Private Ricemeyer, of Company A, died of typhoid fever on Tuesday morning. This is the second death from disease in this regiment since its formation, early in June last—a remarkable state of health for a regiment constantly in active service.

I enclose the official report of this most successful reconnaissance. NEMO.

A SECESSION ACCOUNT.

FREDERICKSBURG, VA., }
November 12, 1861. }

The enemy made a landing at Matthias Point about two hours before daylight on Monday morning, in numbers reported at from sixty to two hundred.

They immediately moved outward into the country, but so quiet had been the landing that our pickets in the vicinity were unapprised of the fact. One of the pickets, named Baker, belonging to Captain John Taylor's Cavalry, challenged some one approaching, when he was answered that "a friend" approached, and immediately thereafter received a ball from a pistol, which struck him in the breast and glanced around on the shoulder. The ball was afterward extracted with but slight injury to his person.

The enemy next fired and burned to the ground the residence of Custis Grymes, which had been so perforated with shot and shell during the last few months by the enemy's vessels in the river as to be nearly, if not quite, untenable, and has been unoccupied, we believe, for some time.

They next visited the residence of Mercer Tennant, which they are reported to have fired and burned, together with his barn, wheat stacks, etc. Another report is that the house was not burned. They then advanced to the residence of Mrs. Stuart, (widow of the late Colonel John Stuart,) and arrested Mr. Dent and his son, of St. Mary's County, Md., and also an elderly gentleman named Nalley. Two of the Misses Snowden, of Alexandria, were at this house, and one report is, that all the ladies escaped to the woods in their night clothes; another report is that the ladies remained in the house and were not molested. The Federals also visited the house of Benjamin Grimes, which they were reported to have destroyed, together with other property. This is confirmed. After these outrages the Federals commenced their piratical feats in stealing off the negroes in the vicinity, and from a dozen servants who arrived here last night we learn that, in many instances, slaves were forced off by the soldiery against their protestations to be allowed to remain where they were. A gentleman, who left the vicinity yesterday forenoon, reports that Colonel Carey's Thirtieth Virginia regiment were within eight miles of Matthias Point, en route, when he passed them, and that Colonel Stokes' North Carolina regiment were pressing on to the same point. Captain Cook's artillery are also reported to have been ordered to the same point. We have no idea of a fight, as that is not the object of the pirates who divide their time on water and land, and whose purpose is not to meet our forces in manly warfare, but to skulk around from neighborhood to neighborhood, where they can practically illustrate the principles of the Lincoln dynasty. We have just seen Colonel Arnold, of King George, who was in the vicinity of Matthias Point yesterday. He states that the enemy had all re-embarked, and that their vessels were lying off in the Potomac. Colonel Carey's regiment had returned from the point as far as Fairview Gate, awaiting orders. About forty negroes escaped on Saturday night and were carried off by the enemy on Monday morning.

Among those losing are the following: ten servants belonging to the estate of the late R. H. Montgomery; eight to Henry Gouldman; four to W. D. Watson; five to Fielding Lewis; one to Dr. Hunter; a number belonging to H. M. Tennant; some belonging to Mrs. M. C. Stuart; one belonging to Mr. Coleman, of Spotsylvania, hired, we suppose, in King George.

The county of King George has lost, since the war, at least one hundred negroes, whose aggregate value is not less than one hundred thousand dollars.

ENGAGEMENT AT NORFOLK, MO.,

SEPTEMBER 10, 1861.

LIEUTENANT PHELPS' REPORT.

UNITED STATES GENBOAT CONESTOGA, }
CAIRO, ILLINOIS, September 10, 1861. }

SIR: I have to inform you that this morning I got under way with this vessel, in company with the Lexington, at the request of Colonel Wagner, and proceeded down the river to cover an advance of troops from Norfolk in that direction. After passing considerably below the forces on shore, the Lexington turned back to be more near them. I proceeded further down to examine the head of Island No. 2 for a reported battery, but failed to find it. I, however, discovered the enemy in force on the Missouri side, at Lucas' Bend, and at once proceeded down and opened fire upon their artillery and cavalry. The enemy had about sixteen pieces of field-artillery and, it is believed, one heavy piece in battery. Several of their pieces were rifled cannon, and ranged to and beyond this vessel, striking all about her. In a short time Commander Stembel, hearing our guns, came down with the Lexington, and joined in the fight. The rebels moved their batteries from point to point, while we availed ourselves of our motive power to move up stream as the enemy would attempt to move up back from the banks, and bring their several batteries out at different places to fire a few rounds and gallop to some other point.

Their force of cavalry was considerable, and I fired several shells among them with great apparent effect.

The shell and shot of both our vessels were lodged among their batteries. Both the Lexington and this vessel retired out of range for a short time, about one o'clock, hoping to lead the enemy up higher, where our land forces were. Two steamers of the enemy had come up from Columbus—one, the gunboat Yankee, which also opened fire upon us; but I found our guns could not reach them where they were below the batteries. At about two o'clock I again dropped down with this vessel, determined to try a shot again at the rebel gunboat. The first shot fired must have struck her on the ricochet, as it touched the water close alongside, and she at once started down stream. The Lexington again came up, and it is believed succeeded in landing an eight-inch shell in the Yankee's wheel-house and side, where it burst. At all events, the vessel appeared to be greatly injured, and went off with but one engine working. She retired under the batteries at Columbus, where the other one had previously gone. Our boats again opened fire upon the enemy's batteries, and before five o'clock we had silenced them entirely, driven their force out of reach, and without injury to ourselves. I am satisfied we did great damage to the enemy.

While retiring, this boat was fired upon with musketry by an enemy concealed in a thicket and small out-house, and one man (Nelson Castle, quartermaster) was shot through the arm and in the forehead. I think he will recover, but an operation will be required upon the skull.

I at once opened with canister upon the thicket, and quickly cleared it of the rebels. Some of them were shot by our small-arms men.

I cannot speak too highly of the spirit and will of the crew, scarcely one of whom had been under fire before.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,
S. L. PHELPS,
Lieutenant United States Navy.
Captain A. H. FOOTE, U. S. N.,
Commanding Naval Forces Western Rivers.

REPORT OF COMMANDER STEMBEL.

UNITED STATES GUNBOAT LEXINGTON, }
MOUND CITY, ILLINOIS, September 13, 1861. }

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report, viz.: On Sunday night, the 8th instant, at half-past eleven, I received an order from General Grant, through his aide-de-camp, Captain Hillyer, to proceed the next morning at daylight down the Mississippi River with this vessel to the town of Norfolk, Missouri, eight miles below Cairo, to afford protection to Col. Wagner, chief of artillery, who would move in that direction at the same time with a column against the enemy, who were said to be in force at that place.

I did so, and remained in the vicinity of the colonel's camp that day and night, (having in the mean time been joined by the United States gunboat Conestoga,) without discovering the enemy, although intelligence of their moving in his direction, was received by the colonel, and by him communicated to me.

On the morning of the 9th, Colonel Wagner informed me by note that he would advance three miles with his command, and requested me to follow with the gunboats, which I did, dropping down some distance below the troops, where I had a good view down the river, but saw nothing worthy of notice. I then returned, and the Conestoga continued dropping down until she arrived at "Lucas' Bend," the point in the river above Columbus, where (Columbus) I had, the Sunday previous, when on a reconnoitring expedition with Colonel Wagner, discovered two formidable batteries planted on the bluffs above the town, when she fired her stern gun at a large body of rebel cavalry, drawn up on the banks, as I was subsequently informed by Lieutenant Commanding S. L. Phelps.

I immediately ran down to the Conestoga, and, on my arrival in her vicinity, the batteries in the bend opened upon us; we engaged them, and soon silenced them—one of which, composed of flying rifled artillery, however, merely changed position higher up the river, and opened again. This it did several times, and each time we silenced it, until it finally retreated down the river, and I think embarked on board a steamer which came from the direction of Columbus at the commencement of the engagement, under convoy of what is supposed to be the rebel gunboat Yankee; both boats, flying the rebel colors, kept well in under the batteries on the bluff above the latter place.

The Lexington and Conestoga then ran down the bend, throwing a shell occasionally at the points from which they had been fired upon previously without eliciting a reply, until they reached a point which I estimated to be about two and a half miles distant from the Yankee. I then directed one of the eight-inch guns of the Lexington, charged with a fifteen-second fuzed shell, to be trained upon her, giving the gun its greatest possible elevation by removing the quoin, &c., and fired. I had the satisfaction of seeing the shell explode in her starboard wheel-house, careening her smoke-stack, and otherwise crippling her, when both rebel steamers retreated toward Columbus, the batteries on the bluff alone preventing their capture.

The gunboats then returned up the river, and were several times fired upon from the Missouri and once from the Kentucky shore with musketry, shells, and canister. There certainly must have been a large force opposed to us, and from the accurate firing of the gunboats the enemy's loss was undoubtedly very heavy. The only casualty on our part was one man seriously wounded on board the Conestoga by a musket ball from the Missouri shore.

I cannot here close this report without expressing to you my high appreciation of the manner in which the officers and men of both the gunboats deported themselves on this occasion; their conduct was cool and collected, and more like that of veterans than green hands, as most of them are. Lieutenant Commanding Phelps deserves particular notice for his masterly management of the Conestoga, and his effective fire, principally from his stern gun, which confirmed my previously entertained opinion, that the three gunboats now in service on these waters should each, to make them doubly useful, have a stern gun. I have, therefore, in your absence, taken the responsibility of transporting one of the thirty-two-pounders, composing a part of the battery of this vessel, from forward aft, thereby, I think, increasing her efficiency, which, I hope, will meet your approbation.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

R. N. STEMBEL,

Commanding U. S. Gunboat Lexington.

THE LAW OF TREASON.

CHARGE OF JUDGE HALIBURTON TO THE GRAND JURY OF THE CONFEDERATE DISTRICT COURT, AT RICHMOND, ON THE 12TH NOV., 1861.

GENTLEMEN OF THE GRAND JURY: The thirteenth clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Provisional Constitution of the Confederate States, in pursuance of which you are now assembled, declared, in the exact words of the Constitution of the United States, that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on the presentment of the Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in service in time of war or public danger." The only authority possessed by the courts of the Confederate States to take cognizance of any offence is bestowed by the Constitution of the Confederate States, and acts of Congress made in pursuance of powers therein granted. You have, therefore, no such general authority to inquire into offences against the laws of the State, or against good morals or good order, as is possessed by Grand Juries in the State Courts. You have, in general, to deal only with those crimes and misdemeanors which are declared to be such by the Constitution or laws of the Confederate States, or by the statutes or laws of a State of the United States, which were adopted by the Congress of the Confederate States. The thirty-seventh section of the act passed by the Congress of the Confederate States, and approved on the 16th of March, 1861, provides that "the laws of the United States in regard to certain crimes and offences" shall "be in force until otherwise provided by law of Congress." Thus, the criminal laws of the United States, having been expressly adopted by Congress, became laws of the Confederate States—that is to say, those laws of the United States which were passed before the act aforesaid. Under these laws of the United States and the criminal laws of the Confederate States, you may inquire into and present a great number of different offences, a few of which I will mention—murder, manslaughter on the high seas, or in the bays or rivers where the tide ebbs and flows, committed on board of ships or other vessels belonging to the Confederacy; mutiny or revolt committed on board of such vessels; cruelty to seamen; stealing or taking letters from the mails or post-office; and counterfeiting and forgery of various kinds, fall under your cognizance. To forge the treasury notes of the Confederate States has been deemed by Congress a crime so high in its character and so extremely mischievous in its consequences, that it was thought necessary to make it punishable with death. Even to pass, utter, or publish as true, any forged Treasury note, knowing it to be forged, is punishable in the same way. Treason is another offence to which I will call your attention. By the third section of the third article of the Constitution of the Confederate States—which is copied, with the substitution of the word "Confederate" for the word "United," from the Constitution of the United States—"Treason against the Confederate States shall consist only in levying war against them or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort," and "no person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court." To adhere to the enemies of the Confederate States, giving them aid and comfort in any way in carrying on war against us, is therefore, as you see, as much treason as to be actually engaged in the war. The Constitution declares that "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press," and mere words, whether written or spoken, can never amount to treason, unless they are intended to give, or do give in some way, aid to the enemy in carrying on the war. To give to the enemy information as to the number of our troops, or the position or movements of our army, or any other information which would be of service to him in the conduct of the war, would be treason. To trade with the enemy, too, may be treasonable. Such traffic, if not always treason, is generally a high misdemeanor, at least it subjects the party engaged in it to a forfeiture of the vessel and cargo, or other property that may be employed in it, unless it is carried on with the consent of the Government. This seems to be a principle of universal law, and not peculiar to the jurisprudence of any one country. So inflexible is the rule that in a case where a citizen of the United States has purchased a quantity of British goods within the British territory a long time previous to the declaration of hostilities, and had deposited them in an island near the frontier, a vessel hired by him to bring away the goods was captured, with the cargo, and condemned as a prize of war by the United States Courts. To send to the enemy munitions of war or provisions, or supplies of any kind, which would enable him to carry on the war more effectually, would be an act of treason. "All contracts with the enemy," says Phillimon, are null and void; even the insurance of an enemy's property is illegal, upon the ground of its being a species of intercourse with the enemy; for the same reason bills of exchange made by the subject of one belligerent upon the subject of the other belligerent are illegal and void. The remission of funds in money or bills to subjects of the enemy, the purchase of bills or the deposit of funds in the enemy's country, are unlawful, because they tend to improve the resources and strengthen the hands of the enemy. In fine, every communication with the State, however circuitous, is prohibited, unless it be sanctioned by the special authority of the Government.

As to the persons who may be guilty of treason, they are not merely the native inhabitants, nor even the citizens of a country. Strangers and foreigners who have their domicile there may incur the guilt of treason against the country in which they dwell, by committing such acts as would be treason in a citizen or subject of this country. "An alien," says Foster, "whose sovereignty is in amity with the Crown of England, residing here, and receiving the protection of the law, oweth a large allegiance to the Crown during the time of his residence; and if during the time he committeth an offence which in the case of a natural born subject would amount to treason, he may be dealt with as a traitor. For his person and personal estate are as much under the protection of the law as the natural born subject's; and if he is injured in either he hath the same remedy by law for such injury." "Any one," continues the same author, "whose sovereign is at enmity with us, living here under the King's protection, and committing offences amounting to treason, may likewise be dealt with as a traitor; for he oweth a temporary local allegiance, founded on that share of protection he receiveth." These observations of Foster are sound law, and supported by sound reasoning. A foreigner who resides here, and who seeks to receive the benefit and protection of our Government and laws, ought to be punished as a traitor, if he betrays the Government which confides and protects him. An act was passed by the Congress of the Confederate States, in August last, and approved by the President on the 30th of that month, which I am required to give you specially in charge. It is entitled—(here the Judge read the preamble and first four sections of the sequestration act, in the third volume of Acts of Congress, page 57.) The sections of the act which I have thought it proper to read to you require very little comment. It is only proper to say a word or two to you in reference to alien enemies. The very learned and highly distinguished gentleman who is at the head of the Department of Justice here, the Attorney-General of the Confederate States, has given a very accurate definition of the phrase alien enemies, as used in the act, in these words: The following persons are subject to the operation of the law as alien enemies:

1. All citizens of the United States except citizens of Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky or Missouri, or the District of Columbia, or the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, or the Indian Territory south of Kansas.

2. All persons who have a domicile within the States with which this Government is at war, no matter whether they be citizens or not. Thus, the subjects of Great Britain, France, or other neutral nations, who have a domicile or are carrying on business or traffic within the States at war with the Confederacy, are alien enemies under the law.

3. All such citizens or residents of the States of Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky or Missouri, and the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and the Indian Territory south of Kansas, and of the District of Columbia, as shall commit actual hostilities against the Confederate States, or aid or abet the United States in the existing war against the Confederate States. Having explained to you the meaning of the term alien enemies, I do not deem it necessary to add anything more in relation to the act. As to the testimony upon which a presentment may be made or an indictment formed, you should be satisfied by it, so far as it goes, that the charges contained in the indictment are true—that is to say, the evidence should be sufficient to create a belief that the statements in presentment of indictment are true, upon the supposition that there is no further evidence behind to contradict or rebut it. You should decide the case upon the evidence before you, as if that were all the testimony on either side; and when we remember that evidence is sent to you on the part of the prosecution alone, it is not going too far to say that the evidence ought to be such as would, if standing alone, be sufficient to warrant a belief that the party accused is guilty. The third section of the constitution provides, as you have already heard, that "no person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act; or on confession in open court." But although two witnesses are necessary in such a case to justify a conviction, only one is necessary to the finding of an indictment. In all cases of treason, however, as in every other case, the evidence before you must be legal evidence, and such as would be allowed to go to a petty or traverse jury. A grand jury can no more listen to hearsay, or other illegal or unimportant testimony, than a petty jury can. If you should desire further information, gentlemen, on any point of law, the Court will give it to you with pleasure. I thank you for attending punctually. You will now retire, if you please, to consider of such matters as may be brought before you.

RECONNOISSANCE TO OCCOQUAN RIVER,
NOVEMBER 12, 1861.

THE following is a complete account of the reconnoissance to the Occoquan River, Va.:

The rebels having made a demonstration against our pickets on the 11th Nov., General Heintzelman sent out two small parties of cavalry to reconnoitre. They returned with a report that the rebels, with four hundred cavalry and two regiments of infantry, were encamped near Pohick Church. General Heintzelman, believing he could disperse them, telegraphed to the Commanding General, and was authorized to prepare an expedition. On the 12th inst., at three A. M., Gen. Richardson's brigade, with Company G of the Lincoln Cavalry, and Capt. Thompson's and Capt. Randolph's batteries of artillery, advanced upon Pohick Church by the telegraph road, followed, an hour later, by Gen. Jameson's brigade, and Company G. Lincoln Cavalry.

Their instructions were for Gen. Richardson to divide his brigade at Potter's house, just beyond Piney Run, he to follow the telegraph road, and the other two regiments, with a battery and a company of cavalry, to cross to Accotink and reach Pohick Church by the Accotink and Pohick continuation of the Alexandria turnpike, so to time his march as to have both his columns reach the church at the same time. Gen. Johnson's brigade followed an hour later on the telegraph road as a reserve. Gen.

Heintzelman himself left head-quarters at daylight, and overtook the advance where they were halted, a short distance on the north side of the church.

It was soon ascertained that the rebel cavalry had left, having encamped at the church the night before. Our men advanced and occupied the ground, and sent out parties on the different roads. The regiments under Col. Hayman took the road to Colchester. There are no signs of the enemy having been recently in that vicinity, nor were there any indications of their occupying the opposite bank of the Occoquan at that point.

Col. Terry, who commanded the troops which followed the telegraph road to Mrs. Violet's, learned that the enemy's pickets had left there two hours before. On the opposite side of the Occoquan there was seen a small force of cavalry and infantry, evidently apprised of the advance. The cavalry pickets on the road toward Elsey's had also retreated very recently.

Having ascertained these facts, the troops returned to their camps. Gen. Heintzelman expresses great gratification at the spirit, zeal, and activity displayed by the troops. We were five hours at Pohick Church; the main body marched twenty-two miles, and the regiments, which were pushed forward to the Occoquan, about thirty; all were back to their camps by nine P. M. Colonel Berry's regiment of General Sedgewick's brigade, with Captain Todd's company of Lincoln Cavalry, marched at four A. M. on the old Fairfax road with orders to halt at the Accotink, and push forward a reconnoissance as far as the Pohick. Col. Berry seems to have mistaken Fairfax Station for either Springfield or Burke's Station; the latter is the more probable. He says he took the road toward Pohick Church; he should have followed the old Fairfax road as far as the Pohick. By taking the road toward Pohick Church, his scouts came in sight of our troops in advance of the church, and mistook them for the enemy drilling. Our skirmishers saw them, and reported the rebel cavalry and infantry on that road. Gen. Heintzelman advanced a force to meet them, but after sending forward no one could be discovered, and the troops were withdrawn. Of the Lincoln Cavalry Sergeant O'Brien is killed; Bugler Benton mortally wounded, since dead; Private Miller wounded, missing; Private Mitchell wounded slightly; Capt. Todd, missing; Private Johnson, missing; and seven horses missing. This loss was sustained by the negligence of the officers of this cavalry in permitting their men to straggle in the presence of the enemy, and to plunder. The rebels evidently occupy several points on the railroad in force, have a cavalry force at or near Elsey's and Sangster's crossroads, and a force at Wolf Run Shoals. Gen. Heintzelman was accompanied and assisted by Capt. Moses and Lieut. Hunt, of his staff, and Lieut.-Col. Schickfus and Capt. Oth, of the Lincoln Cavalry.

ATTACK ON THE UNITED STATES FLEET

AT THE PASSES OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

COMMANDER HANDY'S REPORT.*

UNITED STATES SHIP VINCENNES, OFF SOUTHWEST
PASS, MISSISSIPPI RIVER, Oct. 14, 1861. }

SIR: I have to report my safe arrival at this place, having left the head of the Passes on the 2th instant, in company with the Richmond and Preble. On my route down it was my misfortune (as anticipated) to ground some distance from the bar, going head on. The three vessels were pursued by rebel armed steamers, who, after a while, commenced a brisk firing, the Vincennes not being able from her situation to bring her broadside guns to bear on the enemy, I took down all the cabin bulk-heads and caused two of the 8-inch shell guns to be run out of the stern ports; continued a rapid firing with them until the signal, No. 1, (as understood aboard this ship,) was displayed from the Richmond; I continued my firing, however, until some time afterward. I then directed the officers and crew to repair to the Richmond and Water Witch. Previously to leaving this ship I caused a slow match to be placed in the magazine, which, fortunately, did not cause an explosion. I then reported myself to Captain Pope, ascertaining from him that there was a misunderstanding about the signal. I repaired, with the officers and crew, then on board the Richmond, to the "Vincennes," obtaining his permission to throw aboard the fourteen 32-pounders, round shot, and any article that might have a tendency to lighten the ship, as I was more than anxious to save her from the grasp of the rebels, feeling that the vessel was of more value to the Government than the guns. Although the ship was lightened by the operation, still it was not sufficient to float her; but the day following I was relieved from my embarrassing situation by the South Carolina and McClellan. Trust, sir, that my conduct will meet with your entire approbation, governed as I was from a strict sense of duty. I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT HANDY, Commander.

CAPTAIN POPE'S REPORT.

UNITED STATES STEAMER RICHMOND, OFF PASS
L'OUTRE, MISSISSIPPI RIVER, October 17, 1861. }

SIR: My report to you in regard to our leaving the head of the Passes having been made in great hurry, in order to acquaint you as soon as possible of the leading facts of the case, many incidents were omitted which I will now report.

After the first blow given to this ship by the Richmond on the morning of the 12th instant, it retreated under our port quarter, apparently endeavoring to fix herself in a position to give us a second blow, but the slipping of our chain and the ship ranging ahead under steam frustrated the object. The ram dropped astern, but soon gathered headway and ranged our port beam, receiving the fire of the port battery, some guns of which were discharged twice. It then ranged ahead, passing up the river, receiving the fire of the port battery of the Preble, disappearing in the darkness. Owing to the darkness, I was unable to see the effect of our shot upon her, but some officers are of opinion they heard shot strike the ram. I passed the Preble and stood up the river, when Acting-Master Wilcox reporting we were getting too close to the starboard shore, the helm was put up, and the ship rapidly fell off, presenting her broadside up and down the river. As soon as she had drifted near the head of the Passes, ineffectual attempts were made to get her head up stream, when I found myself a mile and a half down the Southwest Pass. I then put the helm up, continued down the river, hoping to be able to get her head round off Pilot Town. In doing this she drifted some distance below, grounding broadside too. Soon after this, the enemy opened their fire upon us, which was kept up for about two hours. The day before leaving the head of the Passes I had succeeded in placing one of our 9-inch broadside guns on the top-gallant fore-castle, giving a long range, and it was continually fired during the engagement. About nine o'clock A. M., during the firing, it was reported to me that several boats filled with men were leaving the Vincennes; some went on board the Water Witch, others came to this ship. In a few minutes, Commander Handy, with several of his officers, came on board; Commander Handy having wrapped around his waist, in broad folds, an American flag, and, upon being asked, stated he had abandoned his ship in obedience to signal. Being told no such signal had been made, he insisted "he so read it," that Captain Winslow had so read it.

The following day Lieutenant Commanding Winslow being asked, remarked "he saw no such signal;" that when he was asked by one of Captain Handy's officers if that was the meaning of the signal, sent word to Captain Handy "that it was impossible" to get guns out of his stern ports and fight his ship. As soon as it was thought, from the description of the slow match, that it had gone out, Captain Handy, his officers and crew, returned to their ship. In the evening I received a note from Captain Handy, a copy of which, and my reply, is enclosed.

After I had taken the guns and ammunition from the McClellan she was sent to the assistance of the Vincennes, and endeavored to get her afloat; in the mean time I carried out a stream anchor from this ship astern, and, after unsuccessful attempts, for two or three hours, the McClellan returned to this ship, and was lashed alongside to wait until a rise of the tide. At early daylight of the 13th instant, the South Carolina, Commander Alden, came in, and I directed him to proceed, and, if possible, get the Vincennes afloat. Soon after, this ship was got afloat, her head down stream, and the McClellan was instantly cast off and went to assist in getting the Vincennes afloat. As there was not room for his ship to lay at anchor, or to turn to point her head up the stream, I had no other alternative than to cross the bar and anchor outside. My mind was very much relieved, knowing that the armament of four rifled guns on board the McClellan, together with the long gun of the South Carolina, would keep the enemy at bay. At about 2 p. m., the Vincennes was got afloat, crossed the bar, and anchored near this ship, and the South Carolina was immediately despatched to Pass à l'Outre, to guard that place until I could send him a relief.

My retreat down the pass, although painful to me, was to save the ships, by preventing them being sunk, and falling into the hands of the enemy; and it was evident to me they had us in their power, by the operation of the ram and fire-rafts. If I have erred in all this matter it is an error of judgment; the whole affair came upon me so suddenly that no time was left for reflection, but called for immediate action and decision. The ram having made its appearance next day at the mouth of the river, the impression is she sustained no injury from our shot, only waiting an opportunity to destroy our ships.

It having been rumored there was a panic on board this ship, at the time she was engaged with the enemy, I state it to be false; both officers and men exhibited the utmost coolness and determination to do their duty. My orders, and those of all the officers, were carried out with as much coolness as if it had been an everyday affair, and their whole conduct merits high commendation; and they would feel gratified to prove their bravery by being permitted to take part in the contemplated attack on Pensacola, as requested in notes from me to you on this subject. In both engagements with the enemy, the whole fire appeared to be directed to the destruction of this ship, most of the shot being, apparently, directed to the quarter of this vessel, presumed for the purpose of disabling our rudder and propeller.

I omitted, in my hasty report, to mention the essential aid I have received from Captain Gray, commanding the army transport McClellan, in getting this ship and the Vincennes afloat. From Lieutenant Commanding Winslow, commanding the Water Witch, I received every possible assistance that could be rendered.

I directed Commander French, of the Preble, as soon as it could be done, to Pass à l'Outre to guard that entrance. This he was unable to do at the time; the wind being ahead, and a strong current setting to leeward, he was barely able to hold his own. He came in and anchored and reported to me; he was quite out of wood and coal. I told him he could procure wood off the Northeast Pass, where he would be stationed after the arrival of one of the steamers at Pass à l'Outre. He replied, it was impossible to get wood there, and earnestly requested to go to Ship Island, where he would in two days procure wood sufficient for himself and the Vincennes. I reluctantly consented to his doing so, knowing that one of the steamers, either the South Carolina or Huntsville, would reach Pass à l'Outre in advance of him.

All of which is respectfully submitted. I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN POPE,
Captain.

Flag-officer WM. W. McKEAN,

P. S.—This and my first report to you embraces all the facts, to my best recollection; and if they are not satisfactory, I respectfully ask for a court of inquiry in the matter; and if it cannot be granted without detriment to the service at this time, that it may be referred to the honorable Secretary of the Navy.

JOHN POPE.

The following is a copy of a note received from Commander Handy on the eve of his ship getting aground, and my reply to the same:

SIR: We are aground. We have only two guns that will bear in the direction of the enemy. Shall I remain on board after the moon goes down with my crippled ship and worn-out men? Will you send me word what counter-sign my boats shall use if we pass near your ship? While we have moonlight, would it not be better to leave the ship? Shall I burn her when I leave her? Respectfully,

ROBERT HANDY.

UNITED STATES STEAMER RICHMOND, }
Southwest Pass, October 12, 1861. }

SIR: You say your ship is aground. It will be your duty to defend your ship up to the last moment, and not to fire her except it be to prevent her from falling into the hands of the enemy. I do not think the enemy will be down to-night, but in case they do, fight them to the last. You have boats enough to save all your men. I do not approve of your leaving your ship until every effort is made to defend her from falling into their hands. Respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN POPE,
Captain.

COMMANDER FRENCH'S REPORT.

UNITED STATES STEAMER PREBLE, OFF SOUTHWEST }
PASS, MISSISSIPPI RIVER, October 22, 1861. }

SIR: In obedience to your order, I have to make to you the following statement of the occurrences at the head of the Passes, on the morning of the 12th instant.

This ship was anchored about one hundred and fifty or two hundred yards distant from the Richmond, and about two points on her starboard bow, being the most advanced ship of the forces there at anchor. I had been on deck most of the time during the night; had left it but a short time previously, and was lying in my berth asleep, with all my clothes on, when a midshipman rushed into the cabin exclaiming "Captain, here is a steamer right alongside of us." I sprang instantly on deck; the order had already been given to "beat to quarters," and the men were then assembling at their guns. This was about 3.40 A. M. The moon had set or was obscured by clouds, and the night somewhat dark, with the wind from the northward. As I passed out of my cabin on my way to the deck, I saw through a port an indescribable object, not twenty yards distant from our quarter, moving with great velocity toward the bow of the Richmond. My orders from the senior officer were, in the event of discovering any danger at night, to hoist a red light at the gaff. This had been done by the officer of the deck instantly on the discovery of the object, which was first seen about fifteen or twenty feet directly ahead of this ship, and drifting with the current directly toward us. Not a speck of light, smoke, or any moving thing could be seen in or on it, and it looked somewhat like a huge whale in the water.

The instant the persons on board of it discovered our movements, it seemed to change its direction to avoid us, and made directly for the Richmond. In an instant huge clouds of the densest, blackest smoke rolled up from it, and we all expected to see her blow up, but afterwards concluded it must have been the ram, of which we had been told so much. It next made its appearance about a hundred yards distant, and directly abeam of this ship, where it lay quietly for a few minutes, apparently hesitating whether to come at us or not. I instantly opened my port battery, and gave her three broadsides in rapid succession, the Richmond also firing. She then slowly steamed up the river, and when on our port bow, threw up a rocket. This ship had been lying all the time with a range of only fifteen fathoms' cable, in readiness to slip in case of emergency. While firing at her, word was passed that the Richmond was going ahead of us, and to hold our fire. I was directing the firing of the battery, and hearing it, looked out of a port and saw that she was astern, barely lapping my quarter, and therefore continued my firing until the ram was out of line of pointing. I at once manned my deck tackle, (for my capstan has been crippled since the hurricane at Key West, and I am therefore compelled to use deck tackles,) and began to heave in my chain. Immediately on the rocket being thrown up from the ram, three bright lights were seen coming down the river, directly toward this ship, which we at first supposed to be steamers coming to attack us. They soon, however, increased so rapidly in size that we were fully convinced they were fire-ships, and such they proved to be. I was then working smartly with my deck tackles, and should have succeeded in weighing my anchor, when it was reported to me that the Richmond was steaming down the river. I could not and would not believe it possible, until I ran aft and saw her astern, and heading down. The fire-ships were then not more than one hundred and fifty yards distant, directly ahead, and coming down upon this ship. At the urgent suggestion of the first lieutenant and other officers, I then gave the order to make sail and slip the cable, having first taken off the slip buoy so that the enemy should not easily obtain it. The ship's head was immediately headed toward the Southwest Pass, orders to that effect, in the event of our being obliged to slip at any time, having been for some time previously given by the senior officer present.

The moment this ship was discovered by the fire-ships (which were in tow of two steam tugs, one on each wing) to be under way, their direction was changed toward the Richmond and Vincennes, which were on the opposite side of the river and below this ship. Continuing down the river, I came up with the Richmond, which was burning the Coston's signals; and, passing within a few yards of his stern, I hailed and said, "I can hear your orders, what are they?" The answer was, "Proceed down the Pass." We were so near, my reply was made without the use of a deck trumpet. I continued down the Pass, and soon passed by the Vincennes, which soon after signaled to the Richmond, "Shall I anchor?" which was answered by general signal, "Cross the bar." Not long after, the "Vincennes" was discovered to be aground, with her stern up the river. This ship shortly after took the bottom, and I feared would also stick; but after two or three smart rolls worked herself over and crossed the bar, when I anchored near the coal ships Kuhn and Nightingale, to protect them in case of necessity. I should have stated that the fire-ships were towed on shore by the enemy at the head of the Pass, and two or three steamers were seen coming rapidly down the river to attack the ships. The Richmond was at that time slowly moving down, the Water Witch assisting the Vincennes. The engagement had now commenced between the Richmond, Vincennes, and Water Witch on our side, and three of the enemy's steamers; one of them being a large bark-rigged vessel, said to be the Miramon, but now called the McRea. Two other steamers were also in company, but I could perceive no firing from them. At this time signal was made from the Richmond to ships outside the bar to get under way. I, of course, obeyed the signal, as did also the Kuhn; the Nightingale, being ashore, of course could not. It was not long before we discovered the Richmond to be aground. The firing continued about two hours or more, when the enemy's steamers retired up the river.

About noon received from the Water Witch six officers and seventy men from the Vincennes, which we then learned had been abandoned.

The only signals I saw made by the Richmond during the engagement were those made to this ship, and one other to the Water Witch, "Engage the enemy."

Respectfully, your obedient servant,
H. FRENCH,
Commanding U. S. Ship Preble.

LIEUTENANT WINSLOW'S REPORT.

UNITED STATES STEAMER WATER WITCH, }
OFF SOUTHWEST PASS, October 24, 1861. }

SIR: In compliance with your instructions, the following statement of the recent occurrences in the Mississippi River, on the morning of Saturday, October 12, 1861, is respectfully submitted:

The Water Witch, after towing a schooner laden with coal alongside the Richmond, had anchored the preceding afternoon on her starboard quarter, a little in shore, and the Richmond was employed during the night discharging the schooner, which was made fast on her port side.

The Preble was anchored a short distance ahead, and on the starboard bow of the Richmond, and the Vincennes lower down, on the opposite side of the river, and nearer the entrance of the Southwest Pass.

The moon having gone down, and the sky being partially overcast, the night was dark and every way favorable to the operations of the enemy. Between half-past three and four o'clock A. M. the alarm was given on board the Frolic, a small prize schooner anchored nearly ahead of us, the officers in charge hailing the Richmond, to apprise her of danger from a steamer descending the river. Almost immediately after, the crash of a collision with the Richmond was distinctly audible on board the Water Witch. The coal schooner was next observed drifting astern, and apparently in contact with her, a low dark steamer, almost obscured by a dense column of smoke. The peculiar puffing sound of a high-pressure engine was also heard. The steamer passed near the Water Witch, steering over toward the Vincennes, as we supposed, but soon turned and commenced ascending the river. The Richmond's battery was now opened on her, and soon after a broadside was discharged from the Preble. A signal rocket was then thrown from the steamer toward the Richmond, and shortly afterward three dim lights appeared up the river, in the vicinity of the eastern shore.

The Richmond, having now slipped her chain, turned her head slowly in the direction of the Vincennes, and, apprehending an immediate attack, the chain of the Water Witch was also slipped, and she was backed astern a short distance, to allow the prize schooner Frolic to coast and pass her.

The lights up the river, rapidly increasing and expanding, were soon ascertained to proceed from three fire rafts gradually drifting down toward us, and it was now deemed expedient to steam over toward the opposite shore. As we passed the Vincennes she was observed to be under way and heading down stream. A night signal (interpreted to "Act at discretion") was now made by the Richmond, and soon afterward the Preble also passed us, steering toward the Southwest Pass. Finding that the fire rafts were drifting with the wind steadily over toward the western shore, the Water Witch was now steered to the northward and eastward, (up stream,) and easily cleared them. They subsequently stranded on the western bank, together with the schooner from which the Richmond had been coaling—a leaky prize vessel, of little value, with no men on board.

Ignorant of the exact position of the squadron, the Water Witch, toward daybreak, dropped down to the entrance of the Southwest Pass, and with the earliest light (about half-past five A. M.) made out the Richmond, accompanied by the sailing vessels, some three or four miles down the pass, steering for the bar.

The river, at this time, in the vicinity of the "head of the Passes," was entirely clear of the enemy; but an officer, sent to the masthead, reported the smoke of four steamers beyond a bend in the river, five or six miles above us, besides a large bark-rigged propeller still higher up.

Deeming it important to communicate these facts to the senior officer, and apprehending a design on the part of the enemy to run the bark out to sea by the Pass à l'Outre, (which the light howitzer battery of the Water Witch would have proved inadequate to prevent,) she was now steered after the Richmond at full speed, stopping her wheels for a moment only to take in tow the prize schooner Frolic, which was dropping astern of the other vessels.

About this time general signal No. 435, "Cross the bar," was made by the Richmond. On ranging alongside that ship the urgent necessity of an immediate return to the "head of the Passes" was represented, but as her propeller was in motion, I am not sure the suggestion was understood. An order was received to "Get the sloop over the bar," and the importance of the Richmond's anchoring at once, (to cover their passage out,) was pressed in reply. The Water Witch then ranged ahead to execute her orders. Lieut. Davis (the executive officer) was put on board the Preble to pilot her out, but before I could reach the Vincennes she had unfortunately grounded on a flat to the left of the channel, and all efforts to tow her afloat proved fruitless. The Richmond, in attempting to turn her head up stream, also grounded near the Vincennes. The Preble was safely taken over the bar by Lieutenant Davis, who promptly returned to his station on board, while the Water Witch was still under fire of the enemy's steamers.

Finding the "head of the Passes" evacuated, the Confederate steamers followed us down the Southwest Pass, the Ivy leading and opening fire on the Richmond, at a long range, with a heavy rifled gun; shortly after the Vincennes grounded. The Richmond replied from a nine-inch shell-gun mounted on the "forecastle," and a rifled howitzer on the "poop," and occasionally from her broadside guns.

Signal to "engage the enemy" being also made to the Water Witch, our efforts to relieve the Vincennes were discontinued, and our rifled twelve-pounder howitzer (the only gun of adequate range on board) was brought to bear upon the Ivy.

The bark, (supposed to be the McRae,) having also got within range, commenced firing with a rifled or Parrott gun, throwing shot and shell beyond the Richmond, and almost down to the bar.

The Richmond succeeded once or twice in backing off into deeper water, but drifted down with the current, and finally grounded again about a quarter of a mile below the Vincennes, with her broadside up the river, obliging us to exercise some care in keeping clear of the range of her guns.

The Vincennes, with her stern up stream, from which but two guns could be brought to bear on the enemy, remained in a critical position, exposed to a raking fire. A signal, made by the Richmond, at this time, to the vessels below the bar, (to get under way,) was erroneously reported to Commander Handy as a signal to abandon ship, and an officer was sent to me from the Vincennes to ask if any such signal had been made, and that Captain Handy should continue to defend his vessel. Soon afterward, however, several boats came alongside of the Water Witch, with the marine guard and a portion of the officers and crew of the Vincennes. Subsequently, Captain Handy, with the remainder, repaired on board the Richmond, the formidable battery of which ship alone prevented the enemy from taking possession of the abandoned vessel, as the Confederate steamers at no time ventured to drop within effective range of her broadside guns.

Between nine and ten a. m., apparently contented with the result of the action, they ceased firing, and steamed up the river.

It is satisfactory to have it in my power to report the coolness and steadiness of those under my command on this occasion, as well while awaiting, in uncertainty and obscurity, the breaking of day at the "head of the Passes," as subsequently, when under the fire of the enemy.

After transferring to the Preble the officers and men of the Vincennes who had taken refuge on board our vessel, the Water Witch was next engaged in another unsuccessful attempt to get that ship afloat, Commander Handy, with the greater part of his crew, having returned on board. During the afternoon the steamer McClellan arrived from Fort Pickens with two Parrott guns, which were immediately placed on board the Richmond, and about four p. m. the Water Witch was despatched by Captain Pope to communicate with the steamers South Carolina and Huntsville, (in Barrataria and Berwick bays,) taking verbal orders to Commander Alden to proceed to Pass à l'Outre, and to Commander Price to join the Richmond at Southwest Pass.

Regretting my inability to communicate more briefly a faithful detail of the events of the day, I have the honor to remain, with much respect, your obedient servant,

FRANCIS WINSLOW,
Lieutenant Commanding.

Flag-officer WM. W. McKEAN,
Commanding Gulf Blockading Squadron.

CAPTURE OF THE "BEAUREGARD."

A CORRESPONDENT gives the following particulars of the capture of the privateer Beauregard:

The W. G. Anderson, Lieutenant Commanding W. C. Rogers, United States Navy, entered the port of Key West, Fla., from a cruise the morning of the 20th of November. She was accompanied by a prize schooner carrying on her deck an ugly-looking rifled gun. On boarding the Anderson, we learned that the prize was the rebel privateer Beauregard, of and from Charleston, S. C., and commanded by Capt. Gilbert Hay. She was captured on the morning of the 12th, one hundred miles east-northeast of Abaco. No resistance was made by the Beauregard, the superiority of the armament of the Anderson being so great that it would have been madness to measure their strength. While the Anderson was approaching her, the crew were engaged in throwing over shot, shell, muskets, &c., and before the capture, most of the ammunition was lost—only powder, a few pistols, one or two rifles, and the pivot gun on deck, remaining. The crew, twenty-seven in number, were at once placed in irons and transferred to the ship. Prize-Master Davis, with a picked crew, took charge of the schooner, and safely brought her to Key West.

Captain Rogers, on arrival, immediately consulted with the civil authorities as to the disposal of his prisoners, when it was decided that they should be placed in the hands of the United States Marshal. After an examination on board, the officers and crew were taken to the shore and placed in the county jail, where, properly guarded, they will remain until their trial. Captain Gilbert Hay, the master, was born in Scotland, was naturalized in Charleston, where he has lived twenty-eight years. He testified that the Beauregard sailed from Charleston on the 7th of November. She was commissioned by Jefferson Davis on the 14th of October to act as a private armed vessel in the service of the Confederate States on the high seas against the United States of America, their ships, vessels, goods and effects, and those of their citizens, during the prevailing war.

The Beauregard saw no vessel previous to her capture, and did not fire a gun after leaving port, not even for practice. Captain Hay says the vessel is owned by a stock company, and that her bills, when ready for sea, were fifteen thousand dollars. Mordecai Himes was the agent of the company.

Captain Hay served on board the Jeff. Davis as prize-master. He also taught the young midshipmen navigation. When the bark Alvarado was taken, he was placed in charge as prize-master. She was chased ashore by one of our fleet and burned.

John B. Davis, the first lieutenant, was on board the Confederate man-of-war Winslow when she seized a vessel off the North Carolina coast. While the Anderson was overhauling the Beauregard, this officer attempted to fire the twenty-four pounder, but was prevented by the crew.

Archibald Lilley, of Charleston, is the purser of the privateer. He could not have had access to the Treasury Department of the Confederacy very lately, for his fiscal balance showed the amount of cash on hand to be twenty-five cents. Paymaster Lilley is a very seedy-looking individual, and by no means a fair specimen of the chivalrous South Carolinian.

Joseph H. Stuart, second lieutenant, was born in Clifton, England. He is a seaman, and was on board the brig Mary Goodel when she was captured by the Jeff. Davis. He enlisted in the Davis as boatswain, and while on board, the brigantine Santa Clara and bark Alvarado were captured. He was also in the Davis when she was lost on St. Augustine bar. The names and nativity of the crew are as follows:

Oliver Ruse, carpenter, aged twenty-one, born in Charleston; Wm. Dangler, cook, aged twenty-six, born in Redbank, N. J.; Peter Parry, seaman, aged eighteen, born in South Carolina—was on the Jeff. Davis; James McGivern, seaman, aged twenty-two, born in Liverpool; John Burns, seaman, aged forty-five, born in Dublin; John Conway, seaman, aged thirty, born in Philadelphia; joined a French company of Zouaves in New Orleans; went to Warrington, deserted, arrived in Charleston destitute, and enlisted on the Beauregard from necessity; Daniel Culle, seaman, aged sixteen, born in Glasgow; Henry F. Randolph, seaman, aged twenty-five, born in New York—he is deaf; was seduced on board, and not allowed to leave the vessel; Wm. Boyd, seaman, aged twenty-six years, born in Ireland; Charles Butcher, seaman, aged twenty years, born in Prussia, was formerly on the steamer Isabel, running between Havana, Key West, and Charleston; he testifies that the Isabel is being transformed into a gunboat; she is nearly ready for her armament; Captain Rollins, the former captain, will command the Isabel; John Cameron, seaman, aged thirty-two years, a native of Scotland, was on the Jeff. Davis when she captured the barks Alvarado, Enchantress, and schooner Waring; received as his share of prize-money, five dollars; Thomas McBurney, seaman, aged twenty-seven years, born in Ireland; Alanson T. Swan, seaman, aged twenty-five years, born in South Carolina; Michael Kenney, seaman, aged thirty years, born in Ireland; Andrew Jackson, seaman, aged twenty-two, born in Ireland; George Valentine, seaman, aged twenty-five, born in Maryland; deserted from his company at the Charleston Arsenal and enlisted on the Beauregard voluntarily; Henry Maylan, seaman, aged twenty-two, born in Ireland; has been deck hand on the New York and Charleston steamers; Henry Pahlow, seaman, aged forty-two, Prussian; Richard Robinson, seaman, aged forty-seven, native of England; William Perkins, seaman, aged forty-five, born in Ireland, was ten years in the Third regiment United States Artillery, Col. Yates; Richard C. Busey, seaman, aged forty-one, born in Baltimore; was decoyed on board while drunk and forced to sign the ship's articles; he was a member of a company stationed on Sullivan's Island at the time of the bombardment of Sumter; he says but one man was killed at Moultrie by the bursting of a shell; John Sommer, aged twenty-seven, native of Germany, was paid twenty dollars advance when he shipped—could get no work at Charleston; Frederick Kleinca, native of Germany.

The above twenty-seven men are the hardest-looking, most desperate and wretched set it has ever been our lot to encounter. We pity the fate of the unfortunates who might have fallen into their power had they not been arrested in their wicked career by the gallant Captain Rogers. That such a vessel, such a crew, and so miserable an armament and outfit should have been permitted to leave the harbor of Charleston, is most wonderful. Their cause must be a desperate one when defended by such ragamuffins as now disgrace the walls of the jail of Key West.

The following is a true copy of the letter of marque and reprisal:

JEFFERSON DAVIS, PRESIDENT OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA: To all who shall see these presents, greeting:—Know ye, that by virtue of the power vested in me by law, I have commissioned, and do hereby commission, have authorized, and do hereby authorize, the schooner or vessel called the Beauregard, (more particularly described in the schedule hereunto annexed,) whereof Gilbert Hay is commander, to act as a private armed vessel in the service of the Confederate States on the high sea, against the United States of America, their ships, vessels, goods, effects, and those of their citizens, during the pending of the war now existing between the said Confederate States and the said United States. This commission to continue in force until revoked by the President of the Confederacy for the time being.

COL. COCHRANE'S SPEECH,

DELIVERED AT WASHINGTON, D. C., NOV. 13, 1861.

THE following is Colonel Cochrane's speech, made to his soldiers on the occasion of the presentation of a flag:

SOLDIERS OF THE FIRST UNITED STATES CHASSEURS (bravo Colonel): I have a word to say to you to-day. You have engaged in an arduous struggle. You have prosecuted it; you intend to prosecute it; you have stood unflinchingly before the enemy; you have proved yourselves patriotic, able, and tried soldiers, and you are entitled to the meed of praise. I, your commander, this day feel that it is a proud duty to extend to you the hand of approbation, and to declare that you are worthy of your country.

Soldiers, you have undergone labor; you have faced the enemy; you have stood without retreating before their fire; you have borne the inclemencies of the season, and you are ready to advance with that grand army of which you are a part. Your country opens its arms, receives you to its bosom. It will always praise and applaud you. Its commanders stand at the head of the column, and, with you behind them, they are not to be deterred. But the command is forthcoming—forward, march! toward the enemy. Take his possessions, for they are yours, they are yours to occupy; they are yours to enjoy; you are no marauders, you are no plunderers of property not your own, but you are the avengers of the law; you are the right arm of the Constitution; under your flag march patriotism, and order, and republican institutions; in your train follow peace, prosperity, and liberty; you are the servants of these high potentates, and the arm through which they strike is the arm of the worthy public servant who stands behind me on this occasion, the Secretary of War. Soldiers, you have been called to the field, not as marauders and mercenaries, but as the defenders of our high faith, defenders of our glorious reputation, defenders of our honor and renown, around which cluster the memories of the past, and whose feats and performances will yet distinguish the future. You are led forward by a commander under whom to serve is a pride for the highest among us. He enjoys the confidence of the people, and his reputation already renders powerless the arms of your enemies. By him we have won victories in the South, and by these victories we have assurances of triumphs yet to come. Beaufort is ours—Charleston may be ours—the whole country now disintegrated may be shortly united by the force of those arms of which you are a part, and the Union once more signify to the world the intent of that glorious motto, E Pluribus Unum. Then no longer shall be heard that fell doctrine of secession which would tear us asunder, and distract, part from part, this glorious Union; but we shall all be as we have been, one and inseparable, under the flag of our glorious nationality, won by our fathers, and preserved by you. (Applause.) Here is assembled, upon the banks of the Potomac, an army, the like of which the world has never seen. The motive which has gathered that army together never before was presented to the eye of history. It was congregated by no despotic order; it was the voluntary wish, the motive power, of every man composing it—the power of men rushing, as with one purpose, to reinstate the flag of our Union and save the Republic. That, soldiers, is your mission; and you have a commander who, with lightning speed, will lead you to conquest, and with equal speed will transmit the glory of your labors to the remotest corners of our country. And now, permit me, though the shades of night are falling upon us, to indulge in a few words as to the cause of the war, and the means by which it is to be brought to a successful termination. The material aid I have already adverted to; the motive power remains to be commented upon. On the one side you have the Confederate army; on the other side you have the grand Union—the Federal army. Now, the difference between these two words, in their common acceptation, is the cause for which these two armies are fighting. It is secession against federation; federation against secession. Nationality against disunion; confusion against order; anarchy against a good, free, and liberal Government—a Government made equally by the Fathers of the South and the Fathers of the North. We are in a revolutionary period. The South contend for the right of revolution. We admit the right, but while we admit it, we invoke the sole umpire which may be invoked on such occasions—the umpire of the sword, the umpire of force, the ultima ratio, that last effort to which men appeal when they have differences otherwise irreconcilable. They—the South—have resorted to arms, and they have compelled us to the same resort, and if they claim that it is a war of self-preservation on their part, it is equally a war of self-preservation on ours, and if we are in controversy for very existence, then I contend that all the resources, all the means within ourselves, individually, collectively, and nationally, must be resorted to and adopted. (Applause.) But some friend, a doubter, exclaims: "Would you disrupt and tear asunder the Constitution?" Where is the Constitution? Would you tread and trample upon that sacred instrument, and no longer acknowledge its binding force? No longer be bound by its compromises and decrees? I answer, No. The Constitution, by the necessity of the controversy, is cast behind the arena in the strife. Nay it rests there safe until, the present strife being over, it shall be restored to its original purity and force. Like the Sybil leaves when lost, the remainder become more valuable in our eyes, and in the midst of carnage we will clasp to our bosoms that instrument whose worth has never been transcended by human efforts. Soldiers, to what means shall we resort for our existence? This war is devoted not merely to victory and its mighty honors, not merely to the triumph which moves in glorious procession along our streets; but it is a war which moves toward the protection of our homes, the safety of our families, the continuation of our domestic altars, and the protection of our firesides. In such a war we are justified, are bound to resort to every force within our power. Having opened the port of Beaufort, we shall be able to export millions of cotton bales, and from these we may raise the sinews of war. Do you say that we should not seize the cotton? No; you are clear upon that point. Suppose the munitions of war are within our reach, would we not be guilty of shameful neglect if we availed not ourselves of the opportunity to use them? Suppose the enemy's slaves were arrayed against you, would you, from any squeamishness, refrain from pointing against them the hostile gun, and prostrating them in death? No; that is your object and purport, and if you would seize their property, open their ports, and even destroy their lives, I ask you whether you would not use their slaves? Whether you would not arm their slaves, (great applause,) and carry them in battalions against their masters? (Renewed and tumultuous applause.) If necessary to save this Government, I would plunge their whole country, black and white, into one indiscriminate sea of blood, so that we should in the end have a Government which would be the vicegerent of God. Let us have no more of this dilettante system, but let us work with a will and a purpose that cannot be mistaken. Let us not be put aside from too great a delicacy of motive. Soldiers, you know no such reasoning as this. You have arms in your hands, and those arms are placed there for the purpose of exterminating an enemy unless he submits to law, order, and the Constitution. If he will not submit, explode every thing that comes in your way. Set fire to the cotton. Explode the cotton. Take property wherever you may find it. Take the slave and bestow him on the non-slaveholder if you please. (Great applause.) Do to them as they would do to us. Raise up a party of interest against the absent slaveholders, distract their counsels, and if this should not be sufficient, take the slave by the hand, place a musket in it, and in God's name bid him strike for the liberty of the human race. (Immense applause.) Now, is this emancipation? Is this abolitionism? I do not regard it as either. It no more partakes of abolitionism than a spaniel partakes of the nature of the lion. Abolitionism is to free the slaves. It is to make war upon the South for that purpose. It is to place them above their masters in the social scale. It is to assert the great abstract principle of equality among men. But to take the slave and to make him an implement of war in overcoming your enemy, that is a military scheme. It is a military necessity, and the commander who does not this, or something equivalent to it, is unworthy of the position he holds, and equally unworthy of your confidence. Emancipation! Are we engaged in a war of emancipation? If so, who commenced the war? Not we. And if we did not commence the war, we cannot be charged with its consequences. Where had it its origin? It had its origin in the South. It was and has been a war of the South against the free institutions of the North. Let me illustrate. Are we to free their slaves? We do not intend it. Do you recollect the resolution which was passed the last session of Congress, which distinctly declares that it never was intended by anybody in this wide land to free the slaves? "Compromise," too, has been talked of in this matter. Why did they not compromise? Because it was not their object. I say it fearlessly, for I infer it from scenes in which I was an actor. At Charleston I remember, when Mr. Douglas could not be nominated for the Presidency, they were not satisfied to remain in the Convention. Trying all their schemes, and failing, they professed themselves satisfied, and yet, satisfied as they proclaimed themselves to be at midnight, the very first thing next morning was to secede from the Convention. This, you know, was a foregone conclusion. Nothing could be satisfactory to them except that arms should be resorted to, and the fate of revolution abided by. I declare, therefore, that the war is not of our organizing, but it has been forced upon us by a crafty enemy—an enemy resolved to do or die; to destroy our free Government, or perish in the attempt. And what is their object? Why, their object is to tear down this proud, noble, and beneficent Government, to establish a reign of terror, anarchy, and confiscation in the land; to implant upon this our soil the hideous doctrine of the right of secession, so that when one State secedes another may secede, and still another, and still another, so that within forty-eight hours, by the light of their reason and the exactness of their judgment, you may establish on this continent thirty-four independent Governments. Thirty-four, did I say? Why, no, not thirty-four merely, but every county, and every city, and every village, and hamlet; nay, every person who suffers from indigestion at the dinner-table, may claim the same right, and thus, soldiers, we shall have the confusion and disorder which will plunge into dismay and ruin the best and most benevolent Government in the world. Now, what is our object? It is simply to arrest the sway of this fell spirit of secession. It is to maintain our Government, to establish and vindicate law and order, without which neither happiness nor prosperity can exist. You are engaged, too, by the strength of your arms to protect our commerce with other nations, and when victory crowns your devotion to your country's cause—as it assuredly will—you will be proudly pointed at as the champions of American rights, as men who have maintained their dearest principles, and as those who, from this time forward, shall live in the most grateful remembrance of the living, and whose names shall descend with marks of imperishable honor to the remotest posterity. But, soldiers, to accomplish all this, not merely arms are necessary, not merely men to carry them, but that powerful and overwhelming spirit which constitutes and makes us men, that spirit which lifts us up above the creeping things of the earth, and brings us near the Deity in accomplishing his work on earth. Oh, then, let us not think that the "battle is to the strong"—let us not merely depend on discipline and order, but with that fervidness of soul which inspired our fathers at Bunker Hill, and Saratoga, and Yorktown, come forward and give effect to all that is valuable in the name of patriotism, and honor, and religion.

Never, no—never, will you succeed until that spirit is once more manifested and developed which actuated the soldiers of Cromwell, who, on the field, invoked the Lord God to arise. So let it be with us. We must be, at least, one with him in spirit. Let us, like Cromwell, invoke the Almighty blessing, and, clothed with the panoply of patriotism and religion, strike for our homes and our country. (Immense cheering.) Let us—oh, let us, without reference to any differences of the past, keep our eye steadfastly on the great object to be achieved, the nationality and independence of this country—the salvation of civilization from the insults and assaults of barbarism; and then, but not till then, will you be worthy to be recognized as a distinguished portion of our great American army. (Long continued cheering from the whole regiment.)

Immediately after the speech of Col. Cochrane there was a tumultuous demand for the Secretary of War. Mr. Cameron came before the regiment, and said:

SOLDIERS: It is too late for me to make you a speech to-night, but I will say that I heartily approve every sentiment uttered by your noble commander. The doctrines which he has laid down I approve as if they were my own words. They are my sentiments—sentiments which will not only lead you to victory, but which will in the end reconstruct this our glorious Federal Constitution. It is idle to talk about treating with these rebels upon their own terms. We must meet them as our enemies, treat them as enemies, and punish them as enemies, until they shall learn to behave themselves. Every means which God has placed in our hands it is our duty to use for the purpose of protecting ourselves. I am glad of the opportunity to say here, what I have already said elsewhere, in these few words, that I approve the doctrines this evening enunciated by Col. Cochrane. (Loud and prolonged cheering.)

THE MORALS OF THE UNION ARMY.

CHAPLAIN INSKIP'S LETTER.

CAMP MARION, UPTON'S HILL, VA., }
HEAD-QUARTERS FOURTEENTH REG'T N. Y. S. M. }

To the Army Committee of the N. Y. Y. M. Christian Association:

DEAR BRETHREN: I write to inform you that a new era has dawned upon us. We can scarcely find words to express our joy and gratitude. The chapel tent you kindly donated to us has already been the means of inconceivable good to us. It is truly wonderful what a decided improvement it has made in our regiment within one week. * * * * *

On Monday night we held a temperance meeting. A large number were present; indeed, many more than our chapel would contain. One of the private soldiers delivered an address of great earnestness, which was listened to with profound attention. He was followed by the chaplain in a few brief remarks. Several were induced to take the pledge. Capt. Mallory, the president of our Regimental Temperance Society, occupied the chair. Our society now numbers about seventy-five members, and we hope to have large accessions soon.

On Tuesday evening we formed a literary and debating society; officers were chosen, various committees appointed, and a highly interesting discussion ensued, which seemed to interest the men very much.

On Wednesday and Thursday evenings we held our prayer meetings. The attendance was excellent, considering that about one-half of the regiment were otherwise engaged. About fifty were present, of whom half were members of some Christian church. Of the others, ten arose to solicit the prayers of the people of God.

On Friday evening we had an amateur concert of miscellaneous music. We were honored on this occasion with the presence of Brigadier-General Keyes and his staff. The pieces sung were in several instances decidedly religious; others were of an amusing character, but all contained some ennobling moral sentiment, which was all the more gratifying because the young men made their own selection. The chaplain presided and made such remarks as seemed just and needful. The object of this concert is to draw the attention of the men from other and pernicious methods of recreation. Night is the time when gambling, one of the most pernicious vices of camp life, is more generally practised. Many engage in this vice as a mere recreation. We propose to furnish them such recreation as will be a blessing to them.

On Saturday evening we have what we call a social meeting. The whole evening is occupied with singing and informal speaking, or rather conversation. The topics are suggested by the chaplain.

On the Sabbath I preached in the morning and evening, and in the afternoon a prayer meeting was held. You will perceive that our tent has been well used. * * *

I hope you will do all you can for the army. Christian beneficence never had a more inviting or a more promising field. God grant that the Church may perceive this. Yours in the Lord,
JOHN S. INSKIP, Chaplain.

GENERAL DIX'S PROCLAMATION

TO THE PEOPLE OF ACCOMAC AND NORTHAMPTON COUNTIES, VA., NOV. 13.

THE military forces of the United States are about to enter your counties as a part of the Union. They will go among you as friends, and with the earnest hope that they may not by your own acts be compelled to become your enemies. They will invade no right of person or property. On the contrary, your laws, your institutions, your usages, will be scrupulously respected. There need be no fear that the quietude of any firesides will be disturbed, unless the disturbance is caused by yourselves. Special directions have been given not to interfere with the condition of any person held to domestic servitude, and in order that there may be no ground for mistake or pretext for misrepresentation, commanders of regiments or corps have been instructed not to permit such persons to come within their lines.

The command of the expedition is intrusted to Brig.-Gen. Henry H. Lockwood, of Delaware—a State identical in some of the distinctive features of its social organization with your own. Portions of his force come from counties in Maryland bordering on one of yours. From him and from them you may be assured of the sympathy of near neighbors, as well as friends, if you do not repel it by hostile resistance or attack.

This mission is to assert the authority of the United States, to reopen your intercourse with the loyal States, and especially with Maryland, which has just proclaimed her devotion to the Union by the most triumphant vote in her political annals; to restore to commerce its accustomed guides, by reestablishing the lights on your coast; to afford you a free export for the produce of your labor, a free ingress for the necessaries and comforts of life which you require in exchange, and in a word to put an end to the embarrassments and restrictions brought upon you by a causeless and unjustifiable rebellion.

If the calamities of intestine war which are desolating other districts of Virginia, and have already crimsoned her lands with fraternal blood, fall also upon you, it will not be the fault of the Government. It asks only that its authority may be recognized. It sends among you a force too strong to be successfully opposed—a force which cannot be resisted in any other spirit than that of wantonness and malignity. If there are any among you, who, rejecting all overtures of friendship, thus provoke retaliation and draw down upon themselves consequences which the Government is most anxious to avert, to their account must be laid the blood which may be shed, and the desolation which may be brought upon peaceful homes. On all who are thus reckless of the obligations of humanity and duty, and all who are found in arms, the severest punishment warranted by the laws of war will be visited.

To those who remain in the quiet pursuit of their domestic occupations the public authorities assure all they can give peace, freedom from annoyance, protection from foreign and internal enemies, a guaranty of all Constitutional and legal rights, and the blessings of a just and parental Government.

JOHN A. DIX,
Major-General Commanding.

COLONEL JENNISON'S WELCOME

TO CAPTAIN JOHN BROWN'S SHARPSHOOTERS.

A WRITER in the Chicago Tribune gives the following account of the reception:

CAMP JENNISON, KANSAS CITY, }
TUESDAY, November 12, 1861. }

To-night I have looked on scenes such as a few months ago men would have been considered demented to have foretold. Captain John Brown jr.'s company of sharpshooters arrived here this afternoon, having, on reaching Fort Leavenworth, unanimously decided to join Colonel Jennison's command. They will be attached as mounted riflemen. Some sixty men are here, under Lieuts. Bostwick and Hoyt. Captain Brown is still in your city, finishing the recruiting, and will be on in a few days. It is by all odds the finest body of men I have seen, and as they marched up the main street, singing the "John Brown song," the emotions and memories the scene excited crowded thickly on the mind of an old Kansas man like your correspondent, and were far too deep to be painted by words. As the song rang out, and the escort came to meet the new comers, cheering lustily, there was something in the scene which will render it ineffaceable to my mind.

Stirring as was the reception of the company, it was surpassed by the scene which took place in camp after supper. The company came to the Colonel's quarters, and formed a semicircle in front. The field officers came out, and then the "John Brown's song" by them was sung with glorious spirit. Afterward cheers were given for the Colonel and officers generally. The bugler of the company then sang a new and very appropriate version of "Dixie," which I will send hereafter. Colonel Jennison was called out, and made a characteristic speech. I cannot give you more than a short synopsis thereof. It was as forcible, and couched in as strong Anglo-Saxon, as the proclamation I forwarded you yesterday. Colonel Jennison said: "Gentlemen and fellow-soldiers: I am not in the habit of public speaking, but will say that I never felt more like fighting than I have in the last fifteen minutes. Proud to welcome here Captain Brown's New York company, he would say that old John Brown was the only man in the United States in whom he took stock.

"He first took arms under him, and, when doing so, determined never to lay them down again until the last slave in the United States was free. The time for that was now come. This regiment was organized, not for political effect, but for fighting purposes and freedom. He meant to do for treason and to kill Slavery at the same time. Here he would say, that if at any time the Government did not approve of such action, they could have his commission. But if that occurred, they would be likely to find him on his own hook, though, as at first, he should have but six men with him. He felt that Captain Brown's company had honored him, his officers and regiment, by so unitedly voting to come into it. In his own name, and that of his officers and men, he returned them thanks. He believed that every thing would be done to insure mutual confidence, and wanted them to understand the programme. It was a standing order that any man bringing a rebel into camp should be put into irons. If the Colonel ever did so foolish a thing, he trusted the regiment would enforce the order. He meant to bring them out of their holes by necessitating their attendance on their families. He was ordered to guard through a Government train, and, in doing so, proposed to make this country so safe that a lone widow might travel in safety. He wanted the rights of Union men respected.

"For rebels and their sympathizers, no temporizing. Be sure they are disloyal men, and then meet them promptly. For the half-way trash we have no room, and my test of loyalty is a willingness to fight for the Union. There can be no peace until the thing is settled, justice done on traitors, and freedom established. He had told General Fremont that he would do no fighting if he thought Slavery would exist when the fight was done. The slaves of rebels can always find a protection in this camp, and they will be defended to the last man and bullet. He wanted no men who were not Abolitionists—had no room for such, and trusted he had none, for all know now that Slavery is at the bottom, middle, and summit of this hellish war. Nor was he or his men too good to fight by darker-skinned men than themselves. He meant to make 'contrabands useful,' and did not know what better use to put secesh guns to than to place them in the hands of the slaves of rebels. No excesses will be committed by his men, and he doubted not our new companions will cheerfully obey all legitimate commands. Again he thanked them."

CONFEDERATE EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

THE subjoined is taken from the Richmond Examiner, of November 14th:

We publish below, as general information, and to gratify our numerous readers belonging to that communion, "The Constitution of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Confederate States of America," as proposed by the General Convention of that church, lately held at Columbia, South Carolina.

The Convention, we learn, was well attended, all the bishops of that church in the Confederate States being present, except Bishop Polk, of Louisiana, together with a full attendance of clerical and lay deputies. The venerable Bishop Meade, of Virginia, as senior bishop, presided over the body. The general tone of its deliberations, though entirely free from asperity toward the church of the North, gave evidence of a deep and settled conviction, on every hand, that the separation in church organization, like that in civil government, was, and ought to be, complete and perpetual.

In taking the necessary steps to form an independent church organization for the Confederate States, every thing was done with harmony and good feeling, and but one important change from the old constitution was made—namely, that which permits a State to divide herself into two or more dioceses (jurisdiction of a bishop) without the consent of the General Council. The several State councils are required each for itself to ratify this constitution.

The missionary fund and work of this church in the South, it was found, had suffered no decline since the separation from the North, but both were on the increase, even under a provisional arrangement.

CONSTITUTION PROPOSED FOR THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA.

ARTICLE I. This church, retaining the name of Protestant Episcopal, shall be known as the "Protestant Episcopal Church in the Confederate States of America."

ART. II. There shall be in this church a General Council. There may be also provincial councils and diocesan councils.

ART. III. The General Council of this church shall meet on the second Wednesday in November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, at Augusta, Ga., and on the same day in every third year thereafter, in such place as shall be determined by the Council.

In case there shall be an epidemic disease, or other good cause to render it necessary to alter the place appointed for such meeting, the presiding bishop may designate another convenient place for holding of such Council; and special meetings may be called at other times in the manner hereafter to be determined.

The General Council shall consist of two houses—the House of Bishops and the House of Deputies.

The House of Bishops shall be composed of all bishops of this church having jurisdiction within the Confederate States or the territories thereof.

Each diocese shall be entitled to an equal representation, clerical and lay, in the House of Deputies. Such representation shall consist of not more than three clergymen and three laymen, communicants in this church, resident in the diocese and elected by the Council thereof.

Before they shall proceed to business, a majority of the dioceses which shall have adopted this constitution, shall be represented in the Council. The representations from two dioceses shall be sufficient to adjourn.

In all business of the Council, freedom of debate shall be allowed.

Each house shall have the right to originate acts, and when any act shall have been passed in either house it shall be transmitted to the other house for its consideration. No act shall have the operation of law, unless concurred in and authenticated by both houses.

When any proposed act shall have passed the House of Deputies and shall be negatived by the House of Bishops, the House of Bishops shall, when requested by the House of Deputies, signify in writing their non-concurrence within three days after such request shall have been made.

In all questions, when required by the clerical or lay representatives from any diocese, each order shall have one vote, and the majority of suffrages by dioceses shall be conclusive in each order, provided such majority comprehend a majority of the dioceses represented in that order. The concurrence of both orders shall be necessary in such case to constitute a vote of the house.

If any diocese should omit or decline to elect clerical deputies to the General Council, or should omit or decline to elect lay delegates, or if any of those of either order elected, should fail to attend, such diocese shall, nevertheless, be considered as duly represented by such deputy or deputies as may attend, whether lay or clerical. And if, through the neglect of any diocese which shall have adopted this constitution, no deputy therefrom, either lay or clerical, should attend the Council, the church in such diocese shall, nevertheless, be bound by the acts of such Council.

ART. IV. Whenever any one of the Confederate States shall contain more than one diocese, said State may, with the consent of all the dioceses thereof, constitute an Ecclesiastical Province, in which a Provincial Council may be held at least once in three years, which council shall be made up of all the bishops having jurisdiction within the province, and of such representatives, clerical and lay, from the dioceses within the province as may be determined upon by the Diocesan Council thereof. If there be more than one bishop within the province, the senior bishop by consecration shall preside in the Provincial Council, and when there shall be three, or more than three bishops, they shall form a separate house.

Whenever such council shall legislate, its acts shall be of force within all the dioceses embraced within the province.

ART. V. There shall be held annually, in each diocese, a Diocesan Council, to be composed of the bishop or bishops of the diocese, and of a lay and clerical representation from each parish of the diocese. This council shall legislate for only diocesan purposes.

ART. VI. The bishop or bishops in each diocese, shall be chosen by the council of that diocese, agreeably to such rules as it may prescribe; and every bishop of this church shall confine the exercise of his episcopal office to his proper diocese, unless requested to perform any act of that office by the ecclesiastical authority of another diocese.

ART. VII. A new diocese, formed in any of the Confederate States, or in any territory thereof, not now represented, may, any time hereafter, be admitted to union with, and representation in, the General Council of this church, on acceding to this constitution: Provided, there were, at the time of organization, and are, at the time of making application for admission, at least six officiating presbyters within such diocese, regularly settled in a parish or church.

A new diocese may be formed within the limits of any existing diocese, with the consent of its council, and bishop or bishops thereof, or, if there be no bishop, of the ecclesiastical authority thereof; and a new diocese may be formed within the limits of two or more dioceses, with the like consent: Provided, that no such new diocese shall be formed which shall contain less than ten self-supporting parishes, or less than ten presbyters who have been for at least one year canonically resident within the bounds of such new diocese, regularly settled in a parish or congregation, and qualified to vote for a bishop; nor shall such diocese be formed, if thereby any existing diocese shall be so reduced as to contain less than fifteen self-supporting parishes, or less than fifteen presbyters who have been residing therein, and settled and qualified as above mentioned: Provided, that no city shall form more than one diocese.

In case a diocese shall be divided into two or more dioceses, the diocesan of the diocese so divided, may elect the diocese over which he will preside, and shall become the diocesan thereof. And the assistant bishop, if there be one, may elect the diocese to which he will be attached; and if he be not the one elected by the bishop, he shall be the diocesan thereof.

ART. VIII. The mode of trying bishops shall be provided by the General Council. The court appointed for that purpose shall be composed of bishops only.

In every diocese the mode of trying presbyters and deacons shall be prescribed by the council of the diocese.

None but a bishop shall pronounce sentence of admonition, suspension, or degradation from the ministry, on any clergyman, whether bishop, presbyter or deacon.

ART. IX. No person shall be admitted to holy orders, until he shall have been examined by the bishop and two presbyters, and shall have exhibited such testimonials and other requisites, as the canons in that case provided may direct.

Nor shall any person be ordained either deacon or priest, until he shall have subscribed to the following declaration, viz.:

I do believe the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be the Word of God, and to contain all things necessary to salvation; and I do solemnly engage to conform to the doctrines and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Confederate States of America.

No person ordained by a foreign bishop shall be permitted to officiate as a minister of this church, until he shall have complied with the canon or canons in such case provided, and have also subscribed the aforesaid declaration.

ART. X. A Book of Common Prayer, administration of the Sacrament, and other rites and ceremonies of the church, articles of religion, and a form and manner of making, ordaining, and consecrating bishops, priests, and deacons, when established by the General Council, shall be used in those dioceses which shall have adopted the constitution. No alteration or addition shall be made in the Book of Common Prayer, or other offices of the church, or the Articles of Religion, unless the same shall be submitted to one General Council, and by a resolution thereof, made known to the council of every diocese, approved by the diocesan council, and adopted at the subsequent General Council.

ART. XI. Bishops for foreign countries may, on due application therefrom, be consecrated, with the approbation of a majority of the bishops of this church, signified in writing to the president bishop; he, thereupon, taking order for the same, and they being satisfied that the person designated for the office has been duly chosen, and is properly qualified.

The order for the consecration shall be conformed, as nearly as may be, in the judgment of the bishops, to the one used in this church.

Bishops so consecrated, shall not be eligible to the office of diocesan or assistant bishop in any diocese in the Confederate States, nor be entitled to a seat in the House of Bishops, nor exercise any authority in the said States.

ART. XII. Any alteration in this constitution shall be originated in the General Council. When adopted in one General Council, by a majority of the House of Bishops, and by a majority of the House of Deputies, said deputies voting by dioceses and orders, such alteration shall be made known to the several diocesan councils, and, if agreed to by two-thirds of them, and ratified in the ensuing General Council, the same shall be a part of this constitution.

AFFAIR OF THE SCHOONER MARYLAND.

NEW YORK "TIMES" ACCOUNT.

BALTIMORE, Friday, Nov. 15, 1861.

FROM Lieut. C. H. Colburn, of the Eleventh Massachusetts regiment, Company H, attached to Gen. Hooker's brigade, on the Maryland shore of the Potomac, and who arrived in this city this evening, I have the following interesting particulars of a rebel attack upon the schooner Maryland. The schooner was loaded with wood, and yesterday, while passing the rebel battery off Pig Point, and directly off the encampment of the Massachusetts Eleventh, became becalmed. The crew, immediately on perceiving preparations making by the rebels to attack their vessel from the Virginia shore, dropped their anchor, and taking to their boats, rowed away to the United States flotilla, which was anchored about four miles up the river.

Lieut. W. L. Chandler, of the Eleventh, in command, and accompanied by Lieut. Colburn and two or three others, immediately leaped into a small boat and put off for the schooner. When they reached her they discovered that the rebels were approaching from the opposite shore in superior force. The guns of the rebel battery now opened a brisk fire upon the vessel, which, together with the near approach of the rebel crew in the boat, compelled them to abandon her, having made the discovery that no one was left on board.

Soon after the rebels reached the schooner, dark volumes of smoke were seen bursting up the cabin hatchway, while the rebel demons danced about the deck, cheering and yelling like wild men, and continuing their loud cries until they had entered their boat and gained the Virginia shore.

A gentle breeze now began to sweep up the river, and no sooner had the rebels deserted the burning vessel than the men of the Eleventh again rowed back to her, and, amid a rapid fire from the rebels, hoisted her anchor and extinguished the flames—which they found confined to the cabin—set the sails, and slowly and steadily swept up the river, amid the cheers of the National forces, who had now gathered upon the bank, and carried the schooner safely beyond the range of the enemy's fire.

The Maryland was lying close in to the Maryland shore. Another schooner, which was lying becalmed about a quarter of a mile below the Maryland, also followed, and passed by the battery without damage. Over one hundred shots were fired upon the schooner Maryland, only two of which took effect, and those above-deck, doing little or no damage.

The steamer Yankee, as soon as the schooners had cleared the rebel fire, steamed down and took them in tow, carrying them up to the Government flotilla, where the Maryland was again handed over to her crew.

THE PURSUIT OF FLOYD.

REPORT OF GENERAL BENHAM.

FAYETTEVILLE C. H., Va., Nov. 16, 1861.

I HAVE the honor to report as follows in relation to the expedition from which I have, this afternoon returned, by the order of General Schenck, from the pursuit of General Floyd, upon the road to Raleigh, by which he escaped by a most rapid and arduous march last night.

Upon the night of the 11th inst., while at a kind of bivouac at Loup Creek mouth, where I had been with part of my command, by the directions of General Rosecrans, since the 5th and 6th insts., I received your orders to proceed as early as practicable with the force then at that point, about one thousand five hundred men, of the Tenth, Twelfth, and Thirteenth regiments, to occupy Cotton Hill, there having been previously stationed by his orders, under my directions, the Thirty-seventh regiment of seven hundred men at Loup Creek forks, about seven miles up, and in detachments up to ten miles from the mouth of the Creek, also about three hundred and twenty of the Forty-fourth regiment, and four hundred and thirty of the Seventh about one mile upon the left fork.

About the time of marching from Loup Creek, however, I had directed, as he had ordered me, about one thousand men from these last three regiments, to occupy Cassidy's Mills, about six miles up from the left fork toward this place, and the remainder, being part of the Thirty-seventh regiment, to endeavor to reach me at Cotton Hill by a march to the left of Cassidy's Mills by Nugent's.

On the morning of the 12th, in accordance with the directions given, with the first-named force, and four mounted howitzers, and two rifled six-pounders, we moved up the left bank of the Kanawha, four miles from the mouth of Loup Creek to Gauley Falls; thence to the right, some five miles over Cotton Hill to Herschberger's by three p. m., where at Laurel Creek we met the advance pickets of the enemy in force, as it was ascertained afterwards, in a most strong position, prepared with abatis; and after skirmishing with them with the greater part of the Thirteenth regiment, until dark, we went into bivouac in the open air, on the escarped mountain road, with but few fires and but little water; myself and staff lying on the bare rocks with our horses held below us. Our loss in the skirmish was one man killed and four wounded, that of the enemy two, at least, killed and about seven wounded.

The enemy were completely driven from the ground they occupied, but not much farther, as a large reinforcement was seen coming to them; (I have since learned four regiments and one piece of artillery were sent.) And with only about one thousand six hundred and forty men, for Colonel Sieber's detachment had not fully joined, I did not think it would be safe to draw on a battle with the whole rebel force, reported by yourself to me to be from four thousand to six thousand men, and as I heard afterward with nine to eleven guns, although as I reported to you that night, I felt I would hold my position in the mountain secure against their force.

During the night, at about two a. m. of the 13th, it was reported to me by a scout I had sent out to watch the rebel camp, that the wheels of heavy wagons, or artillery, were heard, rumbling in the direction of their camp, but as this became no fainter it was uncertain whether they were retreating or receiving reinforcements. I immediately sent directions to Colonel Smith, of the Thirteenth regiment, to send out two other scouts to ascertain if the movement was a retreat, but most unfortunately, as Colonel Smith informed me in the morning, he did not understand it as a command, but merely as a suggestion, and they were not sent out.

On learning this at early light, I immediately sent forward a scout of ten men, supported by two companies of the Thirteenth regiment; but the report from these men, of the retreat of the rebels, did not come till after four p. m., on which I immediately gave the orders for marching to overtake them.

For this I felt the more prepared as I had ordered and expected down to join me, the force that were at Cassidy's Mills, having authorized the aid, who was sent there, to order them direct to Fayette road, if the enemy were proven to be retreating and it would be surely safe to do so. But this last order was also misunderstood, and although a portion of this command of mine had occupied Fayette from eleven A. M., without finding they had the means to communicate with me, they were recalled and unfortunately made the circuit around to this place again.

At length, by five P. M., we moved forward from the "Union School House" to the Dickerson's farm, which we reached before seven, finding there the evidences of a most hasty retreat, in the remains of large quantities of tents and camp equipage destroyed by fire. At a short distance beyond this farm the command was closed up, halted, and rested for about four hours, and the detachments of the Forty-fourth and Seventh joined me, making my moving strength about two thousand seven hundred men. With this force, at eleven P. M. I moved forward, arriving about four A. M. of the fourteenth at Hawkins' Farm, about five miles beyond Fayetteville, being delayed much by scouting the roads in advance.

On the route farther evidences of the hasty retreat were shown in the tents, wagons, and large quantities of ammunition left behind. At seven o'clock we again moved forward with the belief, which proved to be the fact, that part at least of their train was encamped five miles from Hawkins.

The advance was led by Col. Smith of the Thirteenth, to whose prudence and caution during that day we owe it, that not a single man of ours was killed or wounded, and scouting most cautiously, though of course slowly forward, we met the advance posts of the enemy after four miles' march at nine A. M., where a sharp contest with our advance continued for nearly half an hour, where besides several other losses the rebels had mortally wounded the colonel of Floyd's Cavalry—Col. St. George Croghan, (son of the late Inspector-General Croghan.)

These outposts being driven in, we advanced carefully about one mile further, where the enemy were found posted in considerable force behind a ridge covering McCoy's Mills. A regiment of cavalry and different regiments of infantry are reported as distinctly seen. After an interchange of fire between these and our advance for twenty minutes, Capt. Schneider's rifle artillery was brought up with good effect, the officers reporting that they saw many fall at their fire. As, however, I soon discovered a ridge that made out from our rear to our right, that commanded at close musket range the left of the enemy, I sent my aid to direct Lieut.-Col. Creighton with the Seventh and half of the Thirty-seventh under Major Ankele to pass down this ridge to attack their left. This movement, I regret, was delayed fully half an hour by the resistance of Colonel Sieber to this order, he at first neglecting or refusing to send the number of men required, and demanding the right to command it, as reported by my aid. When at length this attack was made it was entirely successful; and with the first concentrated volleys of this command, of about seven hundred and fifty men, uniting with the fire of the Thirteenth regiment, the whole of the enemy retreated in confusion with the last of their wagon train. Their position was soon, though cautiously, taken possession of, when it was found thickly strewn with blankets, clothing, camp equipage, &c., as evidences of a precipitous flight. A short time for rest was now given, and we then moved forward with the usual scouting parties in advance, through an escarped road upon a steep mountain side, to a defile continuing for about four miles between two mountains up the Big Loup Creek. We found, about midway of the defile, a bridge of some size broken down, which delayed us nearly an hour to repair; yet still, as the guides informed us that there was a long and difficult hill for the passage of wagons about two miles in advance of the bridge, I decided to push forward in the hopes of overtaking it, although the men had been marching, nearly all the night previous as well as during the most of that day, in, for a greater part of the time, a drenching storm, and over roads in many places to a great extent in tenacious mud, and many of them, by the failure of expected trains, with less than half their rations. On reaching, at four P. M., the outlet of this defile at Keton's Farm, about fifteen miles from Fayetteville and twenty-one miles from our previous bivouac near Cotton Hill, we found the expected steep hill some two miles distant, and their wagons over it or not in sight. And therefore I concluded to bivouac the men there with such food as we best could obtain, and report the case, as I did so, to General Schenck at Fayetteville, who had assumed the direction by order of yourself, suggesting to him to join me with his force, (about one-half of mine,) that we might attack or drive the enemy in Raleigh the next day. The first despatch of General Schenck informed me that he had sent the Twenty-sixth regiment and some mounted men to reinforce me; a second, received at ten P. M., informed me that the Twenty-sixth regiment was ordered to return, while it directed me also to return as soon as practicable to this place.

As the men were still, for more than nine-tenths of them, without any shelter, in a most drenching rain or succession of violent thunder showers, many without their blankets even, which had been thrown off in the ardor of the chase, and as they were still standing round their fires, unable to sleep in the rain upon the open ground, the greater part of the command, though most unwilling to give up the pursuit, felt that, if it was so ordered, it must be best for themselves, after their few hours' halt, (it could not be called rest,) to retrace their steps that very night, rather than remain standing in the cold and wet till morning, with only the prospect before them of their return.

We accordingly commenced our return soon after one o'clock, and, reaching McCoy's about four, we rested till after six A. M. of the 15th, or to-day, when we moved onward, and, with a single rest about midway, the command reached this place soon after noon, being still in excellent spirits—their main disappointment being in not having been permitted to continue the pursuit of the rebels.

We are at this hour partly in houses, but a great number out in the open air in the village, where it is now snowing upon them in their rest, which, added to their really great exposure, will, I fear, half annihilate their effective strength.

The main facts and circumstances of the expedition are, therefore, that after remaining about one week upon Loup Creek, awaiting the cooperation of another force, and with my command of about three thousand, divided in four portions, as ordered by General Rosecrans, I at length moved forward with one-half the force to meet the enemy in front to the furthest point of Cotton Hill. There in the night after our first engagement with his outposts on the afternoon of the 13th, the enemy made a most precipitous retreat, leaving portions of his baggage, wagon-loads of ammunition, tents, clothing, &c., on the route, besides the evidences of the destruction of a much greater portion; that from the unknown and difficult nature of the country, some twenty hours had elapsed before his retreat was assured, and without which we did not feel it safe to pursue him to his works at Dickerson's farm (since found to be of the strongest character for field-works) with my force then less than two thousand, and not one-half of the least of his supposed numbers. He was then most vigorously followed up by my command through rain and storm and mud, till overtaken at about eighteen miles from the camp he left, and the heavy force of his rear guard was there routed, and further camp equipage taken after another action, by which his train was still kept in advance of us; and the pursuit was still continued, until, from the difficult nature of the defile beyond, the breaking of bridges, &c., our exhausted forces needed to rest for the night, when we were recalled by the orders of General Schenck: and this was accomplished with the loss of one man killed and four wounded on our part in the fight at Laurel Creek, and none at the affair at McCoy's Mills, while it is certain that the loss of the enemy was three times that amount, including that of their chief colonel of cavalry, killed.

Floyd was pursued for thirty miles from his batteries of Gauley Bridge, and driven, as was ascertained, to Raleigh, and on some eight miles further than our last bivouac.

I can only add in conclusion that, had I not been ordered to return, and had the forces which were sent over the river been moved up to Keton's to support me, as I asked, by a courier that evening, that they should be, we could have moved forward to Raleigh to-day as I intended, and, as I am well satisfied, captured that place and depot, with their train, and certainly routed if not captured the whole of Floyd's force.

I have now but to report the noble conduct of my men during this most toilsome march, where, through all their great exposure in the storm, upon the route, and in bivouac, without shelter against the rain or snow that fell in each of the last three nights, not a murmur was heard by me, but every duty was performed with the greatest cheerfulness and alacrity.

And the principal officers of the command were worthy of the men they led. Of Colonel W. S. Smith, commanding the Thirteenth regiment, I have previously expressed my opinion, in my report of the battle of Carnifax Ferry; and all there stated was here more than confirmed. Colonel White, of the Twelfth regiment, who has recently been promoted, and made the most praiseworthy and successful efforts for the discipline of his regiment of fine men, did not behave less nobly than if he had been fully in most successful battle, by yielding, as he did, to the exigencies of the occasion, a desire, with much of equity in it, which was shared by himself and his men, to lead the advance of the march.

Colonel Woods, (of the U. S. Army,) at this time acting in command of the Tenth regiment, led that regiment in advance, at a rapid and safe pace, at the latter part of the march on the 14th, with great good judgment and gallantry; and Captain Schneider, of the rifled artillery, a very gallant and deserving officer, was most prompt and successful in the management of his guns. Captain McMullen, though his howitzers were not brought into play in action, was prompt and ready at every point on the march, as he is ever at every call of duty; and Lieut.-Col. Creighton, of the 7th, executed the manoeuvre from our right flank, which decided the rout at McCoy's Mills, in most gallant style, the Forty-fourth, under its very efficient officer, Major Mitchell, not having the opportunity of participating in the action, as well as the Thirty-seventh regiment, from their position in the rear.

My high acknowledgments are also due to each of my personal staff, for their efficiency and gallantry on the field, with which every duty was performed. To the brigade surgeon, Dr. Shumard, ever most watchful over both the surgeons and the men for their health and safety; and my aid, Captain Atkinson, of rare ability and efficiency; and to Captain Stange, assistant adjutant general, of whose excellent character I have had the pleasure to report at Carnifax; as also to Captain Mallory, my commissary, of whom my expectations in that action were fully borne out; and to Brigade-Quartermaster Captain D. S. Smith, one of the most efficient in his department in the service, although detained by my orders at the camp, the highest praise is due for his care and forethought, not only in forwarding constantly the amplest supplies of provisions, but in having the tents, which had been struck at our late position, repitched by the time of the return of the men from their toilsome and wearied march, and amply provided with all the necessary comforts of the camp.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
H. W. BENHAM,
Brigadier-General U. S. V.

CINCINNATI "GAZETTE" ACCOUNT.

FAYETTE C. H., Va., Nov. 15.

As I telegraphed you, Floyd retreated the night of the skirmish at Cotton Hill, leaving a strong rear guard behind him. Next morning discovering from our scouts that he had vacated his position, we followed up to Union School House, still apprehensive that he might attack us, knowing that in point of numbers his force was superior to our own.

A scouting party under Sergeant Lambert, who I mentioned in my last, got on his track, killed one of his scouts, and brought information that induced the General to order a forward movement. We left Union School House late in the afternoon, marched some four miles to Col. Dickerson's place, well known through this part of the country, the colonel being probably the most influential secessionist in this part of the country. Here we obtained some items, and captured a few secesh guns. After halting for a couple of hours we took up the line of march, and, tired as we were, toiled on until four o'clock in the morning, when we again halted to allow the men and horses to refresh themselves. Soon after daylight the order to march was given, and we pushed on over roads rendered almost impassable by the heavy rains, and cut to pieces by the recent passage of Floyd's artillery and wagon trains. Our skirmishers, under the command of the gallant Capt. Gardner, of the Thirteenth Ohio, were in advance of the column on both sides of the road, and proceeded cautiously. Just as they reached a bend in the road, one of the company (private Seig, of Company F) crawled over and espied two squadrons of cavalry under Col. Croghan, of Kentucky, and here commenced the battle of McCoy's Mills.

A volley was instantly opened on the enemy, who were, as their wounded afterward acknowledged, taken completely by surprise. At the first fire several saddles were emptied, and Col. Croghan fell mortally wounded in the abdomen. The rebels, though surprised, showed fight and retired slowly, firing as they went; but our men having possession of the elevated ground on both sides, exposed them to a galling cross-fire, and forced them back. The main body then advanced, having, as before, strong parties of skirmishers. Col. Croghan was carried to the nearest house, and was cared for as well as the state of the case would admit of by Surgeon Chase, of the Thirteenth Ohio. He was a gallant man and an accomplished officer, and, though an enemy, the sight of his dying agonies "drew tears from the eyes of men unused to weep." The colonel's father and Gen. Benham were old acquaintances, (in fact, I believe, classmates at West Point,) and the interview between them was, of course, unusually painful. We did all we could for the unfortunate man, but human aid was vain, and he expired the same afternoon. We brought down the body on our return, and Gen. Benham intends forwarding it to his friends at once.

At twenty minutes past twelve our advance reached McCoy's Mills, and a sharp action at once ensued. The enemy's forces consisted of the cavalry engaged in the former skirmish, and at least one—I think two—regiments of infantry. They held their own against our skirmishers, and, having the advantage of ground, bid fair to give us considerable trouble and delay, for some time at least, in our pursuit of their main force.

Gen. Benham at once ordered the Seventh, under Col. Creighton, and half of the Thirty-seventh German, to take possession of a ridge on the right of the road. The advance, consisting of the Thirteenth, Col. Smith—who did the work as well as man could do it—occupied the left, and Captain Schneider's battery being brought to the extreme front, we prepared to dislodge them.

Col. Smith discovered a large body of cavalry in an exposed part of the hill, within fair range; and the gallant German, only too glad of a chance to let his barkers speak, took deliberate aim, and bang went the gun, whiz went the ball, and—away went the cavalry under cover. I rode by the side of the artillery and distinctly saw the shot strike among them. We now poured it in hot and heavy, and they scattered in all directions. All this time our troops on the right were firing whenever they had a fair chance, and constantly advancing. At or before this time a portion of the Thirteenth took up a position on their extreme left, threatening to get in their rear. The rebels, finding the climate becoming too warm for even their Southern constitutions, and the thermometer constantly rising, fled in disorder—dashing down through a cornfield, our men popping away at them in the most lively and pleasant manner. They did not seem to see the point of the joke: and, from what we saw afterward, it is my deliberate opinion that they are running yet—at least we never got within gunshot of them again. It is difficult to correctly estimate the loss of the enemy, as we were too much hurried to make search for them, but it could not have been less than fifteen killed and wounded—probably much more. We did not lose a man. This all sounds rather fishy, but they had no artillery, and all of our men within reach of their musketry were kept carefully under cover by their commanding officers—whose caution and skill cannot be too highly commended. From this point we had abundant evidence of the utter route and hasty flight of the enemy. They were badly scared, and though in the course of our march we passed positions which competent officers assured me were almost impregnable, they did not attempt to take advantage of one of them. Floyd was blind drunk the night he came through Fayette C. H., and I think has been in a state of chronic intoxication for some time; he certainly is much better adapted for pilfering than fighting, having not the least stomach for any thing in the shape of danger. All along the road we found flour, clothing, knapsacks, canteens, tents, &c., &c., scattered at short intervals. Now commenced our hardships. We had been much delayed by the action; and knowing that the Virginia chivalry are perfect race horses, in running from an enemy, however dilatory they may be when advancing on one, we hurried our movements as much as possible, hoping, if nothing else, to capture the wagon train, which was in the rear; but we fought against insurmountable difficulties. From the General down there never was a more gallant body of men. They struggled on mile after mile, through the most wretched apology for roads that the imagination ever conceived of. Some, worn out by fatigue, dropped down by the way, (all were picked up afterward,) but those who could by any possibility keep their feet struggled on. Colonel Smith I noticed particularly wading through the mire nearly knee-deep, having dismounted to give his horse to a sick captain, as jolly as if he were on four horses.

From information received from our guide, (who by the way is a rara avis in this country, a true-blue Virginia Unionist,) we thought we should overtake the wagon train at Three Mile Hill, seven miles from Raleigh. On reaching the Blake farm, one mile from the foot of the mountain, we sent forward mounted scouts, who returned with the disheartening news that the aforesaid vehicular conveyances, like the "hieland laddie" of musical notoriety, were "o'er the hills and far awa'." What could we do? Our men were used up; we had neither tents, provisions, ambulances, nor heavy artillery, (having been obliged to leave Schneider's pieces some distance behind,) and were deep in an enemy's country with a chance of our retreat being cut off if we advanced further. General Benham wisely resolved to proceed no further that night. We bivouacked in the open fields, and if I had loved Western Virginia before with all the ardent affection of one of her own gallant bushwhackers, that night would have turned my love to bitter hate. I strongly advise all who read this, and who may be afflicted with a mania for this part of a soldier's life, to do it on paper, for, take my word for it, "it don't pay, sir, nor can't be made to pay." That night at ten o'clock, the General received orders from General Schenck—who had crossed the river at Gauley, but none of whose reinforcements had as yet reached us—to return. We took up our line of march at two o'clock A. M., and reached this place at about one P. M., where both brigades are now stationed. This ends the campaign in Western Virginia. Floyd is driven clear out of the country, and swears he will never return. I admire his taste, though

I cannot say as much for his courage. And here, before closing, let me pay a well-merited tribute to the army which I had the honor to accompany.

General Benham's plans were laid with skill, and carried out with his usual promptness and energy. If the reinforcements which were promised had reached him in season, and permission had been granted him to advance upon Raleigh, I have no doubt that he would have succeeded in getting possession of the wagon train, if not capturing the entire force. There appears to be a disposition on the part of some of the military authorities here to tie General Benham's hands; but, in spite of all his disadvantages, he has done the fighting. He was put in the rear to guard the point where the enemy was not expected to be, but when the fight came, he was in the advance; and, tired as his troops were, he maintained his position till ordered back.

I have had occasion before to mention Colonel Smith, 13th Ohio, who led the advance. He performed his arduous duties untiringly; and to his skill, caution, and gallantry, the army owes much of its success. If all of our Brigadier-Generals were as well, or half as well qualified for the position, we would have fewer military blunders, and more successes to record. Colonel Smith is a West Pointer, and does credit to the institution at which he graduated, and the cause which he serves.

I have neither space nor time to mention others; how can I, when all deserve more praise than I can give them? It is a gallant army, this same fighting brigade of the Kanawha. God speed it, wherever it goes, and send it the good fortune it so richly merits.

I subjoin a detailed list of the force now under General Benham's command, as possibly of interest to some of your readers:

NEW YORK "WORLD" ACCOUNT.

GENERAL ROSECRANS' HEAD-QUARTERS, }
ON THE NEW RIVER, NEAR GAULEY, NOV. 21. }

Again Floyd has fallen back before our forces, and with the same fleetness and secrecy that characterized his previous retreat across the Gauley. He has been driven back, but otherwise the affair is not very creditable to our arms, as we should have bagged his force. Floyd's army is composed of good runners; his artillery is of light field-pieces, easily transported, and he is cumbered with no heavy baggage which would embarrass a quick march. Consequently he left nothing of importance behind, and we have gained, by the events of the last few days, only a present foothold where his batteries were stationed. I have no desire to underrate the value of merely gaining a deserted camp in an enemy's territory, but the result does not appear to have been as decisive as it might have been, had wise and prudent counsel, combined with vigorous action, prevailed.

The Great Kanawha and New rivers form less than a right angle in Fayette County, just at the junction of the Gauley. In this angle, and along the banks of both, Floyd had encamped his troops. On the opposite side, that is, the east side of New River, Gen. Rosecrans had his head-quarters. The supplies for our troops came from the Ohio River, along the north side of the Kanawha, by wagon route, crossing the Gauley. Previous to the time that Floyd was engaged in taking his position, Gen. Benham, who foresaw the movement, urged Gen. Rosecrans to change his position, alleging that by a timely and dextrous passage of the New River by a part of the forces at some distance below, they could surround, and capture, or cut to pieces Floyd's entire army; but that, if we kept our army in its present position, Floyd would soon be prepared to enforce a retiring of our lines from within range of his field-pieces on the opposite heights. Gen. Rosecrans deemed it a very ingenious but improbable theory. He had no apprehensions of an attack, situated as they then were. Consequently, no steps were taken to provide for such a contingency, other than those usual to a military force when near the enemy.

Gen. Benham, however, caused a road to be cut through from that place to a point on the next bend of the river, where he established camp McNeil, and stationed himself so as to be able to cross over in skiffs and attack Floyd's advance. Gen. Rosecrans, however, did not regard the plan with much favor, and declined to give Gen. Benham either orders for crossing, or skiffs, but mere permission to do so. Floyd, as Benham anticipated, finally did commence to shell Gen. Rosecrans' camp with his batteries, which were so distributed as to command both rivers from Loup Creek to a point below Gen. Benham's position. By this time, therefore, it was not only impossible to cross the New River, but no supplies could reach our camps through the fire that Floyd kept up along the wagon road, except in limited quantities, and in the night. Gen. Benham was therefore ordered to vacate his position and march up to Camp Huddleston, as far up the Kanawha as he was then down the New River. This was done, and here he was obliged to wait a week longer for orders to cross and attack the enemy. These orders were finally received, and Gen. Benham crossed the Kanawha and commenced the attack.

Floyd found himself hard pressed, and was obliged to fall back gradually from all his positions, except Cotton Hill, near the junction of the three rivers. Here he became rapidly hemmed in, until the night of the 12th, when he took advantage of the darkness to escape, and with so much adroitness that it was not immediately known. He was, however, followed to Fayetteville and thirty miles beyond, where one regiment was overtaken. Our brigade opened the action upon them with great spirit, and the rebels again fled in the greatest confusion. Only one officer attempted to turn them to the conflict. He displayed great courage in endeavoring to rally his retreating men, and attracted the admiration of our entire troops. While our bullets fell thick around them as we advanced at quick-step, he was in the very rear of his regiment cheering his men, and vainly trying to turn them to face us. They fled, but he refused to follow them, and fell in his place before we reached the ground. He was not immediately killed, but his wounds were fatal. He represented himself to Gen. Benham as Col. Croghan, son of a United States navy officer of Pennsylvania, who, in our last war with England, distinguished himself in the defence of a western post against the combined attack of a large force of British and Indians. General Benham conversed with him, received his last wishes, and placed him in care of the brigade surgeon, but he died on the evening of the 14th. The following letter, addressed to General Floyd, shows that General Benham has done all in his power to regard the last wishes of the brave but fatally mistaken man:

HEAD-QUARTERS FIRST PROV. BRIGADE, U. S. ) FORCES, Nov. 15, 1861, at Hawkins' )
Farm, Five miles S. E. of Fayetteville. )

Brig.-Gen. J. B. Floyd, C. S. A.:

SIR: In the skirmish which occurred yesterday between the United States forces under my command and your brigade, I regret to be obliged to inform you that Colonel St. George Croghan, commanding your cavalry regiment, as he stated to me, was mortally wounded. He was shot through the right wrist and side of the upper portion of the abdomen, the ball passing entirely through the body, and lived from half-past nine A. M., when he was wounded, till half-past two P. M.

I saw him in passing, a few minutes after he was wounded, and he recognized me, conversing freely, but with pain, and, shaking my hand on leaving him, he requested me to state that he "died the death of a brave soldier,"—as he did, in every way worthy of his gallant and noble father.

I left him in charge of my brigade and one other surgeon, with hospital attendants and a guard, and on my return this morning from my camp ground, the hospital steward handed me a small blank memorandum book, in which was a history made by his request, of which I enclose you a copy. He left his address, &c., with the chaplain of the Tenth (Col. Lytle's) Ohio regiment, Rev. H. E. O. Higgins, and told me that his family were residing in Newburgh, New York. I will endeavor to communicate with them as early as possible, and send each little memorial from him as I shall be able to collect them, for I yet cannot ascertain where most of his property has gone, as the people of the house where he died would not attend to it. I have sent his remains toward Fayetteville, where they will be interred, if we are not able to take them to Gauley; though I will, if possible, place the body there in a box with salt, to preserve it for his friends. It will be subject to the order of Gen. H. S. Rosecrans.

And now, having for the third time the opportunity of extending courtesies somewhat of this character to your officers—as first, in returning the baggage, uniform, &c., of Colonel Porterfield, at Philippi, and afterward, of preserving the sword, effects, and body of General Garnett at Carriek's Ford—I trust your officers will appreciate the desire thus exhibited of mitigating in every way the horrors of this fratricidal strife, as I think you yourself will do me the justice to believe that I most earnestly wish it.

I send this by a private citizen, as I thought you would prefer it to a flag of truce, and on account of the uncertainty of the means do not send forward any of the little memorials preserved.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. W. BENHAM,
Brigadier-General U. S. V.

Gen. Benham was within three miles of Floyd's army when the order came giving his command to Gen. Schenck, of Vienna renown, and the brigade was ordered back to a more retired position. His troops, who repose the greatest confidence in his prudence and energy, manifested great regret, but obeyed like soldiers. Gen. Benham resigned his command to Schenck, who immediately withdrew the brigade to a more retired position. Thus, for the present, we are again in statu quo. The soldiers here look upon Gen. Benham as the "coming man" of this war. He is a brusque, imperative, and rather overbearing man with his equals and superiors, but his rapidity of movement, fertility of resource, and consummate military capacity are recognized by the rank and file, with whom he is wonderfully popular.

A "SOLDIER'S" ACCOUNT.

A private in the Thirteenth regiment of Ohio Volunteers, Colonel Smith, gives the following account in the Cincinnati Commercial:

CAMP HUDDLESTON, THIRTEENTH REGIMENT O. V. I.,
Nov. 19, 1861. }

EDITORS COMMERCIAL: Knowing full well that the hearts of those at home are with those now fighting for the national welfare, and sacrificing their personal interests for the re-establishment of our shattered Government upon its once firm footing, I take this opportunity of informing your patriotic readers of the last hazardous expedition in this part of Western Virginia. This brigade, consisting of the Thirteenth, Twelfth, and Tenth Ohio regiments, under Brigadier-General Benham, crossed the

Kanawha at this point on the 6th of November, and remained five days at the mouth of Loup Creek, with but six tents per company, in accordance with orders, and one blanket per man. During our sojourn at this point, our force was joined by McMullen's battery, or, as it is more vulgarly termed, the "Ass Battery," and, together with the Seventh, Thirty-seventh, and Forty-fourth regiments O. V. I., our entire command amounted to about three thousand men. Thus equipped and organized, we set out on the march toward Fayette, over a district of the country characterized by lofty mountains and romantic streams, on the 12th of November. Every man was full of life, and eager for the pursuit of old Floyd and his force, numbering three thousand men and thirteen pieces of artillery, as was ascertained from reliable sources. The Thirteenth regiment had the advance position, and was preceded by Company A of the Thirteenth and Company H of the Twelfth, as skirmishers. Nothing transpired to vary the monotony of our rapid march and bold pursuit, until upon our arrival at Cotton Hill, where our progress was suddenly impeded by the sharp volleys of a detachment of the enemy, probably forming the rear guard of the arch-traitor. Too much praise cannot here be bestowed upon our skirmishers for their brave action in the face of an overwhelming force in ambush. Our loss was but one killed and two wounded, although our daring fellows pressed forward, regardless of their own lives, and with a strong determination to outflank and annihilate their opponents, but the bugle sounded the "assembly," and reluctantly our comrades returned to their regiments. Here we rested for the night in the woods, and every preparation was made for an attack on our part on the following day, but when daybreak occurred not a living being was in sight to oppose our advance. At this point, every indication was a proof of there having once been a large encampment of traitors, and from information gained our calculations as to their force were substantiated. November 13th was not marked by any change in our proposed plans. We moved forward through their strong intrenchments, having, however, halted at Camp Dickerson for a few hours, where our fun was of the nature of robbing hen-roosts and pig-sties of a secessionist, and justice must be given to us for such theft, for our hunger was great, and especially so was the fact in regard to our Dutch brethren, who ran short of subsistence. The intrenchments were of a most formidable character, and so situated as would have enabled them to withstand the assault of a large force, and had they possessed our spirit, havoc in our ranks would have been produced, and our plans doubtless frustrated. Their only excuse, however, is their unmitigated cowardice and bad consciences. Company F was now detailed as our skirmishing party, and after a halt upon the field three miles beyond the breast-works to rest our weary limbs for two hours under a single blanket, the command "Forward!" and onward we trudged, awake because of the prospect in view, and not in accordance with other feelings, and at midnight Fayette was reached. Here quietness reigned supreme—not even a dog-howl greeted us, and, in short, this deserted village presented inhospitality in all its phases. This village was the proposed winter-quarters of Floyd and horde, but our unwelcome approach produced an alteration in their plans. Any one who has experienced a night march can appreciate our feelings, when moving in silence over an unknown road, in expectation of meeting the enemy at any moment. The dull, heavy, and monotonous tread of the men, and the sound of the horse hoof on the hard road made the most self-possessed of us reflect upon what may be our fate, with no unconscious anxiety. Silence, in its majesty, produces thoughtfulness, but especially when a battle stares one in the face. The excitement of the encounter absorbs every reflection, and awakens a desire to push ahead or become victorious at least. Such, I doubt not, were the considerations of many of my comrades, and such is the weakness of human nature. War is an unavoidable necessity under present circumstances, and none but a brute loves to take the life of his fellow-man. Excuse this diversion from my subject, which will be read with more interest than an expansion on individual meditations. After half an hour, we passed through the village with an involuntary desire to reduce it to ashes, and continued on the road to Rolla, and here we began to discover evidences of the increased activity of the rebels' retreat. Wagons, ammunition, tents, &c., were strewn along the route, and ere long a halt till day-break was ordered. General, colonel, and private lay down together in sleep, and all military distinctions were subservient to the all-controlling desire to rest. Here the Seventh, Thirty-seventh, and Forty-fourth rejoined our forces, having preceded us up Loup Creek. It was only necessary to issue the order and soon we resumed the pursuit, in the same order as upon the previous evening. A drizzling rain soon commenced, and a "heavy" road was our lot, but the life and animation were unabated. About nine o'clock A. M., Company F surprised a detachment of the rebel cavalry under Col. Croghan, (formerly of the United States army,) and, in addition to killing the colonel and some men, captured horses, &c. Our success was complete, and consternation among them was the effect.

It would be injustice did I not mention the coolness and bravery of our skirmishing party, and their valuable services rendered. Colonel Smith has exhibited to his command his high military qualifications and excellent management in deploying his advance companies, and evinced his complete self-possession under the circumstances, which were calculated at the moment to convince us that a great engagement was about to take place, although the contrary was soon known. There is no commander in this valley who is esteemed more highly as a true soldier and gentleman, or one who is favored with more entire confidence of his command than the colonel of the Thirteenth regiment. His military education, experience in the army and elsewhere, in every respect make him worthy of a place among the highest if not most distinguished officers in our country, and the standing of the regiment, in comparison with others, as a well-disciplined and well-officered body of men, is the strongest proof of his capacity to lead and command. After reconnoitring the surrounding country and forming the regiment again in order, we moved forward, passing old encampments, &c., and admiring the many sights of the antiquated and novel-looking houses and churches; but upon our arrival at McCoy's Station a degree of activity was visible on all sides, which afforded us much pleasure, even in the midst of such a serious affair as a skirmish. When our advance parties were about to cross the bridge, they were visited with a few volleys of musketry, but after a few moments' delay Schneider's battery, under the supervision of Colonel Smith, was placed upon a high eminence, and while the Tenth regiment and part of the Thirteenth were secreted from view behind the brow of the hill, our cannon were brought into action and succeeded in making the rebels double-quick through a corn-field at a faster gait than is allowed by their companion vi et armis Hardee. The scene of this action is peculiarly adapted for carrying into effect their peculiar mode of warfare, being very mountainous, and covered with woods. The road defiles through a valley surrounded by the most abrupt sloping eminences, and winds around on the opposite side of the creek, one of the hills making sharp turns. We skirmished and scouted this section of the country perfectly, and to such a degree that the men and officers were worn out with fatigue, and gladly gave the advance position to the Tenth regiment, Capt. O'Dowd, with his company, acting as skirmishers. But after an advance still further of five miles, Gen. Benham thought proper to halt for the night, and, after making the necessary arrangements, as is customary on encamping, this body of troops sought sweet soothing sleep upon the hills and in the woods, lying on the ground, and getting drenched by the heavy rain falling. It was an awful night, and so trying upon our physical natures as will be ever remembered by those on this march. For prudent and just reasons, at three A. M. Nov. 15th, (following morning,) we commenced our retrograde march, wet, chilly, and with empty bellies. Upon our arrival again at Fayette, Capt. Mallory, with his accustomed pleasantry, procured houses for the major part of this command, and fed us upon plenty of good, substantial food of the ration kind. Here we were snowed upon, and never did men appreciate more highly a house and warm fires. The former luxury they have not enjoyed during their service in the army. The Court House was filled, and so jovial were the men, that they really neglected the more prudent course of going to sleep until late at night. They joined in the merry song, and cracked jokes over their cup of warm coffee and hard bread, as we are accustomed to witness at home, surrounded with all its comforts. Here, the thought of the great privation they had endured was overwhelmed by the joys of the moment, and this meagre show of comfort was great in their estimation. In short, all of us were well fed, warm, and happy. At Fayette we found encamped General Schenck and brigade, who, together with our own force, made this village quite a city, and presented a very lively appearance. At eight o'clock A. M. the next day, we resumed our homeward march, under command of our gallant Lieutenant-Colonel Hawkins, Colonel Smith having gone ahead to make arrangements for recrossing the Kanawha. The rumor was current amongst us that we were on our way to Camp Dennison to winter, and although we justly deserve just treatment, on account of our labors for the last six months, no substantial confirmation of the fact has as yet reached us. An exceedingly rapid march was made. We crossed the Kanawha about half-past four P. M., and now are again going through the daily routine of camp duties, but looking forward to the gladsome tidings from head-quarters.

The general character of the expedition was an adventurous pursuit of Floyd, meeting with great success, and worthy of all praise at the hands of those in power. The report is here, that the flight of Floyd is to be attributed to some cannon shots sent from Tompkins' farm, but our sharp skirmishing and the recently deserted encampments, together with the vast amount of clothing, tents, stores, etc., thrown out of the rebel wagons on the retreat, prove too conclusively that only an actual pursuit would have driven them from Gauley. Our officers in command acted with care and military discretion, and the men endured hardships. All that is now asked is credit for what was done. We are here to do our duty, but not, in the performance of it, to be slighted.

A SECESSION ACCOUNT.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Richmond Whig (Dec. 11) gives the following:

RICHMOND, December 10, 1861.

SIR: General Floyd's retreat from Cotton Hill, having been referred to by his friends as a proof of his masterly skill as a tactician, I invite your attention to the following letter, addressed by a reliable party to the Lynchburg Virginian, giving in brief the salient incidents of that retreat. On this letter the editor of the Virginian observes: "It gives, we doubt not, an honest and truthful, as well as detailed account of the most disgraceful rout that our armies have suffered during the war. This unfortunate affair eclipses all the rising fame of General Floyd and ends the ill-fated campaign in Western Virginia in a blaze of glory for the Yankees." Yet the Examiner designates General Floyd as the hero of thirty engagements. Well may General Floyd exclaim, "No more of that, Hal, an' thou lovest me."

LYNCHBURG "VIRGINIAN" NARRATIVE.

CAMP CANTONMENT VERINA, NOV. 29, 1861.

MR. EDITOR: Perhaps you have not had a correct detailed account of General Floyd's retreat from Cotton Hill, although you may have heard various accounts about it. I was at Meadow Bluff at the time of the retreat, but soon after left there, and joined the brigade here two days ago, and have carefully taken notes from accounts of the retreat furnished me by various officers. It is another dark shadow in the campaign of Western Virginia. It is an event that gives encouragement to and emboldens the enemy on all sides. I regret that it has to be related, but we must be honest, and give a correct account of failures as well as triumphs; though this is not the policy of the enemy, who never give a correct account of their defeats, but magnify them into victories. Our policy is truth, let the consequences be what they may.

On the evening of November 11, the enemy made strong demonstrations, near Cotton Hill, of an attack on the next day, and General Floyd ordered the army to fall back three miles, to Dickerson's encampment, where the fortifications were. Next morning it was reported that the enemy were advancing to Fayetteville, to cut off our retreat, and surround our brigade. This news caused General Floyd to order a retreat, which took place about eight o'clock at night, when the brigade retreated back to Fayetteville, two and a half miles, and halted to guard the road which the enemy were expected to come in to attempt to cut off our retreat. Here the brigade remained until just daylight, without shelter, victuals or repose, when they were ordered to continue their retreat. This was on the morning of the 13th, when the report that the enemy was marching to Fayetteville to cut off our retreat proved to be false, as the scouts returned and reported no enemy near. The brigade continued its retreat ten miles on the 13th, and halted at Camp McCoy for the night. During the whole of the retreat, thus far, there was a great deal of excitement, fear, and especially loss of baggage, property, and provisions and on the night of the 11th, they burned about three hundred tents, several bales of new blankets and overcoats, and a number of mess chests, camp equipage of all kinds, and flour barrels were burst, contents scattered on the ground, and all kinds of provisions wasted and scattered, all to prevent the enemy from getting them. Wagoners were compelled to take the horses from the wagons, mount them, and fly for safety, leaving about fifteen wagons in the hands of the enemy.

On the morning of the 14th, the brigade took up their march from Camp McCoy, and had gone but two miles when it was reported that the enemy were near and rushing on the brigade. At this the cavalry under command of Col. Croghan were ordered back to scout the country and ascertain the enemy's distance. When they had gone back two miles they met the enemy's pickets advancing, when Colonel Croghan ordered his men all to dismount, though he did not, when the pickets of the enemy fired on him, and he fell mortally wounded. His men took him up and carried him some two hundred yards to a house, when they discovered that the enemy—who were formed into a V, to flank our cavalry, and the signal to close in was the fire of the pickets in the road who had killed the colonel—were closing in, and the colonel told them to fly and save themselves, for he was dying. At the moment those who were with the colonel discovered that their horses had been taken by the Yankee pickets, who had rushed upon them, they turned and fled, and the whole cavalry came within five minutes of being all cut off and captured.

The cavalry then all swept on in abreast until they came up with the rear of our infantry, and proclaimed that the enemy were pursuing in double-quick time. Then appeared a scene in our army indescribable, and of terrific confusion. At the word, "the enemy are pursuing," all broke off in a wild run, some so frightened that they threw away their knapsacks and all they had, but gun and knife to defend themselves with. It required great effort upon the part of the officers, who were somewhat cool, to prevent a perfect rout. The enemy seemed to have the advantage, and pursued faster than our men could retreat, and came upon them even with the cannon, and fired six shot upon the rear of the brigade. The road was so bad and muddy, that the brigade could not march more than eight miles a day. There had been so much rain and wagoning along the road that it was a perfect mire, about half a leg deep, and all had to wade right through it.

After this day the brigade continued its retreat on toward Pack's Ferry, but with a great deal of toil and difficulty, and finally encamped here on the 24th of November. This encampment is near Peterstown, in the south edge of Monroe County, and it is expected that the brigade will winter near here.

FAST DAY IN THE SOUTH.

NOVEMBER 15, 1861, was observed by the rebels as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer. The following is Jeff. Davis' proclamation:

BY THE PRESIDENT—A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas it hath pleased Almighty God, the Sovereign Disposer of events, to protect and defend the Confederate States hitherto, in their conflict with their enemies, and to be unto them a shield:

And, whereas with grateful thanks we recognize His hand, and acknowledge that not unto us, but unto Him, belongeth the victory; and in humble dependence upon His Almighty strength, and trusting in the justness of our cause, we appeal to Him, that He may set at naught the efforts of our enemies, and put them to confusion and shame;

Now, therefore, I, Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederate States, in view of the impending conflict, do hereby set apart Friday, the 15th day of November, as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer; and I do hereby invite the Reverend Clergy and people of these Confederate States to repair on that day to their usual places of public worship, and to implore the blessing of Almighty God upon our arms, that He may give us victory over our enemies, preserve our homes and altars from pollution, and secure to us the restoration of peace and prosperity.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

THE CONFEDERATE FORM OF PRAYER.

The following is the form of prayer read in all the various churches and denominations throughout the Confederate States on the Fast Day, November 15. In the Jewish Synagogues the name of Christ was omitted:

"Almighty God, the Sovereign Disposer of events, it hath pleased Thee to protect and defend the Confederate States hitherto in their conflict with their enemies, and be unto them a shield.

"With grateful thanks we recognize Thy hand, and acknowledge that not unto us, but unto Thee, belongeth the victory; and in humble dependence upon Thy Almighty strength, and trusting in the justness of our cause, we appeal to thee that it may please Thee to set at naught the efforts of all our enemies, and put them to confusion and shame.

"O, Almighty God, we pray Thee that it may please Thee to grant us Thy blessing upon our arms, and give us victory over all our enemies, wherever they may be.

"Preserve our homes and altars from pollution, and secure to us the restoration of peace and prosperity; all of which we ask in the name of Jesus Christ, our Blessed Lord and Saviour, to whom, with Thee, the Father and the Holy Spirit, we will give all the praise and glory in time and throughout all eternity. Amen and Amen."

CAPTURE OF A SECESSION FLAG,
AT MANCHESTER, MO., NOV. 15, 1861.

THE following is an account of the capture,
as given by the Missouri Republican :

CAMP HERRON, Mo., }
NINTH REG'T IOWA VOL'S., Nov. 18, 1861. }

The commander of this post, having learned that a certain very fine secession flag that had waved defiantly from a flagstaff in the village of Manchester, twenty miles distant from this place, until the successes of the Union forces caused its supporters to conclude that, for the present, "discretion would be the better part of valor," was still being very carefully preserved, its possessors boasting that they would soon be enabled to rehoist it, determined upon its capture.

On the 15th inst., he directed First Lieutenant H. C. Bull, of Company C, of this regiment, to take charge of the expedition, and to detail fifteen good men for the purpose, which detail the lieutenant made from Company C.

They left camp by the cars at half-past five P. M., landing at Merrimac, three miles from Manchester, proceeding from thence to Manchester on foot, and surrounded the house of Esquire B., who had been foremost in the secession movement of that strong secession town, and was reported to be in possession of the flag.

The Esquire protested against the imputation, declaring that the flag was not in his possession, and that he knew not of its whereabouts. His lady acknowledged that she had for a time kept it secreted in a box in the garden, but as it was likely to become injured, she took it out, dried it in the sun, when it was taken away by some ladies, who lived a long distance in the country, whose names she refused to give. Finally, after a thorough but fruitless search of the house after the lieutenant had placed her husband under arrest, and he was being started for head-quarters, the lady, probably hoping to save her husband, acknowledged that it was taken by a Mrs. S., who resided a mile and a half in the country, not such a terrible long distance, after all. Her husband was then sent to Merrimac, escorted by four soldiers, and the remainder, conducted by the gallant lieutenant, started to visit the residence of Mrs. S., in search of the flag. The distance to the lady's residence was soon travelled, the house surrounded, and the flag demanded of Mrs. S., who proved to be a very intelligent lady, and was surrounded by a very interesting family. The lady replied to the demand that she would like to see the person that stated that she took the flag from Esquire B.'s; that as to its whereabouts she had nothing to say; that the lieutenant could search her house, and if he could find any thing that looked like a flag, he was welcome to it. Accordingly, a thorough search was made, in which the lady and her daughter aided, but no flag was to be found. The lady then thanked the officer for the gentlemanly manner in which the search had been conducted, and added that she trusted he was satisfied. He replied he was quite certain that she had the flag, and that it would have been far better for her to have yielded it; but as she did not, as unpleasant as the task was, he should arrest her and take her to head-quarters at Pacific City. Two men were then despatched for a carriage with which to convey the lady to Merrimac, and from thence the lady was informed that she would be sent by railroad. She accordingly made preparations to go, but after about an hour had elapsed in waiting for the carriage, the lady again demanded the name of the informants, and when told that it was Mrs. B., and that Esquire B. was already under arrest, she then asked whether any indignity would have been offered to her had the flag been found in her possession, to which the courteous lieutenant replied, "Certainly not, madam; our object with Esquire B. was his arrest, and the capture of the flag; but with you, our object was the flag."

"Will you pledge your honor," said she, "that if I surrender the flag I shall not be arrested, nor my family disturbed?" When replied to in the affirmative, she added, "I wish you to understand, sir, that no fear of arrest or trouble would ever have made me surrender that flag; but Esquire B.'s family induced me to take that flag to save their family from trouble, saying that it should be a sacred trust, known only to ourselves, and I, consequently, surrender it."

She then went to a bed that had been fruitlessly searched, took from it a quilt, and with the aid of her daughters proceeded to open the edges of the quilt, and cut the stitches through the body of it, and pulled off the top, when behold! there lay the mammoth flag next to the cotton, being carefully stretched twice and nearly a half across the quilt. When taken out and spread, it proved to be a magnificent flag, over twenty-one feet in length, and nearly nine feet in width, with fifteen stars to represent the prospective Southern Confederacy.

"Recollect," said the lady to Lieut. Bull, "that you did not find it yourself, and when you wish detectives you had better employ ladies." She also added, that she gave up the flag unwillingly. The daughter remarked that she had slept under it, and that she loved it, and that fifteen stars were not so terribly disunion, in her estimation, after all.

The flag is now in possession of Col. Vandever, who remarked that it excelled any of the rebel flags that he saw at the battle of Bull Run or Manassas. Esquire B. is in custody, awaiting his trial.

THE CAPTURE OF THE MABEL.

COMMODORE DUPONT'S REPORT.

THE following official report from Commodore Dupont describes the capture of the British schooner Mabel:

FLAG-SHIP WARASH, }
PORT ROYAL HARBOR, November 18, 1861. }

SIR: I have the honor to report that Commander E. M. Yard, of the United States steamer Dale, captured the British schooner Mabel, on the evening of the 15th instant, in lat. 31 deg. 10 min., and lon. 80 deg. 52 min. 30 sec. west, and brought her into this harbor.

She purported to be from Havana and bound for New York, but at the time of her capture was heading for St. Catherine's Sound.

Her cargo consists of seven bales blankets, four cases cloth, two cases saddles and bridles, three boxes starch, twenty-five boxes tin, one hundred and twenty boxes coffee, twenty barrels potatoes, three hundred and fifty pigs of lead, thirty bags of shot, one box shoes, six bags arrow root, one case pistols, (revolvers,) and two cases of cavalry swords.

The Mabel was formerly named the John W. Anderson, of Baltimore, as appears by the certificate of registry given at Nassau, N. P., found among his papers. She had no clearance from the port of Havana.

The character of her cargo—part of it contraband—and her position as above given, seem to be strong presumptive evidence of her intention to run the blockade. I have therefore sent her to Philadelphia in charge of Master's Mate Levi Lane, of the United States steamer Dale, and seven men of that ship, for adjudication.

I have the honor to be, sir, respectfully your obedient servant,

S. F. DUPONT,
Flag-officer Commanding South Atlantic Blockading Squadron.

HON. GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

EXTORTIONERS AND THE REMEDY.

THE Vicksburg (Miss.) Sun of Nov. 16, contains the following on this subject:

We have been much flattered by the encomiums of many of our oldest citizens who have called upon us, and who have most cordially approved our leader of yesterday. We propose to state one or two new facts that have recently come to our knowledge, and to propose what we conceive to be a remedy against the Lincolnite extortioners of Vicksburg.

We are informed that large quantities of flour are stored in this city, and that the holders say they will not sell until they can get twenty dollars per barrel. Comment on these fellows' principles is unnecessary. Desperate measures require desperate remedies, and we hope that the flour will be taken, the men paid a fair market valuation for it, and receive a strong hint to "leave the country for their country's good." Other extortioners, whose names are furnished us, and which we shall probably publish for the scorn and execration of the community, have held the staple articles of provisions until they have risen several hundred per cent., and now the "patriots" are fattening upon what they stole from the families of the soldier. Their names always appear conspicuously in the list of donations, but they "give an inch and take an ell."

One of two things must be done, and that done immediately. Either the extortions must be put an end to by legislative enactment, or the people must rise and put an end to the extortions.

A prominent citizen of Vicksburg has suggested to us that the dealers in all staple articles which have heretofore only required a small profit, be compelled by legislative enactment to submit, under oath, to an officer appointed by the Government, their invoices, with charges, and thirty-three and one-third per cent. allowed, at which price they shall be compelled, under an onerous penalty, to sell their goods. Of course, there are many articles which would not be profitable to sell at this rate, but we would have the Government to judge what profit should be exacted, and if any of these domestic enemies shall attempt to get more, let him be submitted to heavy fine and imprisonment.

We hope that our citizens will take a decided and energetic stand in this matter. They know as well as we do who are the offending parties, and we hope, within the next twenty-four hours, to hear of a call for a meeting of citizens, exclusive of all provision dealers, to devise means to suppress this evil. All provision dealers should be excluded, as no partiality should be shown, but the whole tribe should be placed under ban until the worse than Yankee marauders in our midst are cast out from among us.

We ardently hope to see prompt and decisive action taken in this matter by our Legislature, and if that ponderous body move slow, let our citizens redress their own wrong. Verb. sat. sap.

Public opinion is fast settling down throughout the South upon the question mooted by the Sun. Some remedy will be devised for the evil complained of so justly.

The Oxford (Miss.) Intelligencer says: It is highly probable that the Legislature will, in a few days, pass a law touching the heartless speculators in salt throughout our State. We would like to see the State seal put upon the door of every salt speculator in the land, and an agent put at every door to sell the article at a fair price. Dealers here are demanding twelve dollars and fifty cents per sack.

BUCKINGHAM'S APPEAL.

HEAD-QUARTERS OHIO MILITIA, ADJ'T-GEN'S OFFICE, }
COLUMBUS, November 16. }To the County Military Committees:

The time has come when the army of Ohio must be completed. Our gallant navy, which has never yet disappointed the nation, has established a base of operations upon the shores of South Carolina. Another will be established on the gulf. Loyal men of Eastern Tennessee invite us to the heart of the rebel confederacy. The Union men of the South are throwing off the fetters of a tyranny which bound them. North Carolina having yielded to force, is anxious to return to her allegiance. Friends everywhere will welcome those who come as their deliverers from despotism. The day of terrorism is drawing to a close, and the movement of revulsion has commenced. It needs but the vigorous prosecution of movements already inaugurated to bring it to a happy conclusion, and all the signs promise a brighter to-morrow.

Now is the time to strike. The deliverance of the nation rests with the people. In this day, Ohio must do nobly her part. She has already done much, but much more she is able to do. To the great Northwest belongs the work of opening the Mississippi. The river is ours, and we need it. No longer should rebel batteries be allowed to cut us off from direct communication with the ocean. Our honor and interest alike urge us to the effort. The warm sun of the South invites us to a winter campaign. Kentucky, and a large portion of Tennessee, will join us in the march. Union men will hail with delight their deliverance from the pressure of an intolerable despotism, and if we are true to ourselves and them, the spring will open upon a reunited people.

Ten days more can be allowed for the completion of regiments now forming in camps. Within that time much may be done, and by the 25th of November, Ohio contribute, at least, thirty-five thousand more of her soldiers to the grand column en route for Nashville and New Orleans.

To the accomplishment of this great object, the instant, earnest, and combined efforts of officers, committees, and patriotic citizens, are most urgently invoked. Companies are now more valuable than regiments will be in the spring, if the rebellion is allowed to survive the winter. Now, when the rebel confederacy seems to be staggering, is the time to strike, and the blows being vigorously followed up, the victory will be ours, and the stars upon our banner once more represent a united nation.

C. P. BUCKINGHAM,
Adjutant-General, Ohio.

GENERAL PATTERSON'S DEFENCE.

THE First Troop of Philadelphia (Pa.) City Cavalry dined together on Saturday, November 16th, at the Continental Hotel, to commemorate their foundation in 1775. Captain James presided, and Dr. Goddard, as Surgeon of the Troop, acted as vice-president. Among the guests were Major-Generals Patterson and Cadwalader. The dinner was altogether a delightful one. When the cloth was removed, the health of Major-General Patterson was proposed by Lieutenant A. K. Arnold, attached to the United States Cavalry, who was with the General during the whole campaign on the Potomac, and in response to an enthusiastic call, he made a speech. He returned thanks for the compliment paid him, and for the manner in which it had been received. He said that he was not in the habit of giving reasons for any thing he did or did not do, but in the presence of men of so much intelligence as the members of the First City Troop, a part of his command in the short campaign in the valley of Virginia, he considered it due to them as well as to himself to give a short statement of facts.

During the latter part of July, all August, and part of September, there was no slander against him so gross that it could not be asserted and reiterated with impunity and swallowed with avidity. The gentlemen of the Troop knew how false these slanders were. He had submitted to them in quiet, although he had the documents in his possession to prove that he did all that he was ordered to do, and more than any one had a right to expect under the circumstances in which he and his command were placed, and he defied any man, high or low, to put his finger on an order disobeyed.

The gentlemen of the Troop were witnesses of what was done, and he asserted what they knew to be true, that the column was well conducted. There was not a false step made, nor a blunder committed. The skirmishers were always in front, and the flanks well protected. They were caught in no trap, and fell into no ambuscade. They repeatedly offered the enemy battle, and when they accepted it they beat them. There was no defeat and no retreat with his column.

It might be asked, "Why have you not made this statement sooner?" Because the publication of the documents sooner would have been most detrimental to the public interests. He preferred bearing the odium so liberally bestowed on him, rather than clear himself at the expense of the cause in which we were all engaged. The time had arrived when the matter could, without injury to the service, be inquired into; and he was determined that it should be done, and that before long all the documents referred to should be published and spread before the American people, unless those whose duty it was to do so should in the mean time do him justice.

He would state a few facts. On the 3d of June he took command at Chambersburg. On the 4th he was informed by the General-in-Chief that he considered the addition to his force of a battery of artillery and some regular infantry indispensable. On the 8th of June, a letter of instructions was sent him, in which he was told that there must be no reverse; a check or a drawn battle would be a victory to the enemy, filling his heart with joy, his ranks with men, and his magazines with voluntary contributions; and, therefore, to take his measures circumspectly, and attempt nothing without a clear prospect of success. This was good instruction and most sensible advice. Good or bad, he was to obey; and he did.

On Friday, the 13th, he was informed that, on the supposition that he would cross the river on the next Monday or Tuesday, Gen McDowell would be instructed to make a demonstration on Manassas Junction. He was surprised at the order, but promptly obeyed. On the 15th he reached Hagerstown, and, on the 16th, two-thirds of his forces had crossed the Potomac. The promised demonstration by Gen. McDowell, in the direction of Manassas Junction, was not made; and on the 16th, just three days after he had been told he was expected to cross, he was telegraphed by the General-in-Chief to send him "at once all the regular troops, horse and foot, and the Rhode Island Regiment and Battery," and told that he was strong enough without the regulars, and to keep within limits until he could satisfy him that he ought to go beyond them. On the 17th he was again telegraphed, "We are pressed here. Send the troops I have twice called for, without delay." This was imperative, and the troops were sent, leaving him without a single piece of artillery, and for the time, a single troop of cavalry. It was a gloomy night, but they were all brought over the river again without loss.

On the 20th of June he was asked by the General-in-Chief to propose, without delay, a plan of operations. On the 21st he submitted to the General-in-Chief his plan, which was to abandon the present line of operations, move all supplies to Frederick, occupy Maryland Heights with Major Doubleday's heavy guns, and a brigade of infantry to support them, and with every thing else—horse, foot and artillery—to cross the Potomac at Point of Rocks, and unite with Colonel Stone's force at Leesburg, from which point he could operate as circumstances should demand, and as the General's orders should require. No reply was received; but on the 27th, the General telegraphed him that he supposed he was that day crossing the river in pursuit of the enemy.

On that day the enemy was in condition to cross the river in his pursuit. He had over fifteen thousand men and from twenty to twenty-four guns. General Patterson had about ten thousand men and six guns, the latter immovable for want of harness. On the 28th he informed the General of the strength of the enemy, and of his own force; that he would not, on his own responsibility, attack without artillery, but would do so cheerfully and promptly, if he would give him an explicit order to that effect. No order was given. On the 29th he received the harness for his single battery of six smooth-bore guns, and on the 30th gave the order to cross. On the 2d of July he crossed, met the enemy, and whipped them.

On the 9th of July a council was held, at which all the commanders of divisions and brigades, and chiefs of staff, were present. Col. Stone, the junior line officer, spoke twice and decidedly against an advance, advocating a direct movement to Sheppardstown and Charlestown. All who spoke opposed an advance, and all voted against one. On the same day, he informed the General-in-Chief of the condition of affairs in the valley, and proposed that he should go to Charlestown and occupy Harper's Ferry, and asked to be informed when he would attack Manassas. On the 12th he was directed to go where he had proposed, and informed that Manassas would be attacked on Tuesday, the 16th. On the 13th he was telegraphed: "If not strong enough to beat the enemy early next week, make demonstrations so as to detain him in the valley of Winchester." He made the demonstrations, and on the 16th, the day General Scott said he would attack Manassas, he drove the enemy's pickets into his intrenchments at Winchester, and on the 17th marched to Charleston.

On the 13th he telegraphed the General-in-Chief that Johnston was in a position to have his strength doubled just as he could reach him, and that he would rather lose the chance of accomplishing something brilliant than by hazarding his column, to destroy the fruits of the campaign by defeat, closing his telegram thus: "If wrong, let me be instructed." But no instructions came. This was eight days before the battle of Manassas. On the 17th, General Scott telegraphed: "McDowell's first day's work has driven the enemy beyond Fairfax Court House. To-morrow the Junction will probably be carried." With this information he was happy. Johnston had been detained the appointed time, and the work of General Patterson's column had been done.

On the 18th, at half-past one in the morning, he telegraphed General Scott the condition of the enemy's force and of his own, referring to his letter of the 16th for full information, and closed the despatch by asking, "Shall I attack?" This was plain English, and could not be misunderstood, but he received no reply. He expected to be attacked where he was, and if Manassas was not to be attacked on that day, as stated in General Scott's despatch of the day previous, he ought to have been ordered down forthwith to join in the battle, and the attack delayed until he came. He could have been there on the day the battle was fought, and his assistance might have produced a different result.

On the 20th he heard that Johnston had marched with thirty-five thousand Confederate troops, and a large artillery force, in a southeasterly direction. He immediately telegraphed the information to General Scott, and knew that he received it the same day. In accordance with instructions he came to Harper's Ferry on the 21st, which place he held until relieved.

General Patterson, during the course of his remarks, was repeatedly applauded, and closed amid repeated cheers.

RETREAT OF THE WILD CAT BRIGADE.

A CORRESPONDENT gives the following minute account of this affair:

Crab Orchard, Ky., Sunday, November 17.

My last letter was written from Camp Coburn, near Crab Orchard. The Wildcat Brigade, or sorrowful fragments of it, had but just staggered into camp after its disastrous retreat from London, and its tattered remains were still straggling up the rugged road miles in the rear, animated by hope of finally reaching a haven of rest. As that wretched struggle with the elements, over execrable roads, will be remembered by five thousand abused volunteers as long as they retain their faculty of memory, it deserves description.

You will remember that Wednesday afternoon, November 13th, General Schoepf issued an order requiring all the troops to be ready to march at eight o'clock that evening. Commanders of corps were directed to carry with them all their sick, leaving such baggage and stores as could not be transported. Previously there had been rumors of an advance, and when the order to prepare to move was issued to the troops, it was received with exultation. The Tennesseans were especially delighted, and prepared with alacrity to return to their firesides. It had been currently reported that letters had been received by prominent Tennesseans, from friends at Louisville and Washington, assuring them that the Cumberland Gap expedition would soon be pushed to an issue. This order, therefore, confirmed the report; and I am told that Hon. Andy Johnson, General Carter, Colonel Byrd, Colonel Spears, and others, were elated at the prospect of an immediate fruition of their hopes. They did not seem to comprehend that the order concerning the sick implied a retrograde movement. But when informed of the fact, they were overwhelmed with sorrow and indignation. Mr. Johnson turned from his informant, and entered his hotel without one word, in utter despair.

The information was withheld from the troops until they were moving, when the fact flashed upon them, and they denounced it with the vehemence of disappointed soldiers. Many of the Tennesseans displayed a strong mutinous spirit. Some swore they would not recede a foot of the ground which had been conquered; others expressed determination to desert and return to Tennessee at all hazards, and many wept with vexation and despair. Their officers appealed earnestly to their patriotism, announcing to them that General Thomas had ordered them to countermarch in order to meet the rebels, who were reported moving toward Crab Orchard in strong force to cut them off, and that a retrograde movement was necessary to save the expedition. It was also stated by officers of various regiments, that Zollicoffer was reported marching up from Tennessee with a strong column, to form a junction with Buckner, to penetrate the Blue Grass country. Such were the facts and statements prior to the hour of marching. The subsequent facts will appear in the following diary:

LONDON, KY., Wednesday, November 13.

Long before eight o'clock P. M., most of the troops of the Wildcat Brigade, with three days' rations in their haversacks, were prepared to march. The sick who could be removed—and there were many too feeble to walk, yet able to ride—were transferred to those wretched instruments of torture to the ill or the healthful—two-wheeled ambulances—and to common army-wagons, some of which were uncovered, thus exposing suffering men to the raw night air. But many poor bed-ridden fellows who were necessarily left, remained confined to the hospitals, a prey to harrowing apprehensions of captivity. Of course surgeons and guards were detailed to minister to their wants and protect them until they should be removed. But how many men were closely packed in ambulances and wagons, I could not learn. Colonel Steedman would not leave any, and had over one hundred stowed away as comfortably as possible. The surgeon of the Twenty-third Indiana, horrified at the order, protested vehemently; but he was informed decisively, the order from head-quarters is that all the sick must be removed, and orders must be obeyed. He still protested that removal would certainly result in the death of some of his patients, and he was told to quarter them with private families at London. But the Thirty-third Indiana brought away one hundred and eighty-nine sick. I did not inquire how many were removed by other regiments, but the number was large. Besides many feeble fellows just discharged from hospital, but yet unfit for duty, shouldered their muskets and donned their heavy knapsacks, preferring the cruelties of a forced march to the hazards of captivity.

The Fourteenth Ohio had the right of the column. Shortly before eight o'clock, it marched solemnly by the camp of the Seventeenth Ohio, its band mournfully playing the Dead March—thus expressing the emotions of the troops. It was followed by Standart's and Kenney's batteries, with the baggage trains of each of the foregoing corps. The Seventeenth Ohio fell in their rear, and its sarcastic lads, keenly appreciating the occasion, burst into a satirical paraphrase of their favorite regimental ditty, one strain of which runs somewhat thus:

"Old Zollicoffer can't take us,
Can't take us, can't take us,
On a long summer's day."

It was impromptu at the Wildcat fight, so was the song as they retreated:

"Old Zollicoffer can't catch us,
Can't catch us, can't catch us,
'Cause we're running away."

More forcible than elegant, and more expressive than poetical.

And so each regiment, followed by its baggage train and sad procession of invalids, moved up the road melancholy and mad. Most of the Tennesseans had fallen in behind the Fourteenth Ohio, and moved on sullen and sorrowful, bitterly expressing their disappointment, and denouncing the frauds with which they had been deluded. Some were imbued with the idea that they were to march up the Somerset Road—about three miles above London—to meet the enemy, and agreed to go that far but not beyond. Upon reaching that point, the head of the column failed to halt. A few Tennesseans madly broke from the ranks and moved back to camp. Several threw themselves sullenly on the ground, and refused to march. As we moved onward they continued to leave the ranks in pairs and squads. Then squads multiplied into sections, sections into platoons, and platoons almost into whole companies. A private came back from the front, and appealed to an officer to stop the deserters. He said the regiment was disorganized—the men were going back to Tennessee; their officers could do nothing with them. The poor fellows, with despairing exceptions, continued to proclaim their loyalty, but could not stand the disappointment. Occasionally a stout-hearted fellow would proclaim his determination to follow the flag wherever orders carried him; "but it is hard on Tennesseans, boys," he would say to the Buck-eyes.

In a march of four miles we must have passed two hundred stragglers. Some were lying prone on the ground, sobbing; some stood by the highway swearing defiantly; others leaned against the fence sullenly, undetermined whether to move one way or the other. Here was the adjutant of the regiment addressing a squad, "For God's sake, boys, move on. Look at the Ohioans. Don't let them beat you. You are fighting for the Union. Let's keep Tennesseans together. Come, boys." "Well, adjutant," said one, "it will do for you who ride to talk; but we, who do nothing but march up and down this infernal road, don't appreciate it. 'Get on my horse, and I'll walk,'" said the adjutant, and the transfer was made. And so the column trudged onward heavily, and halted for jaded teams to dislodge a wagon from the mire, or pushed ahead, leaving vehicles to be extricated by whosoever would do it. At midnight there was a long line of straggling

Tennesseans from the head of their column clean back to their camp. It was marked by the lurid hue of the atmosphere, illumined by their blazing bivouac fires in the forests, around which they huddled in shivering groups. Hardly a nucleus for the regiment was left in column, though many stout fellows pushed on, determined to follow where orders commanded. But these were pitiful scenes, and heart-touching.

Soon after midnight, the Fourteenth Ohio and the artillery men, after scaling Wildcat Heights, flung themselves headlong on the ground. None were covered that night—or morning—save by blankets and a veneering of cold, white frost. The sick, too, in the open wagons, lay shuddering and shivering, and moaning in the sharp, cutting atmosphere of a November morning. The Seventeenth Ohio halted and bivouacked, at two o'clock, in the camp which Zollicoffer's rebels had occupied the night before their repulse. I have told you where the Tennesseans were, but I know not where was the remainder of the brigade. The Kentucky Third, (Gerrard's,) I believe, did not move that night. I know not why. The Thirty-eighth Ohio and the Thirty-third Indiana pushed forward to the summit of Wildcat, and halted, not long before day. The teams were also moving all night long.

The necessity to carry the sick obliged us to leave much stores and ammunition. I am told we left twenty-two tons of ammunition at London. And yet, readers, we were making a forced march to prevent the enemy from cutting us off, or to save Blue Grass.

Strange that soldiers should leave their ammunition and march to meet the enemy. At Pitman's we met thirteen wagons loaded with commissary stores en route from Camp Dick Robinson for London. These were unloaded immediately, and proceeded to London for patients and stores. Some of the regiments had necessarily left their tents and camp equipage, so that even had fatigue permitted them to pitch tents, they could not have enjoyed the luxury.

November 14.—A heavy storm of rain roused the bivouackers from sleep. Their blankets and clothing were saturated with water. The morning was most dismal. Wildcat Heights, crowned with a heavy coronal of mist, frowned in dreary and discouraging altitude before us. The roads were already worked into a tough muck, the pathway on the edges where the troops walked, were slimy and slippery. Beyond was Rockcastle River, swift and reported unfordable. But the word was en avant. The lads partook of their cold rations and hot coffee, and took up the toilsome march. Every step was laborious to the sturdy, agonizing to the feeble. Knapsacks almost too heavy under fairest auspices, were now doubly burthensome, and the pack-horse load was increased by the aggravating weight of water which soaked blankets and heavy army overcoats, and the nasty slime which splashed and plastered each man's breeches as high as his knees in front and rear, and filled his shoes until they overflowed with slush.

During the first mile we passed one baggage-wagon, capsized in a creek. Its load of commissary stores and baggage was lost. The desolate teamster and jaded horses, bedaubed with mud, gazed at it dismally and hopelessly as we moved forward. Farther up the hill a half-dozen wagons were stuck, and the poor animals could not move them. A few hundred yards further, barrels of bread were tossed out of wagons and left to destruction in the forests. A stranger to the facts, passing now, would have said, Here is a terrified army fleeing from a pursuing enemy.

Going up the mountain, we pass Tennesseans; some are still pushing on desperately. Yonder is one prone on a bed of wet forest-leaves; his head is bolstered on a rotten stump. Exhaustion is graphically pictured on his livid complexion and in his silent form. He is unconscious while he sleeps the sleep of distress, that the driving rain is beating mercilessly upon him. My comrade startles me—"Is he dead?" Oh, no; he's only an exhausted soldier! He wears no shoulder straps, with a silver star on each. But it is yet early in the day; surely it is not time for soldiers to yield to fatigue. They have marched only one night, and have slept the whole of one or two hours on the damp, frosted soil.

At last the ascent is accomplished by a few. We look back with a sigh of relief, and turn away again with emotions of regret and disgust at the sorrowful and weary file of men, still toiling through the mire, and gazing wistfully to the top. But here is a picture. On the top of a rock on the crest of the hill, there sits a Toledo lad, writing a letter. He protects the precious page from the rain with his hat, and the big drops patter on his bare head. He looks careworn and wayworn; but his eye is bright, his hand steady. From head to foot, he is incased in a thick plastering of clay, and moisture drips from his sleeves. He replies to my comrade, "No, colonel, I've not given out; I'm a little tired though. I'll make it, colonel; I'll never give up."

Why in the name of humanity does not the commander send back messengers to halt this column? Is there imminent danger ahead? Cannot these failing men be halted a day for rest? At least let messengers be despatched from head-quarters to inspire them to march, march, to resist the foe. Any thing to renew their spirit. But look at these wagon loads of sick soldiers. See them shivering in saturated blankets, seated in pools of water which drip from their clothing as it pours from the clouds. Hear their unceasing, discordant, and harrowing chorus of coughing. Here are candidates for the grave. But the order is stern—"Bring all your sick." "Oh," said one of the surgeons to me, "that was the cruelest order officer ever gave. I protested in vain. I urged that it would kill my patients. But come they must. I shall lose perhaps thirty or forty of my regiment, and it will plant consumption in the lungs of two hundred more."

And here is another picture. We splash along tediously through the mire, and mounted officers encourage their men by kind words of sympathy. Nearly all relieve feeble soldiers by carrying their knapsacks and muskets. Colonel Steedman, long racked with chills and fever, and scarce able to sit his horse, rides with his scattered columns. Colonel Connell, suffering from illness, bears the burthen of a sick soldier's knapsack. Colonel Coburn dismounts, and pushes through the mud, while a feeble lad rides his charger. The captains, on foot, emulate their superiors, and encourage them by example.

At Rockcastle River, the column is victoriously over Wildcat. The dismal train halts at the ferry, in the mud and rain. The jaded men full asleep on the sod of a neighboring meadow, waiting the slow process of crossing all that column in one small float. The teamsters stuff their worn-out animals with corn. A few, in desperation, plunge into the ford where the water is swift, and some narrowly escape a watery grave. The Fourteenth Ohio loses two wagons and contents, including twenty-three or thirty thousand rounds of ammunition. The Seventeenth loses a wagon and twenty-six thousand rounds of ammunition at the ferry. The Tennesseans lose two wagons and contents, with three horses, and the Thirty-eighth Ohio loses one wagon. How much more was lost I do not know.

This was morning, but the column was long after night in crossing. Afterward, throughout the day, the scenes already feebly described increased and assumed more aggravating forms. The road constantly became more wretched. Men flung away their knapsacks and stalked onward in utter desperation, their officers refusing to see insubordination. Some stumbled and fell by the wayside, where they lay and slept the sleep of exhaustion, and the sick in the uncovered wagons, and those accursed ambulances, were racked and jounced over rocks and ruts until their weak bones ached, their sad countenances testifying to their utter wretchedness. And thus, hour after hour, through mud and slime and rain, over rocks and rails, ruts and logs, up the roughest and steepest grades, and down ruggedest descents, our weary, footsore, exhausted soldiers and jaded teams struggled and toiled in pain all that miserable day and far into night; for even at midnight feeble stragglers staggered into Mount Vernon, where the Fourteenth and Seventeenth rested, to find their comrades.

This night the poor lads went to bed supperless, for fatigue was overpowering, and sleep sweeter than meat. Some of them marched fourteen, some sixteen miles that day—thirteen the night and morning before. This day's work was more disastrous than ordinary battles. God knows how many sturdy constitutions it wrecked; how many brave volunteers it will kill.

But I had almost forgot the episode of the day. The few Tennesseans who had manfully breasted the task with Ohio and Indiana, were mere stragglers. Their officers were scattered as badly as the men. The privates were huddled in shivering groups along the route. It seemed as if they never could be collected. A hundred yards or so below a house where I halted for luncheon, there was a party of perhaps a hundred or more. There were two or three with me, bitterly denouncing the countermarch. At that moment an officer rode down the highway, proclaiming joyfully, "Tennesseans and Kentuckians are ordered back to London!" The hundred below set up a great shout of joy, as if they had attained the summit of their desires, and those with me started back almost running, bidding a glad good-by. Alas! poor fellows, you were twenty-four miles from London, exhausted, wet, muddy, almost out of provisions, without tents, and no houses or barns to shelter you from the storm. London will be another charnel-house for patriot Tennesseans. If there was cause for a forced march of the entire brigade from London to Crab Orchard, why order back the Tennesseans and Kentuckians, before they had approached within fifteen miles of Crab Orchard? If there was no adequate cause for the march, why was not the whole column halted for rest, which it so sorely needed? If there was reason to apprehend that the brigade would be cut off unless it made the forced march, why send the Tennesseans and Kentuckians back to be sacrificed? Who will answer?

MOUNT VERNON, November 15.

Thank God! the sun shines to-day. We learn this morning that the Thirty-eighth Ohio encamped five miles below here last night. During the night a tree was blown down in the camp, and five men, including three Tennesseans, were seriously injured. Two have died, and two more are reported fatally hurt.

The Thirty-third Indiana are moving forward slowly in the rear somewhere. The Fourteenth and Seventeenth Ohio lads are bowling ahead cheerily by company, because the sun shines and the roads improve; besides, the forced march must end to day. The brigade can go no further until it gathers its scattered fragments.

An order from head-quarters meets us—the only one giving relief. The column goes into camp two miles below Crab Orchard. The lads, inspired, move briskly, and camp is at last in view.

IN CAMP.—The Seventeenth Ohio, excepting a few feeble stragglers, was first in camp. The Fourteenth followed shortly after, but it had its stragglers too. Which regiment had not its large share? But Manny Richards, the energetic teamster of the Seventeenth, pushed in his wagons, and the Fairfield boys pitched their tents merrily. But the prospect for the other regiment was cheerless. Their wagons were far behind. Officers threatened to move where shelter could be found for the men, but orders must be obeyed, and they prepared again to bivouac on the cold, cold ground, in the freezing atmosphere of drear November.

But now there is another order fresh from head-quarters at Crab Orchard. Exhausted as they are, soldiers are forbidden to burn rails. They must cut wood for bivouac fire, or sleep in the frosty atmosphere without fires. Orders must be obeyed. Twenty men are detailed to cut wood, and wagons are sent out. Sunset is approaching. Head-quarters, who forty hours ago knew the men were coming, knew they were suffering, had not provided axes. Yet the order was cut wood. Look at the field adjacent to camp, and see whether rails were burnt.

A member of the Fourteenth, coming in late, reports: "I saw a dead man of the Fourteenth, lying on the roadside beyond Mount Vernon." He died of exhaustion. Another says: "I saw another dead man on the roadside to-day." He died of exhaustion. A surgeon says: "I saw two men yesterday in the last stage of exhaustion. I gave them whiskey to revive them. I could do nothing else. I was compelled to leave them with their comrades, and attend to the sick of my own regiment." They probably died of exhaustion.

CRAB ORCHARD, November 17.

The Thirty-eighth Ohio and the Thirty-third Indiana are coming in slowly. The former was more deliberate, but suffered its proportion. The latter are sleeping in the woods without tents. I know not whether the Tennesseans have got back safely to London.

There is not much beauty or gaiety in a soldier's life, if it is like this. But the toil, and suffering, and sacrifices, and the manly efforts of brave men obeying orders under circumstances such as I have sketched, are very eloquent. Will soldiers respect, love, and cheerfully fight under officers who abuse them as slaves do brutes?

The amount of physical suffering caused by this march cannot be computed. None can tell how many sturdy frames will bend under disease contracted from this ruthless exposure. The mortality list of our regiments will shortly begin to make a record. Many of the sick who were dragged out of their beds in the London hospitals, to be tortured on the rugged roads, saturated with rain, and chilled with cold, must die. Many of the well must fall ill. Ah, well, there are only two hundred and fifty sick in the Thirty-third Indiana; only a couple of hundred or so sick in the Fourteenth Ohio; only a hundred or so sick in the Thirty-eighth Ohio; only several scores sick in the Seventeenth Ohio; only a few hundred altogether. If they die—recruit the regiments.

The loss of property is nothing. The Government is rich. Only thirty horses, belonging to the Seventeenth Ohio, were knocked up and rendered unfit for service, and one died; one wagon was lost and twenty-six thousand pounds of ammunition; about the same report is made by the Fourteenth Ohio; so with each of the regiments. But the moral effect of the counter-march is one of its worst features. The mountaineers of Kentucky regard it a retreat, and the prestige of the victory at Wildcat is turned against us. And so ended the great Cumberland Gap Expedition.

But I beg you to wait, readers, for an echo from the Wildcat Brigade. If I mistake not, there will be a fierce growl ere long from the Tennessee Camp, as vehement as the denunciation from "East Tennessee," which you read a day or two ago in the Commercial. And I am inclined to believe that if the indignant letters of the Ohio and Indiana boys are permitted to see the light of public print, none will think I have colored the foregoing picture.

ADVICE TO SOUTHERNERS.

THE Charleston Mercury published the following soon after the attack on Port Royal, S.C.:

"Our enemies have invaded South Carolina for two purposes: First, to gratify their hate and revenge; and second, to gratify their avarice. The first we have to meet with fighting; but the last must be defeated by policy, where fighting fails. To defeat their avarice, our policy should be to destroy the objects their avarice proposes to feed on. General plunder is undoubtedly designed; but the special objects of their appropriation will undoubtedly be our slaves and cotton. What shall we do with them? Shall we leave them on our plantations to be appropriated by our invaders? It appears to us, our true policy is, to take off our plantations our slaves, horses and cattle, and to burn up our cotton. To leave our horses to arm them, our cattle to feed them, our slaves to strengthen and our cotton to enrich them, or to run their factories, appears to us to be the worst policy possible."

We imagine the Lincolnites hate all portions of the South alike, and that they would commit as many atrocities on the coasts of Louisiana, if ever they obtain possession, as they will in that part of South Carolina now unfortunately subject to their malign control. Their malignity is unparalleled; it extends to all the Confederate States in equal proportion, and it leads them to violate all the rules of civilized warfare.

That they contemplate wholesale plunder is unquestionable. Hence, as the exposed planters are bound to lose more or less of property, is it not altogether better that they should destroy what they cannot remove than to allow it to fall into the hands of relentless enemies, and thus permit them to reap substantial "aid and comfort" in consequence? We think so; and, therefore, heartily endorse the suggestion thrown out by our Charleston contemporary. Let every bale of cotton be burned before a single flake is allowed to go into the grasp of the ruthless invader. Indeed, some of the planters on Hilton Head Island have already set the noble example of destroying every particle of property they could not transport to a place of safety.

If the cotton or other property falls into the hands of the Lincolnites, the planters lose, while the Lincolnites are correspondingly advantaged; but if the planters burn their cotton their loss will be the same, and the abolitionists will not be benefited. Neither horses, cattle, hogs, sheep, corn nor cotton should be permitted to pass into their possession. All should be removed as far as practicable, and the remainder destroyed the moment the fact becomes apparent that the enemy cannot be successfully repulsed. By adopting such a course as this the common foe will be compelled to draw all his supplies from points some thousands of miles distant, through a costly and hazardous process. The case is a hard one all round; but to our mind, as the Yankees are hovering about our coasts on marauding expeditions, and as they will never pay for any thing they steal or ruin, it is best to inconvenience them as much as possible, by destroying all things they are bound to capture, rather than let them take, appropriate, and enjoy effects thus villainously obtained. By way of illustration: There are twelve or fourteen millions of coin in the vaults of the banks of New Orleans. Suppose, for the sake of argument, that New Orleans was bound to succumb before the overwhelming forces of the enemy. Would it not be the part of wisdom, policy and patriotism, to sink this twelve or fourteen millions of coin to the bottom of the Mississippi, rather than to allow it to go into the coffers of the "Gorilla" at Washington, to aid them in enslaving and robbing the people of Louisiana and the South? We "pause for a reply."

THE SLAVES NOT REBELLIOUS.

LETTER FROM GEN. DRAYTON TO GOV. PICKENS.

CAMP LEE, HARDEEVILLE, NOV. 18, 1861.

To his Excellency, Governor F. W. Pickens:

SIR: At the request of your Excellency, made to me yesterday at these head-quarters, I have the honor of presenting my views of the present attitude and behavior of the negroes in this portion of the State intrusted to my immediate command.

So far from there being any insurrectionary feeling among them, I can assure your Excellency that I have neither seen nor heard of any act of pillaging, incendiarism, or violence in any direction.

It is true that the negroes of a few plantations have shown a spirit of insubordination, by refusing to move higher up the country, when ordered to do so by their owners, but this disobedience should be assigned rather to a feeling of dismay and utter helplessness at being left alone and unprotected by the precipitate abandonment by their masters of their plantations, than from any organized plan of resistance to the authority they had been accustomed to obey.

But I now feel much satisfaction in stating, for the information of your Excellency, that the negroes are fast recovering from their fright, and coming forth from their hiding-places, and quietly and submissively resuming their agricultural labors without the guidance or presence, in many instances, of either master or overseer.

In conclusion, I would respectfully advise that all planters and overseers, who are not mustered into service, and are owners or agents of property upon the mainland, should, without delay, return to their several neighborhoods, and thus, by their presence, prevent a recurrence of that excitement among their people which has been due, in a great measure, to their absence. With much respect, your obedient servant,

THOMAS F. DRAYTON,

Brigadier-General,

Commanding Third Military District Department, S. C.

CAPTURE OF THE "BEAUREGARD."

LIEUTENANT ROGERS' REPORT.

UNITED STATES BARK W. G. ANDERSON, }
BAHAMA CHANNEL, Nov. 13, 1861. }

SIR: I last had the honor of addressing you under date of November 4, per schooner J. J. Spencer, enclosing abstract log of the United States bark W. G. Anderson to that date, and, to my regret, had nothing to report to the department of any moment.

I now have the gratification to inform you that we have been fortunate enough to capture the rebel privateer schooner Beauregard, one hundred and one tons, of and from Charleston, seven days out, and manned by a captain, two lieutenants, purser, and twenty-three seamen—twenty-seven, all told—and carrying a rifled pivot-gun throwing a twenty-four-pound projectile.

This occurred under the following circumstances: Since November 4, we have cruised along to the northward of the West India Islands and passages, steering westwardly, without seeing but one sail. After standing to within seventy miles of the Hole in the Wall, we turned our head to eastward again, and on November 12, in latitude 26°40', longitude 75°42', at daylight, made a schooner running before the wind toward us. On approaching within four miles he suddenly hauled by the wind, and, as we noticed many men on his decks, we immediately made sail in chase, and in two hours brought her to under our lee, and ordered the captain on board with his papers. He brought a letter of marque from Jefferson Davis, which he surrendered with his vessel.

Vol. III.—Doc. 34

We put a prize-master and crew on board, and transferred the prisoners to our ship, placing them in double-irons.

On boarding her, the crew were found in a drunken state, committing all the destruction they could—throwing overboard the arms and ammunition, spiking the gun, and cutting the sails and rigging to pieces. She was otherwise in bad order and poorly found, and having but a short supply of water, of which we had none to spare, was in no condition to send to Boston.

Having twenty-seven prisoners, and no room for them on board the W. G. Anderson, I decided, as we were within three days' sail of Key West, to take them and the vessel into that port and deliver them to the proper authorities, and thence return to my cruising-ground. I also am desirous of procuring, if possible, some ballast, of which the bark is very much in need.

Trusting that my proceedings will meet with your approbation, I have the honor to be, respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM C. ROGERS,

A. V. Lieut. Comm'g U. S. Bark W. G. Anderson.

Secretary of the Navy.

GOVERNMENT FOR NORTH CAROLINA.

THE Provisional State Government for North Carolina was formally instituted on the 18th of November, by a Convention of delegates and proxies representing forty-five counties of the State. The following ordinances were unanimously adopted:

By the People of the State of North Carolina, as represented in Convention at Hatteras, Monday, Nov. 18, 1861.

Be it ordained by this Convention, and it is hereby ordained and published by the authority of the same:

I. That this Convention, on behalf of the people of North Carolina, and acknowledging the Constitution of the United States of America as the supreme law of the land, hereby declares vacant all State offices, the incumbents of which have disqualified themselves to hold them by violating their oaths to support the Federal Constitution.

II. That the office of Governor of this Commonwealth having been vacated by the death of John W. Ellis, and by the active treason to the Union of his constitutional successor, Acting Governor Clark, therefore Marble Nash Taylor be hereby appointed and declared Provisional Governor of North Carolina.

III. That the Constitution of this State and its amendments, together with the statutes and laws thereof, as contained in the Revised Code put in operation January 1, 1856, be declared continued in full force; also such subsequent acts of the General Assembly as were not adopted in contravention of the National Constitution, or in derogation of its authority.

IV. That the ordinance of the Convention which assembled at Raleigh on the 20th of May last, proclaiming the secession of this Commonwealth from the Federal Union, such secession being legally impossible, is of no force or effect; and said ordinance, together with all other ordinances and acts of said Convention, or of the General Assembly, made and done in pursuance of the treasonable purposes of the conspirators against the Union, is hereby declared ab initio null and void.

V. That whereas it is desirable that this State shall be represented in the Federal Congress, and maintain her due weight in the councils of the Union, therefore the Provisional Governor be directed hereby to order special elections, in accordance with chapter sixty-nine of the Revised Code, as soon as practicable and expedient, in any district or districts now unrepresented. And, in view of the prevalence of armed rebellion and disorder in many portions of this Commonwealth, the Governor is hereby directed to issue his certificates of election upon presentation of such evidence as shall satisfy him of the fact of an election.

VI. That the Governor be authorized and empowered to fill such official vacancies by temporary appointment, and to do such acts as, in the exercise of a sound discretion, he may deem expedient for the safety and good order of the State.

The Convention adjourned, subject to be re-assembled upon the call of the President.

GOV. TAYLOR'S PROCLAMATION.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

To the People of North Carolina:

Whereas, an ordinance of the Convention of North Carolina, passed on Monday, the 18th November, 1861, directs the Provisional Governor of this Commonwealth in the following words, to wit: "Whereas, it is desirable that this State shall be represented in the Federal Congress, and maintain her due weight in the councils of the Union, therefore, the Provisional Governor be directed hereby to order special elections in accordance with chapter sixty-nine of the Revised Code, as soon as possible and expedient, in any district or districts now unrepresented;" and whereas the Revised Code of this State, chapter sixty-nine, and section fifth, provides as follows, to wit: "If, at any time, after the expiration of any Congress, and before another election, or if at any time after any election, there shall be a vacancy in the representation in Congress, the Governor shall issue a writ of election, and by proclamation shall require the voters to meet in their respective counties, at such time as may be appointed therein, and at the places established by law, then and there to vote for a representative in Congress to fill the vacancy, and the election shall be conducted in like manner as regular elections." And it appearing that the second Congressional district is unrepresented,

Now, therefore, I, Marble Nash Taylor, Governor of the State of North Carolina, do hereby notify and require the good and loyal people of the second Congressional district of this State, qualified to vote for members of the House of Commons of the General Assembly, to attend at the several voting places in the said district, on Thursday, the 28th day of November, 1861, and cast their ballots for a representative of the State in Congress.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State to be affixed, at Hatteras, this, the eighteenth day of November, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and sixty-one, and of the independence of the United States the eighty-sixth.

MARBLE NASH TAYLOR.

ALBERT PIKE'S "SAFEGUARD."

WASHINGTON, Nov. 18, 1861.

A LETTER from A. G. Boone, Indian Agent for Upper Arkansas, has been received at the Indian Bureau, enclosing letters of safeguard issued by Albert Pike, who calls himself "Commissioner of the Confederate States" to the Indian nations and tribes west of Arkansas, in favor of a band of the Comanches. This document was obtained from the band in council. They were greatly astonished on being informed that they had made a treaty with enemies of the Government and of their Great Father at Washington, and wished the safeguard to be sent to Washington to be destroyed, or used as their Great Father might see fit.

Armed Indians are at Fort Wise in great numbers, and are anxious to make a treaty and enter in the agency at that place. They number five hundred or six hundred lodges, and, from their number and bravery, more trouble may be apprehended from them than from all other tribes, if they are not satisfied. The following is a copy of a safeguard:

LETTERS OF SAFEGUARD.

The Confederate States of America, to all their officers, civil and military, and to all other persons to whom these presents shall come:

The bearer of this is Bis-te-va-na, the principal chief of the Ya-pa-rih-ca band of the Ne-um or Comanches of the prairie, and those who accompany him are the head men of that band; all of whom have this day concluded and signed in behalf of the whole Ya-pa-rih-ca band articles of a convention of peace and friendship between that band and other bands of the Ne-um with us, and have thereby agreed to settle and live upon reserves in the country between Red River and the Canadian, leased by us from the Choctaws and Chickasaws; and the said chief has also agreed to visit the other bands of the Ne-um, not parties to the same convention, and now on the Staked Plain and elsewhere, and persuade them also to settle upon reserves in the same country.

We have accordingly taken the said chief and the said head men and all other persons of both sexes and all ages, of the said Ya-pa-rih-ca band, from this day forward, under our protection, until they shall for just cause forfeit the same, and that forfeiture be declared by us; and we have therefore granted and do grant to them and to each of them these our

for their protection, and to avail each and all of them as far as our authority and jurisdiction extends.

You are therefore hereby charged to respect these letters, and give all the said persons protection and safe-conduct; and any infraction by any of you of this safeguard, will be visited by us with all the penalties due to those who violate the public faith, and dishonor the Confederacy.

In testimony whereof, Albert Pike, Commissioner of the Confederate States to <sup>[SEAL.]</sup> all the Indian nations and tribes west of those States, doth hereunto set his hand and affix the seal of his arms.

Done and granted at the Agency of the Confederate States for the Comanches, Wichitas, and other bands of Indians near the False Washita River, in the leased country aforesaid, this twelfth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one.

ALBERT PIKE,

Commissioner of the Confederate States to the Indian Nations and Tribes west of Arkansas.

Countersigned,

WM. QUESENBURY,

Secretary to the Commissioner.

SPEECH OF JUDGE C. P. DALY,

ON THE PRESENTATION OF FLAGS TO THE SIXTY-NINTH REGIMENT N. Y. S. V., NOV. 18, 1861.

COL. NUGENT: I am requested by this lady beside me, Mrs. Chaffin, the daughter of an Irishman, and the wife of an officer in the regular army of the United States, and by the ladies associated with her, to offer to your regiment the accompanying stand of colors. In committing to your charge these two flags, I need scarcely remind you that the history of the one is pregnant with meaning in the light which it sheds upon the history of the other. This green flag, with its ancient harp, its burst of sunlight, and its motto from Ossian in the Irish tongue, recalls through the long lapse of many centuries, the period when Ireland was a nation, and conveys more eloquently than by words how her nationality was lost through the practical working of that doctrine of secession for which the rebellious States of the South have taken up arms. The period of Ireland's greatness was attained when the petty princes, who ruled separate parts of the country, and kept it in unceasing turmoil, were finally subdued, and the spectacle of a united people under one Government was presented in the wise and beneficent administration of that truly great monarch, the illustrious Brian Boroihme, (tremendous cheering.) It is that happy period in Ireland's history upon which her bards love to dwell, her historians dilate, and around which cluster the proudest of her historical recollections. By what means was that nationality extinguished, and when did Ireland's miseries begin? When her ambitious leaders, the Jefferson Davises of that period, overthrew the fabric of the National Government, and instituted in its stead distinct and separate sovereignties, through whose internal weakness and clashing interests Ireland was finally brought under the power of that stalwart English monarchy that has since held her in its iron grasp. Does an Irishman, therefore, ask what his duty is in this contest? Let him learn it in the history of his own country, in the story of that green flag; let him, contemplating the sorrows of his mother Erin,

—"remember the days of old, Ere her faithless sons betrayed her."

What is asked of an Irishman in this crisis? He is asked to preserve that Government which Montgomery died to create, and which those Irishmen who signed the Declaration of Independence, George Taylor, James Smith, and Matthew Thornton, meant to transmit, with its manifold blessings, to every Irishman who should make this country the land of his adoption. To the Irish race it has been, in every sense, a country—a country where their native energy and stimulated industry have met with their appropriate reward; and where they have enjoyed an amount of political consequence, and exercised a degree of political influence, not found in the land of their nativity. Whatever may be the result of our experiment of self-government, the Irish race in America is as responsible for the result as any other. That it has its defects, none of us are vain enough to deny; but if, in view of what it has accomplished, any Irish adopted citizen is willing to give it up, let him go and live under the monarchy of Great Britain. (Renewed applause.) But if he still have faith in the teachings of Tone and the example of Lord Edward Fitzgerald, let him stand by that form of government here which they sacrificed their lives to obtain for Irishmen. To preserve that form of government on this continent, it must be sustained, as it has hitherto been, in the grandeur, integrity, and power of a nation, and not by a Mexican division into weak and rickety republics. (Enthusiastic cheering.) To secure that great end you are now in arms, and as a part of the military force that has come to the rescue of the Republic, you, and the organization of which you form a part, have a weighty and ennobling responsibility. You have chosen to be known by the number of a regiment already distinguished in the beginning of this contest, the reputation of which you have assumed to maintain. But more than this, you, and the organization to which you belong, have designated yourselves by the proudest name in Irish military annals—that of the “Irish Brigade.” That celebrated corps achieved its historical renown, not through the admitted bravery of its members merely, but chiefly by the perfection of its discipline, and it will be precisely in the proportion that you imitate it in this respect, that you will or will not be known hereafter. The selection of such a name only renders the contrast more glaring in the event of inefficiency and incompetency, and it were well, therefore, that both officers and men should remember that, if any part of the glory which the Irish Brigade achieved upon the plains of Ramillies, the heights of Fontenoy, and at the gate of Cremona, is to descend upon them, it will be not by adopting its name, but by proving hereafter, by their discipline and by their deeds, that they are worthy to bear it. (Enthusiastic plaudits.) You, too, Col. Nugent, have your own responsibility. You bear the name of that gallant Col. Nugent, who, at the head of the Irish horse at the battle of Spire, broke the compact infantry of the Prince of Hesse, and decided the fortune of the day. The Irish soldier has been distinguished by military critics for his recognition of the necessity of implicit military obedience, for the cheerfulness with which he endures the privations and hardships incident to a military life, and for his daring impetuosity in battle. Look to it that you maintain that character. Sir Charles Napier has borne the highest compliment to the merits of a disciplined Irish regiment in the account which he gives of the one led by him at the battle of Meeanee, in the war of Scinde, and which he calls “magnificent Tipperary!” With this single corps of but four hundred men and two thousand native troops, he encountered and defeated twenty-eight thousand of the warlike Beloochees. (Great cheering.) Of the decisive charge with the bayonet he glowingly tells us how this thoroughly disciplined Irish regiment moved as on a review across a plain swept by the fire of the enemy, the men keeping touch and step, and looking steadfastly in the faces of their foe. (Cheers.) These are examples of Irish valor, when regulated by discipline, which, if you may not rival, you can at least strive to imitate. Again, I commit these colors to your charge, and in view of the obligation imposed upon every officer and soldier by their acceptance, it may not be out of place to mention in this connection, that at the commencement of the war, I had occasion to offer, as the gift of my wife, I think, the first flag presented to a regiment departing from this city for the defence of the National Capital. Of that regiment, the old Sixty-ninth, you, sir, were the second in command, and at the head of it was the noble-minded, high-spirited, and gallant officer to whom so much of its after character was due. A descendant by the female line of that illustrious Irish soldier, Patrick Sarsfield, Earl of Lucan, whose name is identified with the siege of Limerick, and who fell fighting at the head of his brigade upon the bloody field of Landen, Col. Corcoran, in the spirit of his noble ancestor, received that flag with a soldier's promise, and kept that promise with a soldier's faith. It was not brought back from the field of Manassas on that day of disastrous rout and panic; but he, at least, and the little band who stood around him in its defence, went with it into captivity. (Wild huzzas from the regiment.) I need say no more when presenting this splendid gift, with which these ladies have honored your regiment, than to point to this Irish example of the faith and fidelity that is due by a soldier to his flag. Col. Corcoran is now within the walls of a rebel prison, one of the selected victims for revengeful Southern retaliation; but he has the satisfaction of feeling that he owes his sad, though proud preëminence to having acted as became a descendant of Sarsfield. Of this beautiful American standard, illustrative alike of the munificence of its donors, and of the skill of the hands that wrought it, I say to you, as a parting injunction, in the language of John Savage's “Song of the Sixty-ninth”:

“Plant that flag
On fort and crag,
With the people's voice of thunder.”

JEFF. THOMPSON'S EXPLOIT

AT PRICE'S LANDING, MO., NOVEMBER 18, 1861.

A CORRESPONDENT at St. Louis, Mo., gives the following account of this affair:—

B. F. Livingston, the agent deputed by the U. S. Government to travel on the steamer Platte Valley, was put in charge of that steamer at Cape Girardeau, and brought her to this port. We learn from him some interesting particulars of the trip of the boat since she left Cairo, Ill. When opposite Price's landing, the boat was hailed from shore by two men, attired in military overcoats, who were supposed to be Federal scouts. It turned out, however, that they were the redoubtable Jeff. Thompson and his adjutant. As soon as the boat was made fast to the bank, Jeff. raised his hand, and instantly two hundred men sprung in view from their places of concealment in the immediate vicinity, and quickly one hundred rushed on board, preceded by Jeff. himself. The leader inquired for the captain of the boat, and asked if the Platte Valley was a Government steamer. Discovering that she was not, he said he would not injure her, but if she was a Government boat, he would have sacked and burned her, but he would not interfere with private property. He then requested all the Government officers to appear before him, and questioned them as to their names, regiments, &c., and made prisoners of them. There were on board Captain Larrison, Lieutenant Denny, and a number of non-commissioned officers, passengers on their way to St. Louis. Jeff. talked with them a while, and concluded to let them go on giving their parole, which they did.

Mr. Livingston, not being connected with the military, gave no parole. The names, regiments, and other particulars were written down, and they were molested no further. Jeff. and his band were exceedingly elated at the success of the exploit. He said he intended to take every thing he could lay his hands on belonging to the Government. At Jeff.'s request, the captain of the boat had a barrel of common whiskey rolled out for the benefit of the band, who were soon enjoying themselves filling and emptying cups and glasses. Fearing that Jeff. would attempt to secure Government documents, Mr. Livingston, having important ones from Gen. Grant, &c., at once had them hidden. No sooner had he done this, than a search of rooms began for documents, which proved fruitless, as far as those in the possession of Mr. Livingston were concerned.

Jeff. saw a gentleman on board, an old acquaintance, and asked him if he remembered how they both got drunk at the railroad celebration at Atchison over a year ago? On being answered, he said that he had not been taking any thing strong since that time, but immediately afterward asked his old friend to the bar, and swallowed about three inches of whiskey. Jeff. was quite communicative, saying, among other things, that he and his men had ridden fifty-three miles in less than ten hours, starting the previous day at four o'clock. He was at Price's Landing when the gunboat came up to escort the Maria Denning, and was so close, his marksmen could have killed every man on board. He had four more cannon in the brush than those visible, and had a full regiment of Indians back of the place, and almost within hail.

The seizure of the Platte Valley took place on Tuesday between four and five o'clock. He intimated his intention of leaving, and as the boat was about leaving also, he told the captain that he would show him how easy it would have been for him to sink the boat. He fired two shots, one from a twelve and the other from a six pounder, which fell near the opposite shore.

Every man of his party was well mounted, and armed to the teeth with a pair of pistols, a knife and gun, and some had sabres; most of them were well clothed. Another thing Jeff. said was, that he was after the Maria Denning. He knew she would be guarded, and that he could not take her, but he wanted to sink her, and "by G—d" she would not get down to Cairo, as he and a squad of his men would be found behind every paw-paw bush between Price's Landing and Cairo. This is a specimen of Jeff.'s gasconading. The Maria Denning did get safe to Cairo in spite of him.

When leaving, his men gave three cheers for Jeff. Davis, and three more for Jeff. Thompson.

During all this, a large number of women on horseback were in the vicinity, but merely looked on. It is supposed they travel with the brigands.

The boat crossed the river, where a man was put out by the Government agent, with orders to ride to Cairo with all speed, and inform the authorities of the state of affairs. The messenger rode the distance, twenty-five miles, in two hours.

Soon after reaching Cape Girardeau, five hundred men went down the river on the Illinois. The boat had not been long at Cape Girardeau, when Capt. Wm. C. Postal and Messrs. White and Lyle were arrested by order of the provost marshal, Capt. Warner, on a suspicion of disloyalty. They were given quarters at the Johnson House.

A lady named Mrs. Brown, accompanied by a lieutenant of the Federal army, went on board the boat at Cape Girardeau. She seemed to be on terms of intimacy with Mr. White. His arrest may have been caused by the fact we learned soon after, that this lady's husband was in a rebel camp. She was overheard to say that "she was travelling around to see what she could." A search of the rooms and passengers was instituted, and Mrs. Brown was seen to burn several letters. When asked why she did so, she said they were "kind o'" love letters, from St. Louis, etc. This was corroborated by the young lieutenant who accompanied her on board. The search was conducted by the provost marshal, and we understand he arrested Mrs. Brown, as well as the captain and clerk of the boat, and probably the lieutenant and others.

PROCLAMATION OF GOV. HARRIS.

EXECUTIVE HEAD-QUARTERS, }
NASHVILLE, TENN., Nov. 19, 1861. }

To the Officers in command of the Militia of the State of Tennessee in the Second, Third and Fourth Divisions:

THE danger of invasion upon the part of the Federal forces is imminent. This invasion threatens the quiet and security of your homes, and involves the security of your sacred rights of person and property. The warning example of Maryland, Missouri and Kentucky bids you, if you would preserve your firesides, your homes, and the sanctity of your wives and daughters, to meet the despotic invader and his minions at the threshold of your State and drive him back. Let the soil of Tennessee be preserved from his unhallowed touch, and let him know that in defence of our liberties and our altars every Tennessean is ready to yield up his life. General A. S. Johnston, commanding the forces of the Confederate States in this department, in view of this threatened danger, has called upon me to send to the field such force as can be armed by the State.

In obedience to which requisition, and to repel the invader, thirty thousand of the militia of this State are hereby called to the field.

Officers in command of the militia of the Second, Third and Fourth divisions, will hold their commands in readiness to receive marching orders by the 25th instant, unless in the mean time a sufficient number of volunteers shall have tendered their services to fill this requisition.

Special orders to the commanders of the military, apportioning this requisition among the different brigades of said divisions, will be immediately forwarded, accompanied with such instructions and directions as may be necessary for the movement of troops to the place of rendezvous.

In the mean time, captains will direct their companies to parade on some given day, with whatever arms they may have, and they will take all other proper and legal steps to possess the arms within the bounds of their respective districts, and immediately report to the commanding officer of their regiments the number of arms and accoutrements, as well as the strength of their companies.

MESSAGE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS,

NOVEMBER 19, 1861.

THE Congress of the Confederate States met at Richmond, Va., on the 18th instant. There was barely a quorum present, and no business was done. The only interesting incident of the sitting of the 19th was the reception of the Message of Jefferson Davis, which is as follows:

To the Congress of the Confederate States:

The few weeks which have elapsed since your adjournment, have brought us so near the close of the year that we are now able to sum up its general results. The retrospect is such as should fill the hearts of our people with gratitude to Providence for His kind interposition in their behalf. Abundant yields have rewarded the labor of the agriculturist, whilst the manufacturing industry of the Confederate States was never so prosperous as now. The necessities of the times have called into existence new branches of manufacture, and given a fresh impulse to the activity of those heretofore in operation. The means of the Confederate States for manufacturing the necessaries and comforts of life within themselves, increase as the conflict continues, and we are gradually becoming independent of the rest of the world for the supply of such military stores and munitions as are indispensable for war.

The operations of the army, soon to be partially interrupted by the approaching winter, have afforded a protection to the country, and shed a lustre upon its arms, through the trying vicissitudes of more than one arduous campaign, which entitle our brave volunteers to our praise and our gratitude.

From its commencement up to the present period, the war has been enlarging its proportions and expanding its boundaries so as to include new fields. The conflict now extends from the shores of the Chesapeake to the confines of Missouri and Arizona; yet sudden calls from the remotest points for military aid have been met with promptness enough, not only to avert disaster in the face of superior numbers, but also to roll back the tide of invasion from the border.

When the war commenced the enemy were possessed of certain strategic points and strong places within the Confederate States. They greatly exceeded us in numbers, in available resources, and in the supplies necessary for war. Military establishments had been long organized, and were complete; the navy and, for the most part, the army, once common to both, were in their possession. To meet all this we had to create not only an army in the face of war itself, but also military establishments necessary to equip and place it in the field. It ought, indeed, to be a subject of gratulation that the spirit of the volunteers and the patriotism of the people have enabled us, under Providence, to grapple successfully with these difficulties.

A succession of glorious victories at Bethel, Bull Run, Manassas, Springfield, Lexington, Leesburg, and Belmont, has checked the wicked invasion which greed of gain and the unhallowed lust of power brought upon our soil, and has proved that numbers cease to avail when directed against a people fighting for the sacred right of self-government and the privileges of freemen. After seven months of war, the enemy have not only failed to extend their occupancy of our soil, but new States and Territories have been added to our Confederacy, while, instead of their threatened march of unchecked conquest, they have been driven, at more than one point, to assume the defensive; and, upon a fair comparison between the two belligerents as to men, military means, and financial condition, the Confederate States are relatively much stronger now than when the struggle commenced.

Since your adjournment, the people of Missouri have conducted the war, in the face of almost unparalleled difficulties, with a spirit and success alike worthy of themselves and of the great cause in which they are struggling. Since that time Kentucky, too, has become the theatre of active hostilities. The Federal forces have not only refused to acknowledge her right to be neutral, and have insisted upon making her a party to the war, but have invaded her for the purpose of attacking the Confederate States. Outrages of the most despotic character have been perpetrated upon her people; some of her most eminent citizens have been seized and borne away to languish in foreign prisons, without knowing who were their accusers or the specific charges made against them, while others have been forced to abandon their homes, their families, and property, and seek a refuge in distant lands.

Finding that the Confederate States were about to be invaded through Kentucky, and that her people, after being deceived into a mistaken security, were unarmed, and in danger of being subjected by the Federal forces, our armies were marched into that State to repel the enemy, and prevent their occupation of certain strategic points which would have given them great advantages in the contest—a step which was justified, not only by the necessities of self-defence on the part of the Confederate States, but also by a desire to aid the people of Kentucky. It was never intended by the Confederate Government to conquer or coerce the people of that State; but, on the contrary, it was declared by our generals that they would withdraw their troops if the Federal Government would do likewise. Proclamation was also made of the desire to respect the neutrality of Kentucky, and the intention to abide by the wishes of her people as soon as they were free to express their opinions.

These declarations were approved by me, and I should regard it as one of the best effects of the march of our troops into Kentucky, if it should end in giving to her people liberty of choice and a free opportunity to decide their own destiny according to their own will.

The army has been chiefly instrumental in prosecuting the great contest in which we are engaged; but the navy has also been effective in full proportion to its means. The naval officers, deprived to a great extent of an opportunity to make their professional skill available at sea, have served with commendable zeal and gallantry on shore and upon inland waters, further detail of which will be found in the reports of the Navy and of War.

In the transportation of the mails many difficulties have arisen, which will be found fully developed in the report of the Postmaster-General. The absorption of the ordinary means of transportation for the movement of troops and military supplies, the insufficiency of the rolling stock of railroads for the accumulation of business, resulting both from military operations and the obstruction of water communication by the presence of the enemy's fleet; the failure and even refusal of contractors to comply with the terms of their agreements; the difficulties inherent in inaugurating so vast and complicated a system as that which requires postal facilities for every town and village in a territory so extended as ours, have all combined to impede the best-directed efforts of the Postmaster-General, whose zeal, industry, and ability have been taxed to the utmost extent.

Some of these difficulties can only be overcome by time, and an improved condition of the country upon the restoration of peace, but others may be remedied by legislation, and your attention is invited to the recommendations contained in the report of the head of that Department.

The condition of the Treasury will, doubtless, be a subject of anxious inquiry on your part. I am happy to say that the financial system already adopted has worked well so far, and promises good results for the future. To the extent that Treasury notes may be issued, the Government is enabled to borrow money without interest, and thus facilitate the conduct of the war. This extent is measured by the portion of the field of circulation which these notes can be made to occupy. The proportion of the field thus occupied depends again upon the amount of the debts for which they are receivable; and dues, not only to the Confederate and State Governments, but also to corporations and individuals, are payable in this medium; a large amount of it may be circulated at par.

There is every reason to believe that the Confederate Treasury note is fast becoming such a medium. The provision that these notes shall be convertible into Confederate stock, bearing eight per cent. interest, at the pleasure of the holder, insures them against a depreciation below the value of that stock, and no considerable fall in that value need be feared so long as the interest shall be punctually paid. The punctual payment of this interest has been secured by the act passed by you at the last session, imposing such a rate of taxation as must provide sufficient means for that purpose.

For the successful prosecution of this war, it is indispensable that the means of transporting troops and military supplies be furnished, as far as possible, in such manner as not to interrupt the commercial intercourse between our people, nor place a check on their productive energies. To this end the means of transportation from one section of the country to the other must be carefully guarded and improved. And this should be the object of anxious care on the part of State and Confederate Governments, so far as they may have power over the subject.

We have already two main systems of through transportation from the North to the South—one from Richmond, along the seaboard; the other through Western Virginia to New Orleans. A third might be secured by completing a link of about forty miles between Danville, in Virginia, and Greensborough, in North Carolina. The construction of this comparatively short line would give us a through route from North to South, in the interior of the Confederate States, and give us access to a population and to military resources from which we are now, in a great measure, debarred. We should increase greatly the safety and capacity of our means for transporting men and military supplies.

If the construction of the road should, in the judgment of Congress, as it is in mine, be indispensable for the most successful prosecution of the war, the action of the Government will not be restrained by the constitutional objection which would attach to a work for commercial purposes, and attention is invited to the practicability of securing its early completion by giving the needful aid to the company organized for its construction and administration.

If we husband our means and make a judicious use of our resources, it would be difficult to fix a limit to the period during which we could conduct a war against the adversary whom we now encounter. The very efforts which he makes to isolate and invade us must exhaust his means, whilst they serve to complete the circle and diversify the productions of our industrial system. The reconstruction which he seeks to effect by arms becomes daily more and more palpably impossible. Not only do the causes which induced us to separate still exist in full force, but they have been strengthened, and whatever doubt may have lingered in the minds of any must have been completely dispelled by subsequent events.

If, instead of being a dissolution of a league, it were indeed a rebellion in which we are engaged, we might find ample vindication for the course we have adopted in the scenes which are now being enacted in the United States. Our people now look with contemptuous astonishment on those with whom they have been so recently associated. They shrink with aversion from the bare idea of renewing such a connection. When they see a President making war without the assent of Congress; when they behold judges threatened because they maintain the writ of habeas corpus, so sacred to freemen; when they see justice and law trampled under the armed heel of military authority, and upright men and innocent women dragged to distant dungeons upon the mere edict of a despot; when they find all this tolerated and applauded by a people who had been in the full enjoyment of freedom but a few months ago, they believe that there must be some radical incompatibility between such a people and themselves. With such a people we may be content to live at peace, but the separation is final, and for the independence we have asserted we will accept no alternative.

The nature of the hostilities which they have waged against us must be characterized as barbarous wherever it is understood. They have bombarded undefended villages without giving notice to women and children to enable them to escape, and in one instance selected the night as the period when they might surprise them most effectually whilst asleep and unsuspecting of danger. Arson and rapine, the destruction of private houses and property, and injuries of the most wanton character, even upon non-combatants, have marked their forays along their borders and upon our territory. Although we ought to have been admonished by these things that they were disposed to make war upon us in the most cruel and relentless spirit, yet we were not prepared to see them fit out a large naval expedition with the confessed purpose not only to pillage, but to incite a servile war in our midst.

If they convert their soldiers into incendiaries and robbers, and involve us in a species of war which claims non-combatants, women, and children as its victims, they must expect to be treated as outlaws and enemies of mankind. There are certain rights of humanity which are entitled to respect even in war, and he who refuses to regard them forfeits his claims, if captured, to be considered as a prisoner of war, but must expect to be dealt with as an offender against all law, human and divine.

But, not content with violating our rights under the law of nations at home, they have extended these injuries to us within other jurisdictions. The distinguished gentlemen whom, with your approval, at the last session, I commissioned to represent the Confederacy at certain foreign Courts, have been recently seized by the captain of a United States ship-of-war, on board a British steamer, on their voyage from the neutral Spanish port of Havana to England. The United States have thus claimed a general jurisdiction over the high seas, and, entering a British ship, sailing under its country's flag, violated the rights of embassy, for the most part held sacred even amongst barbarians, by seizing our Ministers whilst under the protection and within the dominions of a neutral nation.

These gentlemen were as much under the jurisdiction of the British Government upon that ship, and beneath its flag, as if they had been upon its soil; and a claim on the part of the United States to seize them in the streets of London would have been as well founded as that to apprehend them where they were taken. Had they been malefactors, and citizens even of the United States, they could not have been arrested on a British ship or on British soil unless under the express provisions of a treaty, and according to the forms therein provided for the extradition of criminals.

But rights the most sacred seem to have lost all respect in their eyes. When Mr. Faulkner, a former Minister of the United States to France, commissioned before the secession of Virginia, his native State, returned in good faith to Washington to settle his accounts and fulfil all the obligations into which he had entered, he was perfidiously arrested and imprisoned in New York, where he now is. The unsuspecting confidence with which he reported to his Government was abused, and his desire to fulfil his trust to them was used to his injury.

In conducting this war, we have sought no aid and proposed no alliances, offensive and defensive, abroad. We have asked for a recognized place in the great family of nations, but in doing so we have demanded nothing for which we did not offer a fair equivalent. The advantages of intercourse are mutual amongst nations, and in seeking to establish diplomatic relations, we were only endeavoring to place that intercourse under the regulation of public law. Perhaps we had the right, if we had chosen to exercise it, to ask to know whether the principle that "blockades, to be binding, must be effectual," so solemnly announced by the great Powers of Europe at Paris, is to be generally enforced or applied only to particular parties.

When the Confederate States, at your last session, became a party to the declaration reaffirming this principle of international law, which has been recognized so long by publicists and Governments, we certainly supposed that it was to be universally enforced. The customary laws of nations are made up of their practice rather than their declarations; and if such declarations are only to be enforced in particular instances, at the pleasure of those who make them, then the commerce of the world, so far from being placed under the regulation of a general law, will become subject to the caprice of those who execute or suspend it at will. If such is to be the course of nations in regard to this law, it is plain that it will thus become a rule for the weak and not for the strong.

Feeling that such views must be taken by the neutral nations of the earth, I have caused the evidence to be collected which proves completely the utter inefficiency of the proclaimed blockade of our coast, and shall direct it to be laid before such Governments as shall afford us the means of being heard. But, although we should be benefited by the enforcement of this law so solemnly declared by the great Powers of Europe, we are not dependent on that enforcement for the successful prosecution of the war. As long as hostilities continue, the Confederate States will exhibit a steadily increasing capacity to furnish their troops with food, clothing, and arms.

If they should be forced to forego many of the luxuries and some of the comforts of life, they will at least have the consolation of knowing that they are thus daily becoming more and more independent of the rest of the world. If, in this process, labor in the Confederate States should be gradually diverted from those great Southern staples which have given life to so much of the commerce of mankind, into other channels, so as to make them rival producers instead of profitable customers, they will not be the only or even chief losers by this change in the direction of their industry.

Although it is true, that the cotton supply from the Southern States could only be totally cut off by the subversion of our social system, yet it is plain that a long continuance of this blockade might, by a diversion of labor and investment of capital in other employments, so diminish the supply as to bring ruin upon all those interests of foreign countries which are dependent on that staple. For every laborer who is diverted from the culture of cotton in the South, perhaps four times as many elsewhere, who have found subsistence in the various employments growing out of its use, will be forced also to change their occupation.

While the war which is waged to take from us the right of self-government can never attain that end, it remains to be seen how far it may work a revolution in the industrial system of the world, which may carry suffering to other lands as well as to our own. In the mean time we shall continue this struggle in humble dependence upon Providence, from whose searching scrutiny we cannot conceal the secrets of our hearts, and to whose rule we confidently submit our destinies. For the rest we shall depend upon ourselves. Liberty is always won where there exists the unconquerable will to be free, and we have reason to know the strength that is given by a conscious sense not only of the magnitude but of the righteousness of our cause. #### EXPEDITION TO EASTERN VIRGINIA,

BY THE FORCES UNDER GENERAL DIX.

The following is an account of the expedition as given by the correspondent of New York Herald:

BALTIMORE, November 21, 1861.

Geographically, the counties of Accomac and Northampton, Va., constitute a part of Maryland, from which, indeed, they are separated only by an imaginary line, beginning at the mouth of Pocomoke River, and running in a northeast direction across the thirty-eighth degree of north latitude. Accomac County, the more northern of the two, is also far the larger, containing two hundred and twenty-four thousand acres of land, of which one hundred and fifty thousand are improved and under cultivation. The population of the county is about twenty-five thousand, of whom five thousand are slaves. Many of the people are engaged in the fisheries, in attending to oyster beds, &c.; and quite a number of the young men have been for many years sailors in the United States Navy. Most of the inhabitants, however, are engaged in agricultural pursuits, the aggregate value of their farms being four millions two hundred and twenty-three thousand dollars. All the usual grains—wheat, corn, oats, rye and barley—are raised, the aggregate annual production being one million five hundred thousand bushels. The people are intelligent and industrious, and, having been left pretty much to themselves during the present political troubles, have, for the most part, observed an outward neutrality. The majority of the people have been devotedly attached to the Union, but, from motives of prudence, have acquiesced with the action of the State in going out of the Union. Many of the young men, however, in the early part of the struggle, went over to the mainland, in Middlesex and Gloucester counties, and to Yorktown, and joined the rebel forces there.

Others of them remained at home, but formed organizations, obtained arms, and practised military evolutions, with the avowed purpose of aiding the rebel cause. These organizations embraced fully three thousand men. There are thirty-two churches in the county, of which four are Episcopal, one Catholic, two Presbyterian, six Baptist, one Universalist, and seventeen Methodist. Northampton County, the more southern of the two, is a narrow peninsula, containing only ninety-four thousand acres of land, of which seventy-five thousand acres are improved and under cultivation. The population of the county is ten thousand, of whom four thousand are slaves. The occupations of the people are similar to those of Accomac, but the inhabitants are more Southern in their feelings, and a majority of them have been in league with the enemy during the whole time from the commencement of the troubles. It is well known that before General Dix took command of this department a system of regular and daily communication took place between the rebel sympathizers in Baltimore and the rebels in Yorktown, by means of the people of Northampton County. Letters and newspapers were regularly sent and received every day, and thus the rebel leaders were kept fully posted about our movements. Since that time this communication has been attended with more difficulty, but it has by no means been broken up. Some idea of the adroitness of the rebel sympathizers in Northampton may be formed from the fact that the New York Herald has often been received at Norfolk, by this route, on the second day after its publication, and the Baltimore papers on the day after their publication. The agricultural productions of Northampton County, of which three are Episcopal, two Presbyterian, one Catholic, two Baptist, and five Methodist. The county seat is Eastville, and the other villages are Hadlock and Franktown in the north, Bridgetown at the head of navigation at Hunger Creek on the west, and Capeville, near Cape Charles, on the south. The county seat of Accomac is Drummondtown, and the other villages are Horntown, near the mouth of Pocomoke River, on the north; Assawoman and Modesttown, near Assawoman Inlet, on the east; Onancock and Pungoteague on the west, and Turkey's Pen at the south. Before the war broke out the following lighthouses existed on the coast of these two counties, all of which have been dismantled by the rebels:—One at Watts' Island, Chesapeake Bay, at the entrance of Pocomoke Sound; one at the entrance of Pungoteague Creek; one at the entrance of Occohannack Creek; one at Cape Charles; one on Smith's Island, east of Cape Charles; one on Hog Island, east of Eastville, and one on Piney Island, southeast of Horntown.

The objects of the expedition have been clearly set forth in the proclamation of General Dix.* The troops composing the expedition were transported from Baltimore, Md., to the scene of action in steamers. They landed at Newtown, in Somerset County, Md., and marched through to Horntown. Here great numbers of the proclamation of General Dix were scattered among the people, and were taken by them into the interior. Wherever the proclamation was read to the people, they expressed the greatest gratification and pleasure. Whatever supplies the troops needed, were freely brought in by the people, and were bought and paid for by the soldiers. What few rebels there were among the people, immediately departed for a more congenial clime. Before he advanced further southward, General Lockwood sent out a strong detachment to reconnoitre as far as Drummondtown. The commander of this expedition ascertained that there were no rebels in Accomac County in arms; that those who had arms had laid them down, and were ready to give them up if required; that the citizens of Drummondtown had voluntarily raised the Stars and Stripes over the Court House, and were eager to welcome the advance of the troops, but that the indications were that there might be some trouble in Northampton, as all the rebels had congregated there, apparently to resist the approach of the troops. The whole column, therefore, proceeded to Drummondtown, where they were at last accounts.

FURTHER ACCOUNTS.

BALTIMORE, November 21, 1861.

Information was received last night at headquarters from Accomac County of the most gratifying character, giving assurance that the expedition despatched by General Dix to the two eastern shore counties of Virginia, will meet with little or no opposition.

On Sunday the flag of the Union was hoisted at Drummondtown, the county seat of Accomac, on a pole which bore the rebel flag the day before. The people of the county had submitted to the authority of the United States, and declared their intention to do so in advance of the arrival of the troops. A flag of truce was sent by General Lockwood to Drummondtown on Saturday. On Friday night three thousand rebel troops disbanded, most of them drafted militia. Wherever the officer who bore the flag of truce went, he was importuned for General Dix's proclamation, which had been sent among them the day before. We annex some extracts from his statement. Meeting some of the disbanded men, he asked them why they had broken up so suddenly.

"The reply was, they had got General Dix's proclamation, and believing they could not stand out against the force we were about to send against them they thought it better to disband. But others came up in the mean time who were part of the militia, and they boldly answered that they never did want to go into the business, and had all the time disapproved of it, but were compelled to it by hot-headed secessionists.

"The greater part of the persons I met were of the disbanded militia. Three cheers for the Union were given with such zeal and zest as to make me conclude that there was something more in them than expressions arising from fear. I met many in squads of five, ten, twenty, etc., and they would sometimes run across the fields to meet us, expressing the deepest gratitude for the deliverance from oppression and want, for they are in want of many of the necessaries of life.

"I will here state that along the road I was besieged for General Dix's proclamation, a few copies of which had been scattered about the country through which I passed. It had even reached this place yesterday. When it had got among the militia organizations, it was made the pretext for giving open expression to their latent feelings of opposition to the Confederate rulers.

"The great majority of the people, I believe, look upon the troops about to be sent among them as their deliverers from cruelty and oppression. Hurrahs for the Union were quite frequent. At one place the American flag was hung out. It was a curiosity to the people, and they looked in astonishment when they saw that one owned in their very midst."

We may conclude that the people of Northampton will follow the example of Accomac. The secret of the success of the expedition is to be ascribed to the large and well-disciplined force sent into those counties. It is always a measure of humanity, as well as a right military rule, to employ a force so overwhelming as to prevent bloodshed. If half the number of troops had been sent, there would no doubt have been resistance, and very likely a sanguinary and protracted guerilla warfare, for which the country is well adapted.

We believe that the same exhibitions of returning loyalty will be made in other districts of country when we go into them with a like preponderance of force, and that the deep-seated feeling of attachment and devotion to the Union which lives in the hearts of a majority of the Southern people, will break out into open expressions when they feel that they are to be protected and sustained.

Another letter, dated on Sunday, says:

"This morning a forward movement into Virginia took place—first an advance of cavalry, next the Fifth New York, (Zouaves from Federal Hill,) followed by the Wisconsin Fourth, five companies of the Twenty-first Indiana, five or six companies of the Sixth Michigan, Nimms' Boston artillery, and an independent cavalry company of Pennsylvania. It was a glorious and most imposing sight to see, as they wound around our camp and entered a wood about a quarter of a mile distant. We have here, beside the Purnel Legion, a portion of the Sixth Michigan, the Seventeenth Massachusetts, and some companies of the Second Delaware regiment."

The United States revenue gunboat Hercules, Rufus Coffin, Lieutenant commanding, arrived in port about ten o'clock yesterday, from a cruise in Pocomoke Bay and Tangier's Sound, and brings information from the eastern shore of Virginia up to Monday night. Brigadier-General Lockwood was still at Newtown, with five thousand men, and also had one thousand men at Snowhill. He designed marching to Drummondtown and establishing there his head-quarters.

The place was held by a squadron of cavalry, and the national flag was waving over it. The greater proportion of the inhabitants are Union in feeling, and received the proclamation of Maj.-Gen. Dix with delight.

In a few days General Lockwood would move into Northampton County, with a force sufficient to overcome any opposition from the secessionists, who would be obliged to succumb.

Lieutenant Coffin left General Lockwood on Sunday, and on his way to his vessel found that a number of bridges over the streams south of the Pocomoke River had been burned, and trees felled and placed over the roads, compelling him to take a circuitous route.

On Saturday four boats, with armed seamen, were despatched from the gunboats Hercules and Reliance, lying in Pocomoke Bay, under the charge of Lieutenants Tompkins and Gambrill, of the Reliance, and Lieutenant Hall and Quartermaster Berry, of the Hercules, to Syke's Island, in that bay, near the mainland of Accomac County, and of which possession was taken. Formerly there were about one hundred and forty inhabitants on the island, but on account of the apprehension entertained that they would be impressed into the rebel service, all but thirty had left. These gladly received the proclamation of General Dix, and were promised the protection of the United States. The Hercules and Tiger will return to those waters as soon as they can recoal, and with the Reliance, Captain McGowan, will cruise along the Virginia shore in connection with the military forces.

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, CONVENTION.

The Richmond Enquirer of November 20th contains the report of the committee appointed by the Virginia State Convention to report on amendments to the Constitution.

The committee set out with an assertion of the old abstractions of the Virginia school, and then proceed to discuss the amendments which they deem essential to erect the State into an oligarchy. The people, they say, must be disfranchized, labor must be depressed, and free schools abolished. The following are some extracts from the report. Let freemen note the progress of the rebellion :

VIEWS OF POLITICAL ECONOMY.

Governments are instituted for the protection of the rights of persons and property ; and any system must be radically defective which does not give ample security to both. The great interests of every community may be classed under the heads of labor and capital, and it is essential to the well-being of society that the proper equilibrium should be established between these important elements. The undue predominance of either must eventually prove destructive to the social system. Capital belongs to the few—labor to the many. In those systems in which capital has the ascendancy, the Government must, to some extent, partake of the character of oligarchy, whilst in those in which labor is predominant the tendency is to what Mr. John Randolph graphically described as “the despotism of king numbers.” It is the office of enlightened statesmanship to secure to each its appropriate influence, but to give the absolute control to neither.

NORTHERN LABOR TOO POWERFUL.

The political condition of the Northern States presents a striking illustration of the evils incident to the preponderance of the element of labor. In the early periods of their history these evils were not so apparent as they have since become. Their population was sparse, and the Western Territories afforded a convenient outlet for their restless citizens ; property was easily acquired, and consequently the line of demarcation between labor and capital was not strictly drawn, because the laborer of to-day might readily become the capitalist of to-morrow. But within the last twenty years a marked change has taken place in the North. Population has become dense, and the safety-valve afforded by emigration to the Western Territories has been greatly obstructed. Wages have not kept pace with the cost of subsistence, and the difficulty of acquiring property has greatly increased. The tendency of this new condition of things has been to divide society into two distinct classes, and to array the one against the other.

FREE SCHOOLS DENOUNCED.

This tendency to a conflict between labor and capital has already manifested itself in many forms, comparatively harmless, it is true, but nevertheless clearly indicative of a spirit of licentiousness which must, in the end, ripen into agrarianism. It may be seen in the system of free schools, by which the children of the poor are educated at the expense of the rich ; in the various forms of exemption and homestead bills ; in the popular cry of “lands for the landless,” and “homes for the homeless ;” in Fourierism and communism ; in the habitual disregard of the ordinances of religion, and of the institution of matrimony ; and more distinctly in the form of abolitionism.

FREE SUFFRAGE NOT TO BE PERMITTED.

In the opinion of your committee no system of government can afford permanent and effectual security to life, liberty, and property, which rests on the basis of unlimited suffrage, and the election of officers of every department of the Government by the direct vote of the people. The tendency of such a system is to demoralize the masses ; to encourage the habit of office-seeking ; to foster corruption at the polls, and to place unworthy and incompetent men in positions of trust and responsibility. These, however, are the vital principles of the social organization of the North, and, as before stated, their bitter fruits are already in a course of rapid development.

In the Southern States more conservative and rational principles still prevail. This is due mainly to the institution of slavery, which constitutes a partial restriction on the right of suffrage. In the North men of every class and condition of life are entitled to vote. In the South all who are in a condition of servitude are necessarily excluded from the exercise of political privileges, and the power of the country is wielded by the more intelligent classes, who have a permanent interest in the well-being of society.

Slavery also constitutes an effectual barrier against that tendency to antagonism between labor and capital which exists in the North. There capital is the usual employer of labor, and is interested in diminishing its wages. Here capital is the owner of labor, and naturally seeks to enhance its rewards.

[The above report emanates from a committee which was appointed by the Convention in May last to consider such amendments to the Constitution of Virginia as may be necessary and proper. The Hon. A. H. H. Stuart, of Augusta County, is the chairman of the committee.]—National Intelligencer, Dec. 3.

GOV. TAYLOR'S PROCLAMATION,

AT HATTERAS, N. C., NOV. 20, 1861.

To the People of North Carolina :

On Monday, the 18th of November, 1861, a provisional or temporary Government for this Commonwealth was instituted at Hatteras, Hyde County, by a convention of the people, in which more than half the counties of the State were represented by delegates and authorized proxies. Ordinances were adopted by the Convention declaring vacant all State offices the incumbents whereof have disqualified themselves to hold them by violating their official oaths to support the Constitution of the United States, which North Carolina has solemnly accepted as the supreme law of the land ; pro-announcing void and of no effect the ordinance of secession from the Federal Union, passed by the Convention assembled at Raleigh, May 20, 1861; continuing in full force the Constitution and laws of the State, as contained in the revised code of 1855-6, together with all subsequent acts not inconsistent with our paramount allegiance to the United States; appointing a Provisional Governor, and empowering him to fill such official vacancies and to do such acts as in his judgment might be required for the safety and good order of the State.

We have attempted no revolutionary innovations; we have made no change in the organic law, or sought to overthrow or disturb any of the institutions of the State. In repudiating and resisting the wanton usurpation which has flagrantly defied the will and now crushes the liberties of the people of this Commonwealth, we act in the pursuance of a sacred duty to North Carolina, and to that great republic, our common country, which invested them with the high dignity of American citizenship. We fulfil, moreover, an imperative obligation to God, to civilization, to freedom, and to humanity. We obey that cardinal maxim of sound government which affirms that the popular welfare is the highest law. The good and loyal men of North Carolina have been for months past without any domestic Government which they were bound to respect, and the apparent consent of a large majority of the citizens to the armed power of the revolutionists and traitors, who have unwarrantedly arrogated the governing authority of the State, has been not a voluntary and cheerful acquiescence, but a compelled and protesting submission to a military despotism. The lives of citizens and their rights of property and person have had no protection amidst the anarchy, misrule, and disorder which have prevailed throughout the Commonwealth. It had, therefore, become necessary for the most ordinary interests of society, as well as in vindication of our loyalty to the national authority, that our municipal government, suppressed and overborne as it was by reckless and irresponsible usurpers, should be revived and maintained under the protection of the banner of the Union. The temporary State Government which we have accordingly set on foot has the approval in advance of thousands of good and faithful North Carolinians, and should command the prompt and cordial adhesion of all loyal citizens of the State. Of the desperate and ill-starred fortunes of the rebellion, and of its ultimate and thorough suppression, no rational man can entertain a doubt. It has the recognition of no nation under heaven, and the world's sympathies are unanimous in its condemnation; it is everywhere regarded as not only a revolt against a most beneficent and paternal Government, but as assailing also law, order, progress, and all the great interests of mankind throughout the globe. It is an aggressive war upon popular liberty in the United States, and its claims can never be conceded short of an absolute surrender of the rights of man and a craven recantation of the holy creed of freedom.

I therefore call upon all the good people of this Commonwealth to return to their allegiance to the United States, and to rally around the standard of State loyalty, which we have re-erected and placed side by side with the glorious flag of the republic. I adjure you as North Carolinians, mindful of the inspiring tradition of your history, and keeping in view your true interests and welfare as a people, to rise and assert your independence of the wicked tyrants who are seeking to enslave you. Remember the men of Mecklenburg and the martyrs of Alamance—dead, but of undying memory—and endeavor to repeat their valor and their patriotism.

MARBLE NASII TAYLOR,

Provisional Governor of North Carolina.

CAPTURE OF THE "HARVEY BIRCH."

NOVEMBER 19, 1861.

THE VOYAGE OF THE NASHVILLE.

THE Confederate States steamer Nashville, Captain Pegram, left Charleston on the night of the 26th of October, at eleven o'clock, passing over the bar at twelve. When she started the weather was thick and cloudy, but just as she was crossing the bar the weather cleared up, and the moon rose brightly, lighting up in full view to the eastward, distant about four miles, two steamers of the blockading squadron—one the United States steam frigate Susquehanna, of twelve guns, the other a powerful propeller gunboat. The Nashville, being under the land and from the moon, was not seen by them. She then encountered strong northeasterly winds and very heavy seas, but made the passage to Bermuda in three and a half days. On arriving at Bermuda she received a pilot on board, who took the vessel to the dock-yard, stating that, in consequence of her length, she could not go into St. George's. The next day Captain Pegram, not being satisfied, obtained a second pilot from the dock-yard, who took the Nashville safely round into St. George's, at which place the vessel coaled. During their stay at Bermuda the commander and officers were treated with the greatest hospitality and kindness, both by the citizens and the officers of the English army and navy stationed there, and every facility for getting stores, coals, &c., was afforded them by the inhabitants. A few days prior to the arrival at Bermuda of the Nashville the United States steamer Connecticut had called at the island for the purpose of ascertaining if the Nashville had been there. She had a crew of four hundred men, with six guns mounted. Not hearing any thing of the steamer they were in search of, they again proceeded to sea, without stating their destination. The Nashville sailed again for Bermuda on the 5th instant, and from the next day until the 17th she experienced a succession of gales from all points of the compass. Nothing of interest further transpired until the 19th, when she destroyed the United States ship Harvey Birch.

CAPTAIN PEGRAM'S REPORT.

The following is the report of Commander Pegram: On the morning of the 19th instant at eight A. M., sighted the packet-ship Harvey Birch, of New York; immediately bore down upon her; when near enough, hailed her, having unlimbered guns and cleared decks for action. Then spoke the vessel and ordered the captain to haul down his colors and bring his papers on board. The Stars and Stripes immediately went down slowly, and Captain Nelson and his crew came on board the Nashville. Captain Pegram then informed him that he demanded an unconditional surrender, but all private effects would be respected. The crew were then brought on board, and with the exception of Captain Nelson, his two mates, and a passenger, were placed in irons. The captain and mates were allowed to retain their revolvers, but put upon parole. A few provisions were then brought on board, and the Harvey Birch committed to flames. Before the Nashville left her the three masts were seen to fall, and the entire vessel enveloped in a burning mass. Captain Pegram states that the burning of the ship and hauling down of her flag was the most painful act of his life, having for a period of thirty-two years fought and served under the United States flag.

The crew of the burnt ship describe the officers of the Nashville as young and inexperienced, and their disgust is beyond expression at being taken by such a set of "brats of boys," as they describe them. To use the expression of one of them, he said, "By —, if only half a dozen of us had been loose, we would have cowhided the whole of the lot over the stern, clean." A good joke is told of the captain of the Nashville, who, it appears, belonged to the American navy for thirty years before he joined the secessionists. In relating the capture of the ship to a gentleman at Southampton, he observed that he felt bound to treat the captain and officers with every attention and kindness, that he invited them daily to his own table, and behaved with true hospitality and courtesy; "but," said he, "my mortification was great when I sent them on shore to find that they did not acknowledge my kindness by even expressing their thanks."

Captain Pegram held the following commission under the "Confederate" seal:

The President of the Confederate States of America,

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye that, reposing special trust and confidence in the patriotism, valor, fidelity, and abilities of Robert B. Pegram, I do appoint him a lieutenant in the navy of the Confederate States, to rank as such from the 10th day of June, A. D. 1861.

He is therefore carefully and diligently to charge the duty of lieutenant by performing all manner of things therein longed, and I do strictly charge all others under his command to be obedient to his orders as lieutenant.

And he is to observe and follow all directions as from time to time receive from me, the future President of the Confederate States of America, or the officers set over him, according to the discipline of war.

Given under my hand at the city of Richmond, this 20th day of September, 1861, of our Lord 1861.

JEFFERSON

By the President,

S. R. MALLOY, Secretary of the War.

The following statement was taken from a Quarantine officer at Southampton, by the second mate of the Harvey Birch:

STATEMENT OF JAMES STEWART, SECOND MATE OF THE HARVEY BIRCH.

On Tuesday morning, at nine A. M., forty miles off Cape Clear, the steamer Nashville came alongside the Harvey Birch, Nelson, from Havre, in ballast, bound for New York. He ordered us to haul out the United States color, and the crew to come on board. The captain went on board and remained about fifteen minutes, and returned to his ship, and gave James Stewart, second officer of the ship, orders to the crew to pack their things up, and bring them to the gangway, (bags only) with the chests of the officers, who were allowed to take their chests.

Eleven A. M.—The crew left their things on board the Nashville. The captain of the Nashville, with his crew, went on board the Harvey Birch, and set her on fire.

Half-past Six P. M.—I saw the masts of the Nashville then passing by the side of Southampton to land the crew of the Harvey Birch.

JAMES STEWART, Second Mate.

PROTEST OF CAPTAIN NELSON.

The following is the protest of Captain H. Nelson, master of the Harvey Birch:

I, William Henry Nelson, of the city of New York, in the United States of America, a Merchant Mariner, do solemnly, sincerely, and truly swear that I sailed from the said city of New York on the 20th day of September last, in the ship of, and in, the ship Harvey Birch, of New York, a ship owned and registered in New York, in conformity with the laws of the United States, bound for the port of Havre de Grace, France, with a cargo consisting of wheat. On the 9th day of October I arrived at Havre de Grace, having discharged the cargo of my ship, and ballasted her. I sailed in her again for New York, on the 16th day of November, 1861, first having received the register, and articles, and all papers belonging to the ship in proper form from the United States consul here. On the morning of Tuesday, the 19th instant, the ship then being in about lat. 49° 6' long. 9° 52' W., a steamer was made out sailing for the Harvey Birch, which, on getting nearer, was found to be an armed vessel, and hoisted at the peak the flag of the so-called Confederate States; and when within hailing distance a person on board, who I learned was the captain, hailed my ship, saying, "Haul down your colors and heave the ship to," the sign of the United States being at this time at the peak of my vessel. This order was complied with, and I then received the order, "Lower your boat and come on board," which I also complied with, taking my ship's papers with me. After arriving on board the steamer was introduced by the first lieutenant, by the name Fauntleroy, to Captain Pegram, as commander of the Confederate States steamer Nashville, to whom I produced all the papers of my ship for examination, to show that I was engaged in legal trade. Captain Pegram took the ship's papers. He did not return them, and he would hold them, and then told me that he would hold me a prisoner of war by authority of the Confederate States. He then told me I might go on board my ship, and I was ordered to send my crew on board the steamer as quick as possible. I returned to my ship, and at once made preparations to leave her, but orders were repeatedly given from the steamer to hurry up, and sufficient time was not given to enable either myself or my crew to get our effects out of the ship. The second lieutenant, with other officers, came on board the ship and took charge of her, and orders were given to take fresh stores, etc., and in consequence thereof all the fresh meat, poultry, pigs, eggs, and butter were taken out and put on board the steamer, and especially it was ordered that all the oil, tea, coffee, and sugar should be put on board the steamer, which was done. When all this had been accomplished, the crew left the ship by order of the second lieutenant, I being last on board, leaving the second lieutenant and his boat's crew in charge of the ship. After arriving on board the steamer we saw that the Harvey Birch was in flames, and the second lieutenant returned on board the steamer with his boat, which was secured, but the ship's quarter boats, which had been used in communicating, were cast adrift. Captain Pegram now said, "Now, as it is all over, we will give her a gun," or words to that effect, and a gun was discharged at the ship, but without apparently hitting her. The steamer then was put on an easterly course, the crew of the ship having been previously put in irons. I, with my officers, was summoned to the captain's cabin, and there signed, at the request of the captain, a document stating that we would not take up arms against them while in their custody; he having said that I and my officers could have our liberty on board when we had signed it. I was frequently told that an oath would be exacted of us "not to take up arms against the Confederate States" before I could be liberated, but I was liberated without any such being taken. The steamer steamed up the English channel, and arrived at Southampton at about eight A. M. on the 21st instant, and came to anchor in the river. Captain Pegram then told me that I and my crew were at liberty, and might go on shore, but he refused to put us on shore, and I therefore employed a steam-tug at my own expense, and landed my crew in Southampton docks between nine and ten A. M., and they were taken charge of by the United States consul there. Repeatedly while on board the steamer, in conversations with her officers, I was told that she was not fitted out as a vessel of war, that she was on a special mission to England, but naval officers were in command of her. I was told by one of the crew, that the crew originally signed articles at Charleston, South Carolina, to go to Liverpool, but that before sailing the officers were all changed, and new articles were brought on board, which the crew were compelled to sign by threats of force. I was also informed that the crew was composed of English and Irish.

The chronometer and barometer belonging to the Harvey Birch, were taken by Captain Pegram, who refuses to deliver them up. The Harvey Birch was a ship six years old, and of 1,482 tons register. Before we lost sight of the ship her masts had gone over the side, and she was burnt to the water's edge.

W. H. NELSON.

Sworn before me in the consulate of the United States at London this 22d day of November, 1861.

Captain Nelson stated that Commander Pegram endeavored to compel himself and crew to take the oath of allegiance and not to take up arms against the Southern States. This was denied by Commander Pegram and officers, who stated that the only document that Captain Nelson and officers were requested to sign was one of which the following is a copy:

CONFEDERATE STATES STEAMER NASHVILLE, }
AT SEA, November 19, 1861. }

We, the undersigned, officers and passengers on board the United States ship Harvey Birch, being now prisoners on board the Confederate States steamer Nashville, do pledge to our own captain our sacred honor not to bear arms against or in any manner to countenance hostilities against such Confederate States till our regular exchange or discharge.

W. H. NELSON, Master.
CLEMENT F. STEVENS, Mate.

J. B. BLYDENBURGH, Passenger.
PAUL F. HALLETT, Carpenter.
THOMAS W. LOFBYS, Boatswain.

The remainder of the crew, not having signed the above document, were placed in irons until their arrival at Southampton.

DEFENCE OF CHARLESTON, S. C.

PROCLAMATION OF THE MAYOR.

MAYOR'S OFFICE, November 22, 1861.

I, Charles Macbeth, Mayor of the city of Charleston, do hereby most earnestly appeal to the citizens of this city to come forward and assist the military and civil authorities in putting Charleston in a proper state of defence. A large number of laborers are wanted, and called for, on the works now progressing around the city; and surely there is a sufficient number of unemployed laborers to supply the demand. Proper arrangements will be made for the superintendence and subsistence of all laborers that may be tendered, and I confidently hope that every citizen of the city will, without any further appeal, come forward promptly and report at the City Hall the number of laborers he can contribute.

CHARLES MACBETH, Mayor.

ENGAGEMENT AT WARWICK, VA.,

NOVEMBER 22, 1861.

A correspondent of the Philadelphia Enquirer gives the following particulars of the attack upon the rebel camp at Warwick by the gunboats Cambridge and Hertzell.

An intelligent deserter from the Tenth Georgia regiment reached Newport News on the morning of Friday last, and was taken to headquarters at Fortress Monroe, where, upon being interrogated, he made known the location of a number of important rebel camps on the right bank of the James River.

Acting upon this information, an expedition, consisting of two gunboats, was prepared on Friday, in readiness to proceed at nightfall to the junction of the James and Warwick rivers, about five and one-half miles above Newport News. The Cambridge led the way and steamed without interruption until reaching the point designated, where the white tents of the enemy could be plainly discerned on a low wooded triangular piece of land. This was near midnight.

Almost before the rebel pickets could give the alarm, the gunboats were in position, and had opened fire upon the camps, the guns following each other in rapid succession.

No effectual resistance was made by the enemy, and the discharges were continued for over an hour, at which time the camps appeared nearly deserted. The darkness of the night and the want of sufficient men prevented a landing being effected. Indeed, this was not the object of the expedition, the sole aim being to destroy the camps by an efficient cannonade, and this was successfully accomplished. It is believed that the loss of life on the part of the rebels was heavy, owing to the suddenness of the attack, and their comparatively defenceless state.

After the exploit the gunboats returned to Newport News and anchored in the stream, the result being communicated to Gen. Wool and Commodore Goldsborough.

The rebel deserter alluded to was about twenty years of age. He managed to elude the vigilance of the outer rebel pickets, and followed the sandy shore of James River, from the camp which he was deserting to Newport News, where he was met by five men of one of the Massachusetts regiments, and taken in charge. He desired to return to his parents in Boston. He was a sailor by profession, and at the time of the blockade was attached to a Massachusetts vessel at Savannah. Owing to the blockade, she was unable to get to sea, and the lad found himself without employment. He finally visited Augusta, Georgia, and being entirely destitute of money, and attracted by the placards covering the walls of the city, promising eleven dollars per month to those who would enlist, he became a member of the Tenth Georgia regiment, Col. Cummins.

The regiment was armed principally with smooth-bore muskets. It was composed of sailors and the laboring men of Augusta, and after its organization was located at many different points without seeing active service, until finally, about two months ago, it left Richmond and came down the James River to a place known as Young's Mills, in Warwick County, Va., on the banks of Deep Creek. Here a camp was formed, and in this same neighborhood were, and still are (except those scattered by the gunboats) the following regiments: Tenth Georgia, Col. Cummins; Second Louisiana, Col. Farnaw; Fifteenth Virginia, Second Florida, Tenth Louisiana, Sixth Georgia, Louisiana Zouaves, five hundred cavalry, one battery of eight pieces.

The Second Louisiana regiment had the most exposed position, the camp being on the point of land at the confluence of the Warwick and James rivers and Deep Creek. It was this regiment which sustained the fire of the gunboats, as already stated. On the point they have thrown up an earthwork, and procured two howitzers for its defence. They have also brought a number of old canal boats down from Richmond, and sunk them across the entrance to Warwick River, a stream one mile in width at its mouth.

The Tenth Georgia camp adjoins that of the Second Louisiana, being further up the shore of Warwick River. Adjoining these, and still further up, is the Tenth Louisiana. Beyond these, and one mile distant from the river, at Tabb's fields, (near Warwick Court House,) is the Second Florida. The Fifteenth Virginia command the road leading from Newport News to Richmond, and have thrown earthworks across it at a point about five miles above the News. They have also ditched it, and erected an eight-gun battery, already alluded to. Of the guns two are brass field-pieces and one a rifled cannon. A squadron of five hundred cavalry is stationed with this regiment, and used for scouting purposes. The Sixth Georgia regiment is at Yorktown, where formidable earthworks have been thrown up with the assistance of negroes impressed into the service. The Louisiana Zouaves are at Williamsburg, exactly sixty miles from Richmond.

Nearly all of the rebel troops are erecting winter-quarters, there being no design of advancing upon Newport News or Fortress Monroe, although this idea was entertained some time since. General Magruder has twenty-three thousand troops in this department, comprising the districts of James and York rivers. He visits the camps at long intervals, and is addicted to hard drinking. The tents in use are generally very poor. The rations consist of fresh meat and hard bread twice each week; bacon twice, and sugar and coffee twice. There is plenty of food such as it is, the provisions being brought by steamers from Richmond.

Two weeks ago the Tenth Georgia regiment received new clothing, each man being obliged to pay twenty-four dollars for his suit—this sum being deducted from his wages. This created much dissatisfaction among the soldiers. Two months ago three other regiments received new clothing.

The Second North Carolina regiment went home two weeks ago, many of the men positively refusing to serve under Gen. Magruder.

MEETING IN KENTUCKY.

A MEETING of Union men was held at Frankfort, Ky., on the 23d of Nov., to express sentiments in opposition to the recommendation of John Cochrane and Simon Cameron, in relation to arming the slaves of the South. The following resolutions were passed unanimously: *

That the Government of the United States has no constitutional power to interfere with the institution of slavery in any of the States, nor has it the power to deprive any citizen of his slave property without due process of law, nor the power to appropriate such property to public use without just compensation.

That the exercise of any such power by any officer of the United States, whether civil or military, is a palpable violation of the express provisions of the Constitution, and should be condemned by every department of the Government, and by every citizen thereof.

That the proposition recently announced, for the emancipation of the slaves of those at war with the United States, and the arming of such slaves against their masters, is in violation of the rules of civilized warfare; is abhorrent to every principle of humanity and Christianity, and in its results would add to the calamities of the present civil war the additional horrors of servile insurrection, murder, rapine and plunder, by the black race against the white, throughout the slave States of the Union.

That as friends to the Constitution and Government of the United States—as patriots, as philanthropists, and as Christians, we do hereby most solemnly remonstrate and protest against such a proposition, and do most earnestly implore and entreat every department of our Government, and every officer and citizen thereof, to condemn and reject the same.

* See Colonel Cochrane's Speech, ante.

That we hereby tender our thanks to the editors of the Louisville Journal and Louisville Democrat, for the ability with which they have resisted this threatened violation of the Constitution, and the firmness with which they have denounced this inhuman proposition and its fanatical authors.

That a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions be forwarded to his Excellency Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, and that the Hon. John J. Crittenden be requested to present the same to the Congress of the United States and our representatives.

PRISONERS OF WAR.

PLAN FOR PAYING THEIR FAMILIES.

The following Circular has been issued by Government:

The following plan for paying to the families of officers and soldiers in the service of the United States, who are or may become prisoners of war, sums due them by the Government, having been approved by the President, it is published for the information of all concerned:

Payment will be made to persons presenting a written authority from a prisoner to draw his pay; or, without such authority, to his wife, the guardian of his minor children, or his widowed mother, in the order named.

Application for such pay must be made to the senior paymaster of the district in which the regiment of the prisoner is serving, and must be accompanied by the certificate of a Judge of a Court of the United States, of a District-Attorney of the United States, or of some other party, under the seal of a Court of Record of the State in which the applicant is a resident, setting forth that the said applicant is the wife of the prisoner, the guardian of his children, or his widowed mother, and if occupying either of the two last relationships toward him, that there is no one in existence who is more nearly related according to the above classification.

Payments will be made to parties thus authorized and identified, on their receipts made out in the manner that would be required of the prisoner himself, at least one month's pay in all cases being retained by the United States. The officer making the payment will see that it is entered on the last previous muster-roll for the payment of the prisoner's company, or will report it, if those rolls are not in his possession, to the senior paymaster of the district, who will either attend to the entry or give notice of the payment to the Paymaster-General, if the rolls have been forwarded to his office.

Adjutant-General.

MARTIAL LAW IN EAST TENNESSEE.

HEAD-QUARTERS RIFLE BRIGADE, }
CAMP LOOKOUT, Nov. 24, 1861. }

MARTIAL LAW having been proclaimed at this post on the 14th day of November, by order of Colonel S. A. M. Wood, the officer then in command, many disaffected persons were arrested and placed in custody of the proper military authorities for trial. The larger portion of these have voluntarily taken the oath of allegiance to the Confederate Government and were released and returned to their homes. Those who were organized for active hostilities have, for the most part, been dispersed and driven beyond the limits of the State, thus effectually breaking up the conspiracy recently existing in this portion of the State to resist the authority of the Confederate States Government, and thereby restoring peace and quiet throughout the country adjacent to this post.

The commanding General being satisfied, from the evidences of loyalty (upon the part of the people) now before him, that the necessity for the enforcement of martial law does not now exist, orders that the same be no longer in force. It is not the purpose of the Commanding General at this post to impose any restrictions, or enforce any law not required by stern necessity. Those persons who remain at home, submitting to the established laws of the country, will not be molested, whatever their previous political opinions may have been, but those found in arms against the Government, aiding or abetting its enemies, or in any way inciting rebellion, will be visited with all the rigor of military law.

OCCUPATION OF TYBEE ISLAND,

NOVEMBER 24, 1861.

FLAG-OFFICER DUPONT'S REPORT.

FLAG-SHIP WABASH, PORT ROYAL HARBOR, }
S. C., Nov. 25, 1861. }

SIR: I have the honor to inform the department that the flag of the United States is flying over the territory of the State of Georgia.

As soon as the serious injury to the boilers of the Flag had been repaired, I despatched Commander John Rodgers to Tybee entrance, the mouth of Savannah River, to report to Commander Missroon, the senior officer, for a preliminary examination of the bars, and for the determination of the most suitable place for sinking the proposed obstructions to the navigation of the river.

Captain Rodgers was instructed to push his reconnoissance so far as to "form an approximate estimate of the force on Tybee Island, and of the possibility of gaining access to the inner bar;" and further, "if the information acquired by this reconnoissance should be important, to return and communicate it to me immediately."

I was not surprised when he came back and reported that the defences on Tybee Island had probably been abandoned. Deeming it proper, however, to add the Seneca, Lieutenant Commanding Ammen, and Pocahontas, Lieutenant Commanding Balch, to his force, I directed him to renew his approaches with caution, and, if no opposition was met with, to occupy the channel.

I am happy now to have it in my power to inform the department that the Flag, the Augusta, and the Pocahontas are at anchor in the harbor abreast of Tybee beacon and light, and that the Savannah has been ordered to take the same position.

The abandonment of Tybee Island, on which there is a strong martello tower, with a battery at its base, is due to the terror inspired by the bombardment of Forts Walker and Beauregard, and is a direct fruit of the victory of the 7th.

By the fall of Tybee Island, the reduction of Fort Pulaski, which is within easy mortar distance, becomes only a question of time.

The rebels have themselves placed sufficient obstructions in the river at Fort Pulaski, and thus, by the coöperation of their own fears with our efforts, the harbor of Savannah is effectually closed.

I have the honor to be, sir, respectfully, your most obedient servant,
S. F. DUPONT,
Flag-officer Commanding
South Atlantic Block'g Squadron.

Hon. GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

The following account of the occupation is given by an officer of the expedition:

U. S. SHIP POCAHONTAS, AT THE ANCHORAGE. }
SAVANNAH HARBOR, TYBEE ISLAND, NOV. 24, 1861. }

The steamer Flag, Commander John Rodgers, was despatched by Flag-officer Dupont to reconnoitre this point and ascertain the position and strength of the rebels. He did so, and on his return to Port Royal he had the Seneca and this vessel added to his command, and this morning, with a view to feel the enemy, we threw a few shells into the fortifications, but getting no reply we soon found that the works were abandoned, and we have taken possession of them. They consist of a strong martello tower, with an intrenchment at the foot of it, over both which the Stars and Stripes now float. It is a most important acquisition, as the ship channel to Savannah passes within five hundred yards.

Fort Pulaski is doomed, for it is ours whenever we think proper to take it, as it is within most convenient shell range—six hundred yards. No vessel will now leave or enter the port of Savannah without our permission during the remainder of the war.

We now hold the harbor with the three steamers—the Flag, Commander Rodgers; the Pocahontas, Capt. Balch; and the Seneca, Capt. Ammen—but no doubt will have other vessels sent here and also a strong garrison, as soon as Flag-officer Dupont and Gen. Sherman are advised of the capture.

We hear, upon what we consider reliable authority, that Commodore Tatnall says the rebels must abandon all their coast defences, for after the sample of firing at Hilton Head by our fleet, nothing they have erected can stand before it.

The abandonment of their strong works on Tybee Island may be considered as confirming this report. The panic throughout the Southern coast from our success at Port Royal is intense and all-pervading. Savannah is nearly depopulated, and the trains go loaded with household and every description of goods, including negroes.

SECESSION ACCOUNT.

FORT PULASKI, November 25, 1861.

I suppose you have heard of affairs down here before this. The enemy appeared around Tybee point about eleven o'clock A. M. yesterday. The sentinel reported them, and the assembly was beat; we were ordered to the guns; there we awaited them. The enemy, composed of a frigate and one gunboat, rounded the point and commenced throwing shot and shell on Tybee. Not having received a reply, they despatched the gunboat for more vessels. About four o'clock the gunboat came back with two more very large vessels; soon after a long train of small boats was seen to leave the vessels and head for the shore. About six o'clock the Federal flag was seen flying on Tybee Island. About seven o'clock at night Captain Read, of the Irish Volunteers, took a squad of his men and went over to the island, and got in sight of the Yankees. He could see them all around the fire; but finding that he could not effect his object, which was to burn the large hospital, there being too many men around the house, he returned and burnt all the houses on his way, including Captain King's large house, also the platform where the boat lands. They also brought off an old negro, the property of Mr. King, which the picket had left. He is now at the fort. This morning the Federal flag could be seen flying on the light-house. There are three large vessels off the point now, and another gunboat has just arrived. The island is naturally protected by large sand hills, which could have protected our men from the shells of the enemy. I think a thousand men could whip them off the island in two hours. The enemy have a foothold on all the Southern States bordering on the Atlantic, but I think they have gained very little by taking Tybee Island. I do not think they can get enough rice and cotton on Tybee to pay the cost of the expedition, as they say they did at Port Royal. We have plenty of ammunition and men, and we defy them to come in range of our guns—we will show them the difference between taking Port Royal and Fort Pulaski.

FORT PULASKI, November 26.

Nothing from the enemy. We can see them constantly communicating with the shore by small boats. There are two propellers and one large side-wheel steamer, which lie off the point in full sight of the fort, and a smaller one that comes and goes constantly between them and a squadron of three vessels lying outside. The United States flag is flying from the light-house, and also from a flagstaff in the old parade-ground formerly used by our troops. Commodore Tatnall, with a portion of the mosquito fleet, is lying about the fort, no doubt chafing under the restraint his limited means impose.

The enemy have established their pickets all around Tybee, as far up as King's Landing. The general impression below is that the Yankees are concentrating their forces, and that as soon as they get a few more vessels over the bar they intend making an attack on Fort Pulaski. The movements of the enemy during the past few days indicate a purpose on their part to get control of this port.

AFFAIR AT PADUCAH, KY.

GENERAL SMITH'S ORDER.

HEAD-QUARTERS UNITED STATES FORCES,
PADUCAH, KY., NOV. 27, 1861. }

General Orders No. 36.

On the afternoon of the 25th inst., a grave breach of discipline was committed by a part of this command, chiefly, if not altogether, by officers and soldiers of the Eleventh Indiana regiment, in the raising of a flag over the house of a resident of this city; not, certainly, by the act of raising our flag, but by the manner of proceeding—the attendant circumstances.

The commanding General desires to address those engaged in this proceeding in a kindly spirit. He is aware they have subjected themselves to prosecution under the Articles of War. He is compelled to denounce the transaction as a great violation of good order and military discipline; but he is inclined to the belief that those engaged in it will, upon reflection, come to regard it in that light themselves. Had it been possible for him to have anticipated its occurrence, it would have been his duty, by all the means at his command, and at every hazard, to have prevented it. The affair is the more mortifying to him from the fact that, in a long military life, it is the first proceeding of a mutinous character that ever happened with troops under his immediate command; that, if his feelings were wounded by the transaction, as he admits they were, he is confident that sensible, intelligent, and generous men, such as he believes compose the command he more especially addresses, will make due allowance for the pride and sensibilities of an officer who has given nearly thirty-seven years of life to the service of his country in the army.

Though the occurrence may subject him to criticism by those placed over him in authority, he is disposed to let it drop without investigation; less, however, for his own sake than that of the persons engaged in it. So disposed on his side, he trusts they will listen patiently to his remonstrances against like occurrences in the future.

In this spirit the commanding General appeals, then, to the intelligence of officers and soldiers. Although Kentucky is full of traitors, her Legislature left her one of the States of the Union; and our forces on her soil are charged with the high mission of protecting her people and sovereignty. More plainly, he desires every soldier, without regard to his position, to know that he is sent here by the Government as the protector of a loyal State, which, though occupied by rebel armies, is not an enemy's country; and that success requires him, by the patient exercise of moderation, obedience, and charity, to earn that character from both friends and foes. We charge the rebels with oppression; is it policy to subject ourselves, our cause, or our flag to like charges? Our boast is that we are fighting for a Government that never harmed a citizen; whose thanks will we earn if we are the first to rob ourselves of that boast?

The General has derived great satisfaction from the soldierly deportment of those he more particularly addresses; and it is hardly enough to say that it grieved him to see them manifest the slightest degree of disorder. All his hopes for the triumph of our flag and its reërection in all the rebellious States, are based upon the discipline of the army; and he feels every blow to that discipline as a blow at the common cause. Upon the restoration of peace, each soldier will go back to the civil pursuits from which he came. How important that he should do so without reproach or shame! Property, liberty, government—every thing precious—has been committed to the army. When the army supplants the commander, or turns from the path of order, or bursts the bands of discipline, it makes itself a thing of terror and ruin. Enthusiasm for the flag is a thing to be encouraged; the General would do every thing in his power to raise it to the highest pitch; yet he calmly asks each soldier to watch its fiery impulse, lest, whilst fitting him for boldness in battle, it does plunge him unguardedly into excesses.

In conclusion, the General asks the soldiers of his command, by their conduct in the future, their gentleness to friends, and their moderation toward unarmed enemies, living under the shadow of our flag, to give him reason to believe they admit the necessity of order and are willing to enforce it. If they will only exercise their intelligence, and not forget the observance of law which so becomes them as citizens will still more become them as soldiers, no complaint will ever be heard against them from any source.

By order of Brig.-Gen. C. F. SMITH.
J. T. PICE, Lieut. and Aide-de-Camp.

THE FIGHT AT FORT PICKENS.

COLONEL BROWN'S REPORT.

HEAD-QUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF FLORIDA, }
FORT PICKENS, NOV. 25, 1861. }

GENERAL: That Fort Pickens has been beleagured by the rebels for the last nine months, and that it was daily threatened with the fate of Sumter, is a fact notorious to the whole world. Since its occupancy by Lieut. Slemmer, the rebels have been surrounding it with batteries, and daily arming them with the heaviest and most efficient guns known to our service—guns stolen from the United States—until they considered this fort as virtually their own, its occupancy being only a question of time.

I have been in command since the 16th of April, and during the whole of that time their force has averaged, so far as I can learn, from eight to ten times the number of mine. The position in which I have thus been placed has been sufficiently trying, and I have at three separate times intended to free myself from it by opening my batteries on them, but imperious circumstances, over which I had no control, has unexpectedly in each instance prevented.

Affairs were in this state on the morning of the 9th of October, when the enemy, fifteen hundred strong, attacked by surprise a portion of my command on an intensely dark night. They were defeated and driven from the island with great loss by less than two hundred regulars and fifty volunteers—all the efficient force I had disposable for the purpose. An insult so gross to the flag of my country, could not by me be passed unnoticed, and I designed immediately to take appropriate notice of it; but, as I said before, circumstances over which I had no control prevented. I make these prefatory remarks to explain why I have now opened my batteries on the enemy, when, from the smallness of my forces, about one-sixth of his, thirteen hundred to eight thousand, I have not the means of producing any decisive results, and as evidence of my having accomplished what I designed—the punishing the perpetrators of an insult on my country's flag.

Having invited Flag-officer McKean to cooperate with me in attacking the rebels, and to which he gave a ready and cordial assent, I, on the morning of the 22d, opened my batteries on the enemy, to which, in the course of half an hour, he responded from his numerous forts and batteries extending from the Navy Yard to Fort McRae, a distance of about four miles, the whole nearly equi-distant from this fort, and on which line he has two forts—McRae and Barrancas—and fourteen separate batteries, containing from one to four guns, many of them being ten inch columbiads and some twelve and thirteen inch sea-coast mortars, the distance varying from two thousand one hundred to two thousand nine hundred yards from this fort. At the same time of my opening, Flag-officer McKean, in the Niagara, and Captain Ellison, in the Richmond, took position as near to Fort McRae as the depth of water would permit, but which unfortunately was not sufficiently deep to give full effect to their powerful batteries. They, however, kept up a spirited fire on the fort and adjacent batteries during the whole day. My fire was incessant from the time of opening until it was too dark to see, at the rate of a shot for each gun every fifteen or twenty minutes, the fire of the enemy being somewhat slower. By noon, the guns of Fort McRae were all silenced but one, and three hours before sunset this fort and the adjoining battery ceased fire. I directed the guns of batteries Lincoln, Cameron, and Totten principally on the batteries adjacent to the Navy Yard, those of Battery Scott to Fort McRae and the lighthouse batteries, and those of the fort to all. We reduced very perceptibly the fire of Barrancas, entirely silenced that in the Navy Yard, and in one or two of the other batteries the efficiency of our fire, at the close of the day, not being the least impaired.

The next morning I again opened about the same hour, the navy, unfortunately, owing to a reduction in the depth of water, caused by a change of wind, not being able to get so near as yesterday, consequently the distance was too great to be effectual. My fire this day was less rapid, and I think more efficient, than that of yesterday. Fort McRae, so effectually silenced yesterday, did not fire again to-day. We silenced entirely one or two guns, and had one of ours disabled by a shot coming through the embrasure.

About three o'clock fire was communicated to one of the houses in Warrington, and shortly afterwards to the church steeple, the church and the whole village being immediately in rear of some of the rebel batteries, they apparently having placed them purposely directly in front of the largest and most valuable buildings. The fire rapidly communicated to other buildings along the street, until probably two-thirds of it was consumed; and about the same time fire was discovered issuing from the back part of the Navy Yard, probably in Wolcott, a village to the north and immediately adjoining the yard, as Warrington does on the west. Finally, it penetrated to the yard, and as it continued to burn brightly all night I concluded that either in it or in Wolcott many buildings were destroyed. Very heavy damage was also done to the buildings of the yard by the avalanche of shot, shell, and splinters showered unceasingly on them for two days, and being nearly fireproof, being built of brick and covered with slate, I could not succeed in firing them, my hot shot nor shells not having any power of igniting them.

The steamer Time, which was at the wharf at the time, was abandoned on the first day and exposed to our fire, which probably entirely disabled her. The fire was again continued till dark, and with mortars occasionally until two o'clock the next morning, when the combat ceased.

This fort, at its conclusion, though it has received a great many shot and shell, is in every respect, save the disabling of one gun-carriage and the loss of service of six men, as efficient as it was at the commencement of the combat; but the ends I proposed in commencing having been attained, except one, which I find to be impracticable with my present means, I do not deem it advisable further to continue it, unless the enemy think it proper to do so, when I shall meet him with alacrity.

The attack on "Billy Wilson's" camp, the attempted attack on my batteries, and the insult to our glorious flag, have been fully and fearfully avenged. I have no means of knowing the loss of the enemy, and have no disposition to guess at it. The firing on his batteries was very heavy, well directed, and continuous for two days, and could hardly fail of having important results.

Our loss would have been heavy, but for the foresight which, with great labor, caused us to erect elaborate means of protection, and which saved many lives. I lost one private killed, one sergeant, one corporal, and four men (privates) wounded, only one severely.

My officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates were every thing I could desire. They one and all performed their duty with the greatest cheerfulness, and in the most able and efficient manner. I am much indebted to Major Arnold, my executive officer, for his valuable assistance—his whole conduct was admirable; and Captains Allen, Chalfin, Blunt, Robertson, Hildt, and Duryea, and Lieutenants McFarland, Langdon, Clossin, Shipley, Jackson, Pennington, Seeley, and Taylor, merit my warmest encomiums for the coolness and deliberation with which they performed, without one exception, their duty under a heavy continuous shower of shot, shells, and splinters for two successive days. Lieutenant Todd, ordnance officer, had full supplies of all required articles, which were on hand at the post, and his department was conducted with system and efficiency. Major Tower, Surgeon Campbell, and Assistant Surgeon Sutherland, in their respective duties, sustained their high reputations. Captains Robertson, Duryea, and Blunt, and Lieutenants Pennington and Seeley respectively commanded batteries Lincoln, Scott, Totten, and Cameron, and a small battery at Spanish Fort, and the other officers batteries in the fort with distinguished ability. Captains Dobies' and Bailey's companies were with the batteries at Lincoln and Cameron, and did their duty faithfully and efficiently. The companies of Captains Renberer and Duffy, of the Sixth regiment New York Volunteers, were successively on duty at the fort, and rendered cheerfully important assistance to me. The regular companies engaged at the batteries, all of whom performed their duty so efficiently as to preclude my making a distinction, are Companies A, F, and L, First Artillery, C, H and K, Second Artillery, and O and E, Third Infantry, and Companies G and I, Sixth regiment New York Volunteers.

In closing, I tender to Flag Officer McKean and Captain Ellison of the Navy, and to their officers and crews my best thanks for their able cooperation, which would have had the happiest results but for the unfortunate fact that great draft of water prevented their sufficiently near approach to the works of the rebels.

I am, General, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
 HARVEY BROWN,
 Colonel Commanding.

HEAD-QUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF FLORIDA, }
 FORT PICKENS, Nov. 23, 1861. }

GENERAL: The bombardment of the 22d and 23d has elicited some facts that are of importance, and I notice them that we may in future benefit by them.

First—That with the most efficient guns of the largest calibre and served in the best manner, no serious injury can be done to stone or brick walls, or to guns in sand batteries, or to troops serving them, unless probably by rifled guns, if properly protected, at a distance of from two thousand to three thousand yards.

Second—That shells and hot shot are not to be depended on for firing even wooden buildings, unless having in them incendiary composition.

Third—That pieces of port fire are nearly useless as such incendiary composition.

Fourth—That brick buildings covered with slate cannot be fired by either hot shot or shells at the distance named, unless by accident, unless the shells have rock-fires.

Fifth—That the trouble and expense incurred in protecting forts by sand-bag traverses, etc., is far more than repaid by the saving of the lives of the defenders.

Sixth—That no dependence is to be placed on James' rifle projectiles, either as it respects accuracy or range. If I had had guns to be depended on, I could have silenced the most of the enemy's sand-batteries and the guns in Barrancas.

Seventh—That ships with their present armament cannot for an hour contend against rifled guns, and that if our navy is not at once supplied liberally with good rifled guns it will be very likely to be disgraced.

Eighth—That on service here, and I believe the remark applies with equal force to every river and harbor in the Gulf, a gunboat drawing six feet water and well armed with good rifled guns can do more and better service than a forty-gun ship, or than such ships as the Niagara and Richmond.

Ninth—That sail vessels are utterly useless in enforcing a blockade.

Tenth—That Parrott's rifled guns are efficient, and that forts should be immediately supplied with them, and with a full supply of ammunition.

I would strongly urge that a dozen of Parrott's thirty-pounders, or, if to be had, of larger calibre, be sent to this post, with a good supply of ammunition, as early as possible. I had one which I found to be excellent, but when the navy met with such a mishap in the Mississippi, I was compelled to let Flag Officer McKean have it, and one of my twelve-pounder Parrott guns, to put on one of his ships to save them from being driven out of the waters by a little steamer having a rifled gun on board.

I am, General, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
HARVEY BROWN,
Colonel Commanding.

The following is the conclusion of the official report of Colonel Harvey Brown :

HEAD-QUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF FLORIDA,
FORT PICKENS, November 25, 1861. }

GENERAL: It is with much pain that, after the wonderful escape of my command from the missiles of the enemy, I have to report to you a most melancholy accident, the result of gross carelessness, which has just occurred.

In order to prevent accidents, I ordered all the shot and shell of the enemy to be collected, fearing that the men might tamper with some of the loaded shells. This was accordingly being done, when one of the men tried to empty a shell by knocking it against another, he being surrounded by a crowd. An explosion ensued, followed by that of another shell, instantly killing five and wounding seven others, to wit:—

Killed.—Sergeant Thomas Conroy, Co. L, First Artillery; Privates: Louis Hay, Co. L, First Artillery; Thos. Poole, Co. L, First Artillery; Michael Ready, Co. L, First Artillery; Frederick Verger, Co. C, Third Infantry.

Wounded.—Privates: J. Buckley, Co. L, First Artillery, badly; Wm. Shaeffer, Co. L, First Artillery, badly; Daniel Slater, Co. A, First Artillery, seriously; John McBride, Co. E, Third Infantry, dangerously; Daniel Crontey, Co. E, Third Infantry, slightly; Wm. Gill, Co. E, Third Infantry, slightly; Sylvanus Morgan, Co. E, Third Infantry, badly.

I am, General, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
HARVEY BROWN,
Colonel Commanding.

A DETAILED ACCOUNT, BY AN OFFICER OF THE NIAGARA.

On Wednesday, the 20th November, it became pretty generally known among us, that the flag officer had made up his mind to commence the bombardment of Pensacola, providing that Col. Brown was ready; and as we knew that the colonel only waited for the Flag's action, we felt pretty certain that the ball would be opened at once. I need not tell you that all hands were up to "concert-pitch," and as eager to commence, as you at the North have been anxious to have us; and although we felt sure that some formidable masked batteries would disclose themselves, we were ready to find out where they were, and try the effects of our eleven-inch guns in silencing them.

The object was to destroy the Navy Yard, so as to put a stop to their use of government property and tools in building any more extensive means of defence, and to batter down some of their fortifications. Orders were given to our engineers to place bags filled with coal around such portions of the machinery as were exposed to shot, and nearly all the work was done which is necessary to "prepare ship for action."

Early on the morning of the 21st, the flag officer went on shore to confer with Col. Brown in regard to preliminaries. At twelve o'clock he returned, and then we received orders to complete all necessary arrangements. Orders were despatched to the Richmond and Montgomery, then in port, giving them directions how to act, and the word was passed that we should move in at daylight, so as to engage Fort McRea, the water-battery, and the sand-battery, just in front of McRea, all three of which could bring their guns to bear upon either Fort Pickens or the shipping.

We could form no idea of the strength of these places, but it was highly important that we should draw their fire, as they enfiladed the parapet guns of Pickens. It had been arranged, that as soon as the steamers came down from Pensacola to the Navy Yard, the fort was to open fire upon them, so as to sink them if possible, and cut off all means of bringing down reinforcements from the town, and the first gun from the fort was to be the signal for us to move in and open fire. Orders were passed to have sufficient food for the day cooked before eight o'clock in the morning, and at a late hour we turned in to dream of terrible battles and hair-breadth escapes.

By sunrise on the morning of the 22d we were all ready. Our boats had been hoisted out and moored alongside, shot and shell got up, and steam all ready to move in at short notice. The usual morning prayer was offered up, the chaplain imploring a blessing upon the events of the day, after which the flag officer addressed a few words to the men in his usual clear, quick, come-to-the-point manner. He urged upon them "strict obedience to all orders, coolness, judgment, and precision in firing." The answer was three hearty cheers.

About half-past nine we could see the steamers coming down to the Navy Yard, little suspecting that their doom was sealed. In a very short time they were fast to the dock, and at just twelve minutes of ten we saw a smoke issue from Fort Pickens, and heard the booming of the gun. A cheer burst forth from our men, and if ever a ship's anchor came up lively, it was ours then.

In order to bring our guns within range, it was necessary for us to run into very shoal water, and consequently it required the utmost caution in working the ship. Even with a perfectly smooth sea, there would be only twenty inches of water under our keel, and if it should begin to blow, or a heavy swell set in, it was necessary for us to have the ship in such a position that we could easily run into deeper water.

While working our way in, the Richmond came up under our stern, and as she draws less water than we do, the Commodore ordered her to go in and, open fire as soon as she was within range. She passed by us, took a position nearer to the land and opened fire. Meantime, the water battery and Fort McRea were doing their best to frighten us, by throwing shot that fell about a mile short. We kept on steadily until we thought that we were within range, and then came to anchor.

Our first shot was from the eighty-four pound rifle, and it told with very good effect. The next was from a eleven-inch gun, but it fell short. A few more were fired, but with much the same result. Finding that we were too far off, a boat was sent out in charge of the master, in order to sound, and having found that we could get in somewhat closer without the water shoaling much more, we hove up anchor, and ran in about one-fourth of a mile further. During the time that our boat was out sounding, several of their shots came very near it, but fortunately none hit.

We now again opened fire from our broad-side guns, and this time to some purpose. Almost every shot told, and there must have been a fearful scattering of pieces, as our shell exploded over their heads. I do not think there was ever any target practice in the Navy, that can show such a record of effective shots. The rebels were constantly throwing shot at us, and seemed to be either increasing the charge of powder, or else getting more elevation, for their shot gradually came nearer, though it was not until late in the afternoon that we were struck.

By twelve o'clock, both the Richmond and Niagara, together with the guns bearing from Fort Pickens and Battery Scott, were all playing into Fort McRea and its surrounding batteries. We averaged one shell every three minutes, and as the Richmond had more guns, though smaller, and more than our number of guns were being served from Santa Rosa, there was about two shell each minute being fired at this point.

About one o'clock a firing commenced from a masked battery which disclosed itself in the woods along the shore, and about a mile south of McRea. They seemed to have a particular spite against us, by the pertinacity with which they fired at us; but finding that they could not reach us, they turned their attention to the Richmond, which was nearer in shore. Many of their shot came very close to the latter, and had they been well directed would have done a great deal of damage. Only one took effect, however, and I regret to record that this killed one man and wounded seven. The man killed was captain of the gun, and was in the act of taking aim when struck. The wounded were but slightly hurt. The battery of the Richmond was now brought to bear upon the hidden rebels, but I do not think it did much execution, as most of her shot were seen to fall short. About five o'clock she hauled out.

At two o'clock, a shell from one of our guns set fire to a frame house in the rear of McRea, and much of the time the fort has been enveloped in a cloud of smoke. Soon after this fire broke out, their flag-staff was shot away, and the symbol of treachery came down by the run. Subsequently it was raised again.

About three o'clock, one or two shots passed over us and dropped into the water, and by the note which they sang as they passed, we knew that they had turned some heavier metal upon us. Two or three of our guns were directed to the spot whence the smoke was seen to issue, and if they treated us to music, we returned the compliment with interest. They succeeded in planting two shots in our sides, making rather ugly holes, and upsetting things in one of the lieutenant's rooms. By six o'clock we must have dismounted the gun, for at that time McRea ceased firing altogether, and for one hour and a half we tumbled shell after shell inside of her walls, without any response. We could hardly believe that we had silenced them so soon, but thought that they must be at work in preparing some larger gun for our benefit.

We ceased firing at half-past five, it having become too dark to get good aim. Our whole number of shell fired was one hundred and eighty; of these, forty-three were filled with sand, an expedient sometimes used in breaching a wall. The shots which struck us proved to be from an eight inch columbiad. At six o'clock we got up anchor and steamed out to a safer anchorage, and then all hands began to find out that they were very tired and hungry. All begrimed and black with powder, our nostrils filled with smoke and heads nearly splitting from so much noise, we were glad enough to go below and take a little rest, as well as to try the effects of a little supper.

Our men have done nobly; too much cannot be said in their praise. When the rebel shots would come near us, they would grumble out a howl of derision, and when each shot was fired in return, it seemed as though every man of that particular gun's crew would shut his teeth in defiance, and his look fairly expressed, "take that, you cowardly skunks." The most of our crew are old man-o'-war's men, and were considered a "picked crew" at the time the ship was commissioned to go to Japan, and at that time sailors were plenty. It is no kind of use for an officer to attempt to teach these men how to shoot. Just give them both a gun, and the man will beat the officer so badly that he will be very glad to resign.

After we had become well engaged in the fight, we hardly thought of or had time to look at Fort Pickens. Once in a while I would cast a glance that way, and I could see that the semi-circle of batteries were keeping up a constant explosion of shell over loyal walls; while from out her sides there came a steady stream of white smoke, and I could see that the shots took good effect. We had already made two good holes in McRea, and Pickens had knocked a hole that a horse and cart might enter in.

A letter dated November 23, says:

As I commence to write to-night, the whole sky is illuminated by the burning of the town of Warrington and the Navy Yard. The former has been burning since two p. m., but the latter has just taken fire. The sight is grand, sublime, any thing you choose to call it, only we are too tired to look at it. The forts and batteries have just ceased firing. Fort Pickens must have fired over one thousand shot and shell to-day.

All hands were on deck this morning as soon as it was light, and in the best of spirits, notwithstanding the change in the temperature. During the night there came up a heavy rain-storm, and the wind shifted from the southwest to the northwest, and now overcoats are quite comfortable to us who have lived so long in the tropics. The wind blew quite fresh, and as it was off shore, we feared it would blow the water seaward, so as to render it impossible for us to get our position of yesterday. Boats were sent in to sound, and we found we could get there, but there would be only ten inches of water under us. As the sea was very smooth, we determined to try it.

About sunrise, we saw a large body of men leave Fort McRea, and go towards the navy yard, and we conjectured, from the looks of the batteries, that they were a "relief," who had been at work during the night. When our boat returned, the officer reported that he could see a new battery in the woods, and that higher embankments had been thrown up in front of the others.

All hands had a good warm breakfast, and at nine o'clock went to prayers. At half-past nine signals were made to Fort Pickens, and at ten we weighed anchor and steamed in nearly to our position. The Richmond did not go in at all, as the flag-officer did not think her shot took sufficient effect to pay for being badly out up. As soon as we approached, the new battery in the wood disclosed itself, and although it burst shell very near us, it could not do us much harm. The other battery in the wood now consists of two pieces. Fort Pickens opened fire a little after ten. We came to anchor at ten forty, and fired the first gun at ten forty-five. At this time all the batteries were hard at work. There were between forty and fifty guns playing into Fort Pickens. As we expected, masked batteries had disclosed themselves all along the beach.

Our firing was very slow, owing to our inability to reach them, except with the rifled gun. The wind, which was quite strong, was directly against us, and very much in favor of the rebels. The charges of powder were increased from fifteen to seventeen pounds, and still our shots fell short. About a dozen of their shells have exploded quite near enough for comfort. The men seem to have taken matters quite coolly to-day. The commodore, in his address this morning, told them he did not want so many lookers-on to be on deck. Said he, "One watch go below and sleep, and be ready to relieve the other when wanted."

As I passed along the berth-deck, I saw many of them stretched out, fast asleep, and not a few playing backgammon and checkers. Finding that all our shots fell short, we weighed anchor at half-past two, and moved in a little closer. Hardly had we dropped it, before a shot went whizzing in between our smoke pipes, and dropped in the water half a mile the other side of us. Immediately there came another, and then another, and while they came over us, thick and fast, our guns returned the compliment. But it was no use; our shot all fell short. The wind was too strong, and our ship was dangerously near the bottom.

The charges of powder were increased to twenty pounds, five more than the regular charge, and finding that that did us no good, we weighed anchor and stood out. Even after we had moved out a long distance, several of the shots of this new gun came directly over our quarter. It could have been no other than a ten-inch columbiad, or else one of the rifled 120-pounders said to have been brought over by the Bermuda. One of our men says he could hear it say, "Secesh-secesh-secesh, se-chong," as it landed in the water. Had one of the secesh villains hit us, it would have bored us through and through.

We got out of their reach at last, and then we had the satisfaction of watching the grand conflagration. If the wind changes and we can get in, we shall give them an opportunity to try their guns again on Monday. We have fired about seventy-five shells to-day. No one has been hurt on our ship. News has come from Fort Pickens, and we learn that they are in excellent spirits. That rebel friend of ours was turned upon the fort, and managed to partially dismount a ten-inch gun, wounding six men, one of whom is fatally injured. No other casualties. The gun was soon remounted. Col. Brown says he shall not open fire to-morrow unless they first fire upon him, so that altogether likely the Sabbath will indeed be a day of rest. Some may think it foolishness, but I do not believe we shall lose any thing.

A letter dated November 25, says:

During Saturday and Sunday nights we could see the camp-fires of two or three parties on shore, who are doubtless engaged in erecting batteries for our reception, but I do not think it is the commodore's intention to engage them. They have strewed their fortifications all along the beach, and contain only one or two guns in each, while at the same time they are protected by the woods. To silence such fellows, it is necessary to have a ship for each one, and even then I doubt if it could be accomplished. It requires a landing party, and a force sufficient to take possession of the whole place.

The Richmond received a serious damage in the action of Friday, although at the time it was not considered to be much. A shot struck her just about the water-line and penetrated the side, landing in one of the purser's store-rooms. Yesterday she gained three feet of water, notwithstanding the steam pumps were kept in operation constantly. It will be necessary to send her to Key West, and as she goes to-day, I hasten to send you this letter, in hopes it may reach you at an early date.

I question whether Col. Brown will attempt to do much more. He has effected his purpose—that of destroying the winter-quarters of the rebels, and although they succeeded in putting out the fire in the Navy Yard, he has shown them that it will be a very unsafe operation to commence work there again, as he can and will set fire to it again, if they make the attempt.

SECESSION ACCOUNTS.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Mobile Register, says:

This morning, (Nov. 22,) at precisely ten o'clock by my time-piece, without warning or intimation, the guns of Fort Pickens opened on the gunboat Nelms, steamer Time, and the little Cushman—the two latter lying at the foot of Central wharf, the Nelms in the basin of the dry dock.

The Federals fired a number of guns before our batteries replied; when they opened, under the joint explosions, the earth and water seemed agitated at their terrible voices. The houses of Pensacola shook at the earthquake voices of innumerable batteries, and soon the buildings by the water side, the sandy beach and the long wharves, projecting far into the bay, were thronged with soldiers, citizens, strangers and ladies, under such excitement as only war's dangers and alarms could produce.

The gunboat Nelms, in command of Lieut. Munston, of the Louisiana infantry, quit the basin under a shower of shot and shell, and proceeded in the direction of the Floridians, who are stationed at or near Town Point, on the main land, and opposite the city. From a front position on the bay, we witnessed her departure from the yard; the enemy for many minutes devoted their whole energies to her destruction, bomb-shells and rifle balls falling like autumn leaves over and around her. Once we thought a bomb had fallen on her deck. She was almost hid from view by smoke; fortunately it overreached her, causing only a slight disfiguration of her railing. She fired from her little piece two shots at Billy Wilson's batteries, and proceeded on to the Florida camp.

ELEVEN O'CLOCK A. M.—The Nelms has arrived at her wharf, and Capt. Keys reports the facts as above stated, except that he is not certain whether it was the sand-batteries or Fort Pickens opened the ball. Whether Billy or Brown, they were in dead earnest. The steamer Time still occupies her position, apparently unhurt. Had the effort been made, it is thought by those on the Nelms she might have got out and come to the city. Of this we will probably learn more when Capt. Wingate comes up.

The fleet, consisting of the Colorado and Niagara, it is thought, and a gunboat, have moved down from Wilson's camp to the mouth of the bar, and are, as well as we can discern, delivering broadsides at Fort McRae. Up to this hour, we had no messenger from the yard, save a little newsboy, who, according to his own story, "cut stick" at the first gun.

TWELVE O'CLOCK.—Fort Pickens and the island batteries are answering our guns with ferocity. Our forts and batteries replied with equal alacrity—we trust to God with killing effect. There is no abatement in the city excitement, and every now and then a shout from citizens and soldiers falls on the ear. Preparations are making by some to send their sick families up the road. No fears are entertained of the enemy's success.

TWO O'CLOCK.—Mr. Myers has arrived; he left the yard at eleven o'clock. The steamer Time, it is thought, is not much injured, but under range of the enemy's big guns. Her loss just now is unbearable; steam power in the bay is quite limited. Capts. Lanier and Crump have all their teams strung out, and communication with the lines will be kept up by wagon trains. The Colorado and Niagara are still thundering away at the Barrancas and Fort McRae.

FIVE O'CLOCK.—Another gentleman from just below says that it was reported among the outer camps that the wife of a sergeant-major had been killed in the yard.

A despatch says our guns and batteries have suffered no injury.

The firing is still heavy on both sides.

The frigates have changed their position, and are not discernible from the city.

PENSACOLA, Saturday noon, Nov. 23, 1861.

The bombardment commenced again this morning from the enemy's side at eleven o'clock. Our batteries instantly replied, and ever since there has been incessant firing, but with what effect we are unable to ascertain, as there has been no reliable messenger from the yard. Of course there are rumors, and absurd ones at that, flying in every direction.

Our loss up to the present time is only five killed and twelve wounded. The loss has been generally at Fort McRae. Col. Villipigue, of the Georgia and Mississippi Regiment, is among the latter; his wound is slight.

The steamer Time was spirited away last night from the yard; the Yankees knew nothing of her escape until this morning. She has marks of being rather roughly handled, though not severely damaged. Several rifle shots passed through her upper works. Her machinery is uninjured. She had on board a large quantity of commissary and quartermaster stores, which are unharmed.

A gentleman from Warrington and the Navy Yard has just come up. He left at three o'clock, and reports that one or two persons had been killed at the yard, and that some of the buildings had been materially injured. A long train of government wagons had just entered the yard when the firing commenced. A number of animals were killed—the darkies quit their teams, and such a scramble for safe places was never witnessed since that of Bull Run.

At two o'clock, some houses in the yard, or below it, are on fire. The enemy are throwing hot shot. There are but few wooden buildings in the yard. It is said a number of them are slightly injured.

The fleet have been pretty much all day paying their respects to the yard and the batteries at Warrington.

Gen. Bragg visited the batteries yesterday after the action commenced. He expresses himself delighted with men and guns, and is confident of success.

Several sail of vessels are in sight—one of them a large steam frigate.

I have just learned by the glass that the fire in Warrington is the Baptist Church.

P. S.—The Episcopal Church and the new marine barracks are on fire, as well as we can make out with the glass.

I forgot to mention in the proper place that the enemy ceased firing yesterday evening at six o'clock. Gen. Bragg stopped only on account of a severe storm of rain and wind.

PENSACOLA, Monday, Nov. 25.

Every thing is unusually quiet. The enemy's shipping keep beyond our range. No additional fleet has arrived. Our killed and wounded on Friday, by the caving in of the magazine at Fort McRae, numbered eleven persons. No casualties since."

The Pensacola Observer says of the fight: While we are not able to give the full particulars of the casualties, &c., of the fight, we are prepared to correct some errors we were led into by Madame Rumor. It was not the Niagara, but the Colorado, that was injured in the engagement, and she has "hailed off," a silenced old wreck, having learned by experience that Little boats must keep near shore,

But larger ones may venture more

Nearly the whole of Warrington has been reduced to ashes by the enemy's shot and shell. None of our batteries are injured, and among the buildings destroyed are the St. John's and the Catholic churches. The houses occupied by the officers are only slightly damaged. As to the injury done the enemy, any report made is all speculation, and no reliable or truthful statements have come from there yet. All our batteries have been worked with great credit to those in charge of them. On yesterday there were thirteen of Abe's vessels in sight, but from their tardiness in commencing the fight this morning we are led to believe that "somebody is hurt." A gentleman just from Warrington confirms the report that the firing of the enemy is very bad, and of very little effect. He says he counted over twenty shells lying there on a street, none of them having exploded.

The correspondent of the Columbus (Ga.) Sun says: General Bragg says he cannot make out what old Brown is after. He has been firing for eighteen hours consecutively, and has done us no injury. Not a soul was hurt yesterday, and no damage was done to our works. General Bragg thinks Brown's firing yesterday was ridiculous. One-half of their shells would not explode, and the Navy Yard is piled with them. You can walk over them, they are so thick. We cannot ascertain what damage we have done. Our aim was deliberate and our fire slow. Every gun did execution, and our shells burst always just over Fort Pickens. Our boys would fire a big gun and then jump on it and give cheers. They are perfectly delighted at the fun. The force engaged has been McCrae's and Wheat's, and another battery, all from Louisiana and Mississippi. The enemy attempted a landing at Perdido River on Sunday night, but were most signally repulsed by our gallant troops there. A negro wagon driver was at McRae this morning when the firing commenced, and said he would drive his team to headquarters if Pickens killed him and every mule he had. A shot killed one of his mules; he cut it loose and drove the remainder safely through. General Bragg says he intends to mention him in his report to the Government.

Another correspondent writes: The bombardment was kept up nearly all last night, and, from all the information I can gather, with very little damage to our side. It is said that there are three breaches in Pickens, and the Niagara attempted to run in yesterday, but received a heavy shot in her bow, and turned round, when she was raked in the stern, and it is supposed she is disabled. The general impression is that Bragg is fighting slowly, but safely and surely—not wasting a shot, and holding batteries in reserve that they know nothing of.

CONGRATULATORY ORDER OF GEN. BRAGG.
General Order No. 130:

HEAD-QUARTERS ARMY OF PENSACOLA, }
Near PENSACOLA, Fla., Nov. 26, 1861. }

The signal success which has crowned our forty hours' conflict with the arrogant and confident enemy—whose government, it seems, is hourly looking for an announcement of his success in capturing our position—should fill our hearts with gratitude to a merciful Providence. This terrific bombardment of more than a hundred guns of the heaviest calibre—causing the very earth to tremble around us—has, from the wild firing of the enemy, resulted in the loss of only seven lives, with eight wounded; but two of them seriously—five of the deaths from an accident, and but two from the enemy's shot. We have crippled their ships and driven them off, and forced the garrison of Fort Pickens, in its impotent rage, to slake its revenge by firing on our hospital, and burning the habitations of our innocent women and children, who have been driven therefrom by an unannounced storm of shot and shell. For the coolness, devotion, and conspicuous gallantry of the troops, the General tenders his cordial thanks; but for the precision of their firing, in this their first practice, which would have done credit to veterans, he is unable to express his admiration. Their country and their enemy will both remember the 22d and 23d of November.

By command of Major-General BRAGG,
GEO. G. GARNER, Ass't Adj't-General.

BURNING OF THE ROYAL YACHT.

LIEUT. JOUETT'S REPORT.

UNITED STATES FRIGATE Santee, }
Off GALVESTON BAR, TEXAS, Nov. 14, 1861. }

SIR: In obedience to your orders of the 7th instant, I took the first and second launches, and at twenty minutes to twelve P. M. that day, proceeded into the harbor, intending, if we could pass the armed schooner guarding the channel, and the Bolivar and Point Forts, to try to surprise and burn the man-of-war steamer General Rusk, lying under Pelican Island Fort.

We succeeded in passing the schooner and two forts, but in attempting to avoid the sentinels on Pelican Fort we grounded on Bolivar Spit. At this juncture we were discovered. Deeming it imprudent, after discovery, to encounter so large a vessel and one so heavily armed and manned, I determined to abandon that portion of the expedition. As had been my intention, in returning we boarded, and, after a sharp conflict, captured the armed schooner Royal Yacht. We took a few stand of arms, thirteen prisoners, and her colors. As our pilot was shot down, and the schooner had received a shell between wind and water, I did not deem it advisable to attempt to bring her out; we therefore burned her, after spiking her gun, a light thirty-two-pounder. After this we returned to the ship. I regret to state that one man was killed, two officers and six men wounded, one of whom has since died.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES E. JOUETT,
Lieutenant United States Navy.

To Capt. HENRY EAGLE,
Commanding United States frigate Santee.

The following are the orders to Lieutenant Jouett:

UNITED STATES FRIGATE Santee, }
Off GALVESTON BAR, TEXAS, Nov. 7, 1861. }

GENTLEMEN: Having volunteered for this expedition, you will take the first and second launches, and make all necessary preparations to proceed to-night towards the harbor, and capture the armed schooner which appears off this harbor nightly, apparently watching for an opportunity to escape.

Should you succeed in capturing her, you will use your discretion in regard to making an attempt on the steamer Gen. Rusk. She is lying at a wharf near Pelican Island. If any alarm be given during the attempt to capture the schooner, you will return immediately. You can either destroy the schooner or bring her to the ship; you will exercise your own judgment in regard to this.

I am, respectfully, yours,

HENRY EAGLE, Captain.

Lieut. JAMES E. JOUETT, U. S. N., to command the expedition; Lieut. JOHN G. MITCHELL, U. S. N., to take charge of the second launch.

NEW YORK "TIMES" ACCOUNT.

Off GALVESTON, TEXAS, Sunday, Nov. 10, 1861. }

As I was a witness in most that took place on the night on which the Royal Yacht was burned, (the 7th,) you will perhaps like to have a sketch of the proceedings. The question was mooted as to the armed schooner being allowed to come out every night and anchoring in the channel, between the forts Bolivar—a new fort just erected—Point Fort, Galveston Fort, Pelican Island, and Pelican Spit Fort, which mounts three guns. On the 7th Mr. Jouett went aloft, and after a long survey of the harbor, &c., came down and proposed to the captain to take the two launches and good crews, go in, if he could pass the guard-schooner unseen, and burn the man-of-war Gen. Rusk, carrying four guns and a large crew. I heard him say to the captain, "I'll not attempt the Gen. Rusk unless I can surprise her. If I am discovered by the schooner I'll abandon my design upon the steamer, and fall back and take the schooner. It would be madness to attempt the steamer if discovered." So thought the captain, who gave Lieut. Jouett liberal instructions, permitting him to act in accordance with his own judgment in all matters.

Volunteer crews were soon found, dressed in blue frocks and white cap-covers, to designate the crews. The watch-word was "Wabash;" the word to fall back to the boats, "Santee." Each man was designated to do some specific duty, just suited to his character. Loaded shells, port-fires, fire-balls, slow-matches, were all got ready. As soon as it was dark, the boats were hoisted out, and the guns placed in them—ten rounds of shrapnell, ten of canister—every thing that could be was attended to. Those who had friends, &c., wrote and left letters with their messmates. The first launch and the expedition under Jas. E. Jouett, of Kentucky, assisted by Mr. William Carter, our young and efficient little gunner; second launch, Lieut. John G. Mitchell, and assisted by Mr. Adams, Master's Mate, composed the force engaged.

By half-past eleven p. m., each man being armed with a cutlass and a Colt's revolver, they started, all of us bidding them good-by. They went merrily over the side.

It was seven miles, through an intricate channel and reef. The crews pulled in for the channel, and after two and a quarter hours' hard work, against head sea, wind, and tide, saw the schooner, which they avoided by steering close to the Point Fort. They then steered over to the northward, to avoid Galveston, Pelican Island, and Spit Forts, and the steamer, as they wanted to get ahead and drop down on her, as she was lying at the wharf, under Pelican Fort. The wind and tide was strong here, and in attempting to avoid the sentinels on the fort and steamer, the boats grounded hard on a shoal not laid down in the charts. At this time they were discovered. Lights were exchanged on each fort, lanterns were flying from place to place, and the steamer was all alive. The capture of the steamer was reluctantly abandoned, as Lieut. Jouett deemed it madness to attempt it. So he gave them the order, "Pull for the schooner. Second launch will board her on starboard bow—first on starboard beam"—as he said he thought her gun would be trained on the port beam to seaward, and they would have to slew it before firing; by that time they would be upon them. When they grounded they were in close quarters, in the immediate neighborhood of and in the cross-fire of four forts and the steamer; but they did not stop for that. With a strong wind and tide with them, in five minutes they made the schooner ahead. All was cool, and not a word spoken, save an occasional low order from Lieut. J., "Give away, men." "Ready with the gun, Mr. Carter." From a stentorian voice comes, "Boat, ahoy!" three times; "Give away, strong, boys!" "Fire, Mr. Carter!" The man had held the primer in his hand, and it was damp; the gun missed. Then came the quick, energetic orders, "Give away quick; trail oars; stand by to board." At that time Mr. Carter had again primed, and, Mr. Jouett keeping the boat as she was, the gun was fired, hitting the Royal Yacht at the water-line. The discharge of the gun then frustrated their boarding, as it kicked the boat back. At this time the schooner's crew gave them a warm volley, disabling two good men—one the pilot, and another favorite man,

John L. Emmerson, whom Mr. Jouett caught and laid down. Our men had opened on them with revolvers, and had driven some of them below.

At this juncture, when the first launchers were in the act of boarding, up came the second launch, and taking the men standing up in the first launch over the schooner's decks for the enemy, opened on them, when Lieut. J., deeming the second launchers worse than the enemy, cried to his crew to lie down until that shower of balls passed, he running forward and hauling the first launch close up to the schooner.

When the shower of balls had passed, he cried, "Now's your time, boys; up and board"—he leading by leaping upon the stern of the schooner. As he was rushing forward to the fore-hatch, where most of the crew were, a rebel from the cabin-hatch thrust a sword-bayonet on a pole through his right arm, into his right side, knocking him partly off his feet—then tried to push him overboard; but he says he frustrated him in that, as he sprang forward, grabbing the pike with his left hand, and, not stopping to pull it from his arm, broke it around the hatch close to the man's hand, striking at him as his head went below the hatch, and threw it overboard; then ran forward, telling four men to guard the cabin-hatch and fasten down the scuttle. As Edward Conway (a gunner's mate) was doing this, a man from the port side the main-mast took a chance at his back, inflicting a broad, deep wound.

This same fellow killed Garcia after he had received three pistol wounds. They soon cleared the decks, getting them all below.

In the confusion of boarding, &c., the lantern had gone out, also the slow-matches, and there was no fire to light the port-fires, &c. Mr. Jouett called for the fire-balls and shells, as the schooner's crew would not come up; so, rather than risk his men, he sent a messenger down in the shape of a shell, filled with eighty balls. The threat was enough; they came up then quick. The men wanted to kill them, and had they known that Mr. J. was wounded, I think they would have taken a private chance at them. But he told them in a decided manner, "If you touch one of them, you'll feel the weight of my arm. They are prisoners of war." The men placed them in the boat. Some of the men said they noticed Mr. Jouett holding his side, passing his hand over his eyes, and staggering. He has since said he was quite blind, but did not want his men to know it, as they were in a dangerous position, and his pilot was badly wounded.

As soon as Mr. Carter (whom Mr. Jouett speaks of with great admiration) had lighted the forward cabin or hold, he gave Mr. J. a fire-brand up the hatch, and throwing that down the cabin and following it, soon started the celebrated captain Tom Chubbs up, with six others; he then lighted three berths and came up. He could not bring the vessel out of the harbor, as the pilot (George Bell) was wounded. She was filling slowly with water, the Dahlgren shell having gone through her, and the steamboats lying at the city might come and cut them off if they missed the channel, so he burned her after taking a number of arms, thirteen prisoners, spiking a thirty-two-pound gun of thirty-three hundred weight, and her pennant and flag. The flag will be sent to Washington. Lieutenant Jouett says a heart-rending sight met him on gaining the boat—seven of his best men were drowned. When he had sent all the well men to the oars, he got down in the bottom of the boat and got water for them, then made them as comfortable as he could. He seated his prisoners as he wanted them, and bade them not move unless by his permission. He gave the coxswain the course "South" by a star, as they did not find the compass taken from the schooner for some time, with a head wind (it had shifted to S. E.) and head sea. After four hours' hard labor, during all of which time Lieutenant Jouett was stanching up his wound by thrusting into it his flannel shirt, the men reached the ship.

Fifteen minutes after the first launch made the trip, the second launch came in with one prisoner, a wounded man from the first launch, and one man dead—Garcia (sea.) Six men were badly wounded, and one killed, and two officers wounded.

Had they succeeded in getting around that sand-spit, the Rusk would have gladdened our eyes on fire, instead of the Royal Yacht, whose crew had boasted they could not be taken; but they are here now.

We cannot find out how many of them there were. Some say several jumped overboard and swam on shore, and others were knocked overboard. The rebels have since taken the Rusk up to the town, and it is well that they did.

This ship draws so much water that she cannot get near the batteries. Frigates are better in dock at New York than down here. They can't get within four miles of the shores.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT.

U. S. FRIGATE "SANTER," }
November 20, 1861. }

At midnight, on the 7th of November, two volunteer crews, with twenty men in each boat, under the command of Lieut. James E. Jouett, left this ship for the purpose of surprising and capturing the man-of-war General Rusk, lying under a large fort, and out off from us by three others. The second launch was in command of Lieut. J. G. Mitchell and Master's Mate Adams. When the boats shoved off at midnight, every man felt that it was the last time we should meet, and nearly every one had written, as he thought, his last letter home, and left it with his messmate in case he should not return alive. After groping among the shoals in the dark for two hours, with muffled oars and orders given in a whisper, they had succeeded in passing the Royal Yacht and the three forts, but in attempting to get around the Rusk, anchored under a fort, unnoticed, the boats came and in trying to get off they were discovered by the oars making a noise. They were exposed to the fire of the Rusk and other forts, and as Lieut. Jouett knew it would be an attempt to take the Rusk, save by surprise, he gave the order to pull hard for the schooner. The schooner Royal Yacht was a guard schooner at the entrance of the harbor and about six miles from this ship. She was armed with one gun, a thirty-two-pounder, plenty of small arms, and a crew of twenty-five men. Our boats pulled up to her fast, and when within about fifty yards were fired into from the schooner. The boats landed on each side of her, and a warm fight took place before the schooner could be driven below. Mr. Carter of Philadelphia, the gunner in the boat, Lieutenant Jouett, fired the boat's gun as the boat was coming alongside, and a hole in the schooner at the waterline was the firing of the gun, just at that time the boat back, and Carter made a desperate dash and sprang on board the schooner, and it single-handed for an instant, when Lieutenant Jouett hauled the boat alongside, and on the deck, calling to the men in the boat "up and at them," which they did, but his best men were shot down as they were.

As Lieut. Jouett sprang on deck, he went forward, some one from the cabin laid a boarding-pike through his right arm on his side, pinning his arm to his side, and holding him off his feet against the side of the vessel. It was impossible for him to draw it out, so he was forced to go forward and break it off, leaving the pike in his side, which he did. Ordering the men to guard that hatch, he ran forward, and found the brave Carter holding the hatch with eight men below. He had them below, and was standing there with a sword drawn. Lieut. Jouett, on taking the pike from his side, found himself very weak from the loss of so much blood, and sat down for an instant on the deck. Making his sight growing dim, he made a great exertion and sprang to his feet, determined to finish the work. The prisoners were all below and had refused to come up to go in the boat, but, on Lieut. Jouett sending a shell of eighty balls down the hatchway as a warning of what they might expect, they came up, the prisoners got into the boat, and the ship was set on fire fore and aft, and she was sinking, and the pilot was so they could not bring her out.

They all got into the boat—thirteen (three wounded,) and six of our men were away from the ship, head wind and tide, and men exhausted, with more prisoners than we could carry, the pilot wounded, and the night very tenant Jonett felt that it would not be possible for him to hold out much longer; his voice failing him, and he dare not let a person who he was wounded, for fear the prisoners would take the boat. He could feel the hot blood gushing from his side at every order he gave.

He slipped his left hand under his jacket, placed two fingers, with his flannel shirt, over the wound, to stop the air and blood. He sat for three long, weary hours, speaking words of comfort to his wounded men, and encouragement to the oarsmen, giving water to all who wanted it. They arrived at the ship just before daylight, and we were all rejoiced to see them. The prisoners were put in irons, the wounded taken care of, among whom was Lieutenant J., who having held up so long, gave up after all was done, and was carried below, being unable to have any thing done to his wound while the others were attended to. The following is a list of the killed and wounded: Lieutenant Jonett, in the right arm and side with a cutting-pike, and right-hand cutlass wound; Liam Carter, gunner, cutlass wound in right hand and hand; Edward Conway, gunner's mate, cutlass wound on left wrist, and board-pike in left side; John L. Emmerson, shot in the arm, knee, and body. Died on the 10th. George Bell, shot in breast and throat; Henry Davis, shot in breast, and wounded with board-pike; dead when brought back to the ship; John McGregor, shot through the left leg; Francis Brown, shot through the back and across the breast; Charles Hawkins, cutlass wound on left arm.

The success of the expedition was most complete, and too much praise cannot be given to the brave officers and men who volunteered upon so desperate an undertaking as cutting a ship under four forts, and near a large town, exposed to the fire of all their guns, and six miles away from the ship.

The captain of the Royal Yacht is a notorious scoundrel, who was at one time in jail at Boston, Massachusetts, on the charge of boarding, in New York harbor, the schooner Saul, taking out her cargo, and setting fire to the vessel. He was taken to Cambridge jail, but by means of his keys he escaped, in August 1844. It is reported that there is a standing reward of one thousand dollars for him, in which case I should think these brave fellows are fully entitled to it. He is now safe on board this ship, and will be sent North by the first opportunity.

THE CAMPAIGN IN MISSOURI.

REBEL OFFICIAL REPORT.

RICHMOND, Nov. 25, 1861.

Colonel J. R. Purvis, Assistant Adjutant-General, Missouri State Guard:

COLONEL: My absence from Missouri on business connected with our State interest prevented my receiving until to-day your report of the 28th ult. During my superintendence, under Gov. Jackson's authority, of the affairs of our suffering State in its southern quarter, nothing has occurred to give me such satisfaction as the perusal of your account of General Thompson's short but brilliant campaign in the Ozark Mountains. To have ventured to advance more than one hundred miles from the main body of our forces, pass between the strongly garrisoned fortresses of the enemy at Ironton and Cape Girardeau, distant only a few hours' travel—the former by railroad and the latter by the Mississippi River—from St. Louis, and burn an important railroad bridge within fifty miles of that city, swarming with Lincoln troops, would have been rashness in a leader less sagacious and vigilant than General Thompson, or with soldiers less hardy and daring than the "Swamp Fox Brigade" of southwest Missouri. The fight at Fredericktown justifies the high reputation of that gallant officer and his command. While deploring the loss of the brave officers and men who fell in that campaign, I console myself with the reflection that as long as Missourians can be found who, half clad and poorly armed, successfully encounter, as at Fredericktown, an army which even the accounts of the enemy admit to have been four times as large as ours engaged in that battle, the expulsion of the foe from our entire State is merely a question of time and of our means fully to arm and equip our loyal citizens.

I remain, colonel, very respectfully,

THOMAS REYNOLDS,
Lieutenant-Governor of Missouri.

EXPEDITION TO DRAINESVILLE, VA.

COLONEL BAYARD'S REPORT.

CAMP PIERPONT, VA., Nov. 27, 1861.

SIR: In obedience to orders, I started from this camp yesterday, at nine o'clock in the evening, for the purpose of marching on Drainesville. We reached positions above and behind Drainesville shortly after five in the morning, after a very tedious and toilsome march. Major Burrows advanced on the town by the northern pike, which leads to it, with two companies of the regiment, while I, with the other eight, gained the rear of the town and advanced by the Leesburg pike. There were but two pickets in the town.

These were cavalry men belonging to Col. Stuart's Virginia Horse, and were captured, with their horses and arms, by Captain Stadelmann, Company B. I arrested six of the citizens of Drainesville, who were known to be secessionists of the bitterest stamp. Their names are as follows: John T. Day, M. D., Drainesville; R. H. Gannel, Great Falls, Va.; John T. D. Bell, C. W. Coleman, Drainesville; W. B. May, M. D., J. B. Fair. Upon my return, some miles from Drainesville, a fire was opened upon the head of the column from a thick pine wood. Assistant-Surgeon Alexander was seriously wounded, and private Joel Hough-taling, I fear, mortally wounded, and I had my horse killed. Surgeon Stanton received a ball in his overcoat, and his horse was shot twice.

The woods were instantly surrounded, and the carbineers dismounted and sent within them. We killed two and captured four, one of whom is shot twice and not expected to live. I captured two good horses, five shot-guns, one Hall's rifle, and two pistols. The names of the prisoners are as follows: W. D. Farley, First Lieutenant South Carolina Volunteers, Captain on General Bonham's staff; F. De Coradene, Lieutenant Seventh South Carolina Volunteers; P. W. Carper, Seventh South Carolina Volunteers; F. Hildebrand, A. M. Whitten, Thirtieth Virginia Cavalry, taken at Drainesville, on picket; Thos. Coleman, citizen of Drainesville, dangerously wounded.

We killed or captured all we saw. I cannot close the report without speaking of the splendid manner in which both men and officers behaved. The fine manner in which Majors Jones, Byrnes, Second Lieutenant Fifth Cavalry, and Burrows acted, cannot be too highly appreciated. All acted well, and I cannot but thus publicly express my admiration for their truly admirable behavior. Very respectfully,

GEO. D. BAYARD,

Colonel First Penn. Regiment Cavalry.

Colonel H. I. BIDDLE, A. A. G.

General McCall transmitted Colonel Bayard's report in the following words:

HEAD-QUARTERS McCALL'S DIVISION, }
November 27, 1861. }

Gen. S. Williams, A. A. G.:

GENERAL: I have the honor to transmit herewith the report of Col. G. D. Bayard, First regiment Cavalry, Pennsylvania Reserve, of a very successful expedition made during the last twenty-four hours, in the direction of Drainesville, where I had ascertained that a picket force of the enemy was stationed. The men who were sent by the colonel for ambulances, reported to me a strong force opposed to the colonel, whereupon I put the first brigade of my division under arms, and, with Kirnes' battery, was marching to his support, when we met the colonel's command returning. The troops all evinced the most praiseworthy alacrity on the occasion.

GENERAL HALLECK'S ORDER.

IN REFERENCE TO IRREGULARITIES IN HIS DEPARTMENT.

HEAD-QUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE MISSOURI, }
St. Louis, Nov. 26, 1861. }

General Orders No. 8:

1. It having been represented that many of the troops in this Department are in want of pay, clothing, blankets, &c., and that this want results from the irregularities and neglect in the appointment of the officers and the mustering of the troops, or in the making of requisitions on the proper departments for supplies, inspecting and mustering officers will be immediately sent to the different divisions, brigades, posts, and detachments, to apply, as speedily as possible, a remedy for these evils. The officers so detailed will, where no proper musters have been made, muster or remuster the troops so as to cover the full time of their service, and will see that the proper requisitions for supplies be made out and duly presented. The General Commanding is convinced that the present wants of the forces under his command result from the ignorance or culpable neglect of those whose duty it was to have them organized according to law, and properly furnished with arms, clothing, and provisions, and he will hereafter punish with severity every neglect of this kind.

2. Where it is necessary that requisitions for supplies be sent to head-quarters, St. Louis, they must be directed to the heads of Departments, who, if they require the approval of the General Commanding, will present them for such approval. In case such requisitions are not filled or replied to promptly, the facts will be reported to head-quarters, and all official neglect in such matters will be speedily inquired into and punished. Such requisitions should be transmitted by mail, where practicable, and the sending of officers to head-quarters for this purpose, without permission, is strictly forbidden.

3. Numerous cases have been brought to the attention of the Commanding General, of alleged seizure and destruction of private property in this Department, showing an outrageous abuse of power, and a violation of the laws of war. To avoid a recurrence of these evils, the following rules will hereafter be observed:

1. No private property will be taken except where necessary for the subsistence or transportation of the troops, or in cases of persons in arms against the United States, or affording aid and assistance to the enemy.

2. Where it becomes necessary to take private property for the former purpose, intelligent and responsible officers will be detailed for that purpose, who will take an accurate account of the property so taken, and give receipts therefor. All such property must be duly returned and accounted for, and the authority for the seizures must be stated in the receipts and returns. Any unauthorized and unnecessary seizure or destruction of private property will be punished with the extreme penalty imposed by the laws of war, which is death.

3. The seizure and conversion of the private property of an enemy, (where not required for immediate supplies as provided in the foregoing paragraph,) is justifiable only in particular cases, provided for by the laws of the United States, and the general laws of war, and should never be made except by the orders of an officer highest in command, who will be held accountable for the exercise of this power. Great caution should be used in this matter, as much injustice has been done to individuals who are not enemies; and much discredit cast upon our patriotic army by excesses committed by unauthorized persons pretending to act in the name of the United States. All property taken from alleged enemies must be inventoried and duly accounted for.

Any person violating these rules will be immediately arrested and reported to headquarters.

4. In all cases where prisoners are taken at other posts or in the field, and sent to St. Louis, they will be accompanied with a written statement of the charges against them, and the evidence on which the arrest was based. Otherwise, prisoners so sent will be released on their arrival here.

5. No person will be hereafter arrested without good and substantial reasons, and officers making arrests without sufficient cause or without authority, will be held to account and punished. And officers sending prisoners to St. Louis without charges, proofs, or proper explanations, will be charged with the expenses of their transportation.

By order of Maj.-Gen. Halleck.

COL. JENNISON'S PROCLAMATIONS.

To the People of Jackson, Lafayette, Cass, Johnson, and Pettis Counties, Mo.:

I HAVE come among you with my command, under the authority of the General Government, for the purpose of protecting the supply trains, and all other property of the United States Government, and for the purpose of throwing a shield of protection and defence around all men who are loyal to that Government.

No excesses will be committed by any soldier in my command.

We march to enforce the laws and sustain the Government. Every loyal citizen is expected to give evidence of his loyalty by active efforts for the protection of the flag. For four months our armies have marched through your country; your professed friendship has been a fraud; your oaths of allegiance have been shams and perjuries. You feed the rebel army, you act as spies, while claiming to be true to the Union. We do not care about your past political opinions; no man will be persecuted because he differs from us. But neutrality is ended. If you are patriots you must fight; if you are traitors you will be punished.

The time for fighting has come. Every man who feeds, harbors, protects, or in any way gives aid and comfort to the enemies of the Union, will be held responsible for his treason with his life and property. While all the property of Union men and all their rights will be religiously respected, traitors will everywhere be treated as outlaws—enemies of God and man, too base to hold any description of property, and having no rights which loyal men are bound to respect. The last dollar and the last slave of rebels will be taken and turned over to the General Government.

Playing war is played out, and whenever Union troops are fired upon the answer will boom from cannon, and desolation will follow treason. Loyal citizens will be fully remunerated for all property taken from them for the use of the army.

All the land between Fort Leavenworth and the head-quarters of the army of the West is under the jurisdiction of the United States, and we propose to have a regular road over it and sure communication through it, no matter at what cost of rebel treasure and blood.

It is hoped that you will see the necessity of abiding by the laws and actively sustaining them. But if you raise an arm against the Government we have sworn to protect, the course I have briefly marked out I will follow to the letter.

C. R. JENNISON,
Col. Com. First Kansas Cavalry.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., 26th.

To all Persons in Arms against the Government in Jackson, Johnson, Lafayette, and Pettis Counties:

1st. All who are now in arms against the Government of the United States in the abovenamed counties, and who will surrender their arms and ammunition to me and deliver to me all Government property in their possession and under their control within reasonable time, and shall sign a deed of forfeiture, and shall hereafter perform their duty as good and loyal citizens, shall not be held responsible for past acts of rebellion, but shall be protected in their lives and property.

2d. Arms which are thus surrendered to me shall be stored and taken account of, so that when the present difficulties are settled, the owners thereof can obtain them. 3d. Persons who shall surrender themselves to me in order to make arrangements for securing peace to their neighborhoods, shall be respected in their rights while arranging or attempting to arrange any terms, and shall be allowed to return to their homes, even should they, after a conference, fail to come to any arrangements or understanding.

4th. All who shall disregard these propositions, and shall continue in armed rebellion against the government of the United States, shall be treated as traitors, and slain wherever found; their property shall be confiscated, their houses burned, and in no case will any be spared either in person or property, who refuses to accept these propositions.

The deed of forfeiture accompanying these propositions conveys all real and personal property, including present and future acquisitions, into the hands of the Government, said property to be used for the benefit of the Government. In case of a rebellion, all loyal citizens are required to enrol themselves, amenable to the military authorities of the United States and of the State of Missouri, pledging their utmost exertions to maintain its authority against all hostile combinations.

SKIRMISH NEAR FAIRFAX COURT HOUSE, VA.

CAPTAIN W. H. BOYD'S REPORT.

CAMP KEARNY, NEAR ALEXANDRIA, Va., }
Nov. 17, 1862. }

Capt. E. Sparrow Purdy, A. A. G., Alexandria Division:

SIR: A reconnoitring party of a squadron of cavalry, consisting of my company and Captain Bennett's, was ordered out this day, under my command. The command proceeded along the Little River turnpike to within a short distance of Annandale, where we passed the last of our pickets. Here we halted, and ordered the arms to be loaded, and sent forward an advance guard, consisting of a dozen good men, armed with Sharp's rifled carbines, under command of Lieutenant Stevenson, of my company. I also detached a rear guard and flank patrols, under the direction of Lieutenants Woodruff and Thomas, Captain Bennett and myself remaining with the main body. In this order we proceeded to within one mile and a quarter of Fairfax Court House, where we learned that about a dozen of the enemy's cavalry had been for corn early in the morning. Hence we marched to within about a thousand yards of the Court House, when our advance guard was suddenly fired upon by the enemy's infantry, from behind a large rifle pit, running diagonally across the turnpike, covering the approach to the village. The direction of the pit was from our right to left. The advance guard immediately deployed to the right and left, some of them sheltering themselves behind a house on the right of the pike, from which they kept up a lively fire upon the enemy's cavalry, which appeared in scattering groups at various points, evidently for the purpose of drawing us out. On the first shot being fired, I rode forward to reconnoitre, having halted the main body, and leaving them under command of Captain Bennett, where they remained concealed from the enemy's view during the whole affair, none but the advance guard being engaged. As one of my men, who was dismounted behind the house, raised his carbine to his shoulder, he said, "I wish I had my old rifle here." With the remark he fired, and one of the rebel cavalry dropped from his horse. During all this time the enemy kept up a desultory fire from the rifle pit, and fearing they might be manœuvring to outflank us, I ordered the men to cease firing, and we started on our way home.

It gives me pleasure to be able to state that during the whole affair the officers and men of my command behaved with most admirable coolness, standing where the enemy's bullets whistled all around them, and aiming their pieces in a calm and determined manner. It was with much reluctance they left the field.

On our return, the enemy followed us at a respectful distance, firing upon our rear guard. Our men returned the fire, and the pursuit was abandoned.

We returned on the Little River turnpike as far as Hughes' house, where we took the left-hand road leading to Mills' Cross Roads, and thence on the Fairfax road to Falls Church.

When on this road, about a mile from Mills' cross roads, we were challenged by the advance guard of the Twentieth New York Volunteers, Colonel Pratt, who mistook us for rebel cavalry, as a lot of cavalry had been seen on the hill reconnoitring all day. The officers of the regiment showed a complete knowledge of their duty, and it would be well for the service if all our outposts would exercise the same vigilance. We met no further obstructions, and reached camp about five P. M., having been in the saddle since nine A. M.

There ought to be signals adopted so that outposts and patrols may be enabled to recognize each other, and thus avoid very unpleasant suspicions, and, frequently, accidents. It is my opinion, that if a squadron of cavalry were allowed to bivouac out over night, some prisoners might be captured, as the enemy's cavalry, in squads of about a dozen, are in the habit of patrolling the road early in the morning and late in the evening.

A few companies of infantry, a section of artillery, and a squadron of cavalry might dislodge the enemy from Fairfax Court House. The roads to Fairfax Court House are in excellent condition for all arms of the service.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully,
your obedient servant,
W. H. BOYD,
Captain Company Lincoln Cavalry.

THE ARMY AND THE SABBATH.

ORDER BY GENERAL MCCLELLAN.

General Orders No. 48:

HEAD-QUARTERS ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, }
WASHINGTON, Nov. 27, 1861. }

THE Sunday-morning company inspections prescribed by article thirty, Revised Army Regulations, will hereafter be made at eight o'clock A. M. Congress having by law provided for the employment of chaplains for the army, it was no doubt designed, and the General Commanding directs, that no officer place obstacles in the way of a proper exercise of the functions of their offices. It is therefore ordered, that in future the Sunday-morning services will commence at eleven o'clock, unless manifest military reasons prevent. Commanding officers will see that all persons connected with their commands, when not on guard or other important duty requiring their constant attention, have the opportunity afforded them of attending divine service.

The second article of war earnestly recommends all officers and soldiers diligently to attend divine service, and attaches a penalty for irreverent behavior while at the place of worship.

Chaplains will at all times be permitted to visit the camps, quarters, and hospitals within the limits of the commands to which they are attached, to hold free and uninterrupted intercourse with the officers and soldiers off duty. Chaplains will not in future be required to appear at reviews or inspections, as it is believed their time and services may be more profitably employed elsewhere.

It is enjoined upon all persons connected with the army to preserve at all times a respectful deportment toward chaplains, and to give them a hearty cooperation in their efforts to promote and improve the moral condition of the army.

By command of Major-Gen. McCLELLAN.

MESSAGE OF GOV. BROWN, OF GA.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
MILLEDGEVILLE, NOV. 19, 1861. }

To the Senate:

In response to the call made upon me by the Senate, I herewith transmit copies of such correspondence between me and the Secretary of War, relating to the defence of the coast of Georgia, as is, in my judgment, proper to be made public at the present time.

By reference to this correspondence it will be seen that I have, from time to time, since the middle of April last, urgently solicited the Secretary of War to place upon the coast of this State such force as was necessary to the protection and security of our people. While his responses to my various calls have been kind and conciliatory, promising the protection which might be peeded, his sense of duty has caused him to withhold as large a force as I have considered necessary, or the embarrassments by which he has been surrounded have rendered it impossible for him to do what his sense of propriety dictated.

The Convention of this State, in March last, passed an ordinance transferring the forts and arsenals acquired from the government of the United States to the Confederate States. At that time there were not sufficient guns and ammunition in either of the forts for its successful defence against a heavy attack. No steps were taken, so far as I know or believe, by the Confederate Government to place additional guns, shot, shell, or powder in the forts, and I was compelled to purchase the necessary supplies with money taken from the treasury of the State, and to place them at the disposal of the Confederate general in command, or to permit the forts to remain in a condition that they might fall an easy prey to the attacks of a hostile fleet. In this supply I expended over one hundred thousand dollars.

As the Confederacy was not prepared with troops to take charge of the forts immediately after the passage of the ordinance, they remained in possession of Georgia, occupied by her regular troops, till these troops were transferred to the Confederacy, 1st May last, when they passed into the possession of the Confederate authorities, together with the heavy guns and ammunition placed in the forts by the State. No compensation has yet been made to the State for these supplies. I also transferred to the Confederacy the arsenal at Augusta, with all the guns acquired from the United States which were in the arsenal at the date of the passage of the ordinance requiring the transfer. The guns previously taken from the arsenal with which to arm our volunteers, and which I was not required to transfer, have all gone into the service of the Confederacy, in the hands of Georgia troops, together with all the small arms purchased by the State, except those now in possession of our State troops. About twenty thousand arms belonging to the State have in this manner gone into the Confederate service. The exact number cannot be given, as the State's arms were frequently carried to Virginia in the hands of volunteer companies belonging to independent regiments, of which I have no account, as they were frequently seized and carried out of the State without my knowledge or consent. I consider all the guns which have gone into the Confederate service in the hands of Georgia volunteers, except those mentioned in my letter to the Secretary of War, which were taken from the arsenal after the passage of the ordinance for its transfer, to be still the property of this State. No compensation has been paid to the State for the guns, about twelve thousand in number, which were transferred with the Augusta arsenal, nor do I understand that it was the intention of the Convention to require the Confederacy to pay a pecuniary compensation for the guns which had been acquired from the United States, and which were required by the ordinance to be transferred, any more than it was their intention that pecuniary compensation should be paid by the Confederacy to the State for the forts and arsenals. The Convention, by the ordinance, transferred the title of the arms then in the forts and arsenals to the Confederacy, but left it to the discretion of the Executive whether he would transfer to the Confederacy the other arms belonging to the State. I did not think it best to transfer the title to all our small arms to the Confederacy, but I permitted them all to go into the service as State arms.

The steamer Savannah, which cost the State forty thousand dollars, was transferred to the Confederacy for twenty thousand dollars in cash, and twenty thousand dollars in Confederate States bonds. The money and bonds received in payment have been and are being expended by the Quartermaster-General of the State for supplies for the troops and for other military purposes. The Secretary of War refused to purchase the steamer Huntress, which cost the State fifteen thousand dollars in New York. The steamer was in the possession of Commodore Tattnall in the State service, and after he entered the Confederate service he retained, and still retains, the possession and management of her in the inland waters of this State and South Carolina. I hope to be able to transfer this steamer also to the Confederacy at a future day for the amount she cost the State, to be paid for in Confederate bonds or notes. I transmit a copy of the correspondence between myself and the Secretary of War relative to the transfer of the forts, arsenals, and arms.

In response to that portion of the resolutions which relates to the present number of Confederate troops now on our coast, I have to state my information is that there are about five thousand five hundred. In addition to this number ten thousand others will, in my opinion, be necessary to repel the invasion and defend the coast. I may also state that General Lee expresses a desire that I hold a reserve of ten thousand men in camp, in readiness to reinforce the Confederate troops on the coast at any time when needed.

The estimate made in my annual message of the amount necessary to sustain our military operations for the present fiscal year was based upon a smaller number of troops. If ten thousand State troops are to be called into the field, my opinion is an appropriation of at least five millions of dollars will be necessary.

I believe the correspondence herewith submitted will furnish a sufficient reply to the other points contained in the resolutions.

During the summer months the State was not invaded, and I could not say that the danger of invasion was so imminent as to admit of no delay. I did not feel, therefore, that I was at liberty to call out and maintain a heavy force on the coast on State account, or that it was my proper province to take charge of the erection of the necessary fortifications. This duty, under the constitution, properly devolved upon the Confederate government, and I did not feel at liberty to assume the exercise of powers which properly belonged to that government.

Early in September I visited the seaboard, and found only about three thousand Confederate troops stationed there to defend the city of Savannah and about one hundred and ten miles of coast. I considered this force entirely inadequate to the task. As the correspondence will show, I had repeatedly offered to supply a larger number of troops if the Secretary of War would make requisition upon me for them, for our defence. He had not thought proper to increase the number beyond that above mentioned, and there was no requisition upon me for any additional number. The season was so far advanced that I considered the danger too imminent to admit of further delay, and I considered the force too weak to make even a respectable show of resistance to an invading fleet as large as the Government of the United States was likely to send upon our coast as soon as they could venture in our climate. Under these circumstances, I did not feel that I would be justified should I longer delay active preparation for our defence in organizing State troops and holding them in readiness in case of attack, to act in concert with the small Confederate force upon the coast. I have, therefore, called out the State troops, as it was my duty to do, under the act of the last Legislature; and I shall have completed the organization of the first division within the next few days.

As the General Assembly has already been informed, the military appropriation is exhausted, and it will be impossible for me to maintain the troops in the field much longer unless further appropriations be made. Since the commencement of the session some of the articles necessary to supply the army have risen over twenty-five per cent. in the market. Whether the further delay in procuring the supplies which must result from withholding the appropriation is compatible with the public interest, is a question which demands the serious consideration of the General Assembly.

I am aware that it may be insisted that the Confederate Government shall take upon itself the entire expense of our defence. It is admitted that this is correct in principle, and the willingness of that Government to do its duty to the State, to the extent of its ability, is not questioned. Thus far, however, the Confederate Government has not placed upon our coast a sufficient number of troops for our protection, and the question presented for our present consideration is, whether we will assist the Confederacy and defend ourselves, or wait till the Confederacy is prepared to defend us, and risk the disasters which may, in the mean time, befall us on account of the delay. My own opinion is that it is not now the time to stop to count the cost, but that we should call out as many troops as may be necessary to repel the invader, should he appear either upon the sea-coast or upon the borders of Tennessee. Whether it may take ten thousand or twenty thousand men, or whether it may cost five or ten millions of dollars, I ask, in the name of the people, that their representatives place at my command the men and money necessary to accomplish this object. JOSEPH E. BROWN.

THE COMMERCE OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

GENERAL CURTIS' ORDER.

HEAD-QUARTERS ST. LOUIS DISTRICT, }
St. Louis, November 27, 1861. }

General Orders No. 4:

In obedience to instructions received from the General commanding the Department of the Missouri, a change is proposed in the commerce of the river. To check communication with the enemy, prevent the conveyance of contraband goods, and avoid the recurrence of assaults upon our steamers, the entire commerce of the Mississippi River below this city is assumed, and will be directed, by the military and naval authorities of the United States. Government boats and no others will hereafter be employed, but freight and passengers will be conveyed at current rates, as heretofore. Mail agents will take entire charge of the mails, and boats entering these waters will report at the first military post and stop, to proceed under military orders at the discretion of the military commander. Freight and baggage will be subject to careful inspection; an oath to which no patriot can object, and no traitor forget, shall be taken and subscribed to by all employees and passengers, except such alien friends as may be exempted by commanding generals. The plans of landing and departure will conform as near as may be to the custom of the trade, but all commission and storage business must be transacted with openly avowed and reliable Union men. The officers of boats and officers of the army are directed, and those of the navy are requested, to cautiously but vigorously carry out the purpose and policy of this command.

By order of Brigadier-General Curtis.

Major and A. A. General.

THE PRESBYTERIANS AND THE WAR.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE SYNOD OF NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY AND THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

New Hampton, Orange Co., N. Y., Nov. 29, 1861.

DEAR SIR: As directed by the Synod of New York and New Jersey, I forward herewith, together with the accompanying minutes, a copy of the paper on the state of the country, adopted by that body during its recent session in Newark, N. J. Respectfully yours,

O. M. JOHNSON.

HON. WM. H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State.

EXTRACT FROM THE MINUTES OF THE SYNOD OF NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY.

The Rev. Messrs. James P. Wilson, D. D., William Adams, D. D., William W. Newell, D. D., and Hon. William Pennington and Hon. Edward A. Lambert, Elders, were appointed a committee to prepare a minute in relation to the present condition of the country.

The committee appointed to prepare a minute in relation to the present condition of our country, reported the following preamble and resolutions, which were adopted unanimously:

Whereas, the people of these United States, after the achievement of their independence, established a government based on constitutional liberty, giving to all just and equal rights; and

Whereas, a portion of the people of these United States have taken up arms against the lawful Government, seized upon its property, and are endeavoring to overthrow it—a government in which are centred our dearest hopes and interests pertaining to civil liberty and the advancement of civilization throughout the world; and

Whereas, the Presbyterian Church in the United States has ever shown herself, in all her history, the advocate of civil liberty and freedom—that freedom, the defence of which drove our fathers from the Old World, and for the security of which, in this land, they prayed and fought and bled, ever lifting their voice and hands against anarchy and tyranny and oppression in every form; and believing that the present solemn crisis in our national affairs calls upon us as patriots and Christians to lay upon the altar of our country our influence, our property, and our lives; therefore,

Resolved, That we pledge to the Government our individual support and confidence, and will use all lawful means and efforts in our power to aid it in maintaining its authority and in putting down this rebellion, in its very nature so utterly causeless and unjust.

Resolved, That we commend the President of the United States, his constitutional advisers, the American Congress, the Commander-in-Chief and soldiers of the army and navy, to the God of our fathers, humbly praying that He will impart to them wisdom and unity in counsels, and fidelity and courage in action, that the cause intrusted to their hands may be brought to a speedy and successful issue.

Resolved, That while we do not feel called upon to add any thing to the repeated testimonials of our church on the subject of slavery, nor to offer any advice to the Government on the subject, still, fully believing that it lies at the foundation of all our present national troubles, we recommend to all our people to pray more earnestly than ever for its removal, and that the time may speedily come when God, by his providence, shall, in his own good time and way, bring it to an end, that nothing may be left of it but the painful record of its past existence.

Resolved, That we recommend to all our people to humble themselves, and take a low place before God, in view of all our social and political sins, and each one remember and lament his own personal complicity with them all.

REPLY OF SECRETARY SEWARD.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, November 27, 1861. }

To the Synod of New York and New Jersey:

REVEREND GENTLEMEN: The minute, containing your resolutions on the condition of the country, which you directed to be sent to me, has been submitted to the President of the United States.

I am instructed to express to you his great satisfaction with those proceedings, which are distinguished equally by their patriotic sentiments and a purely Christian spirit. It is a just tribute to our system of government, that it has enabled the American people to enjoy unmolested more of the blessings of Divine Providence, which affect the material conditions of human society, than any other people ever enjoyed, together with a more absolute degree of religious liberty, than, before the institution of that great government, had ever been hoped for among men. The overthrow of the Government, therefore, might justly be regarded as a calamity, not only to this nation, but a misfortune to mankind. The President is assured of the public virtue and of the public valor. But these are unavailing without the favor of God. The President thanks you for the invocations of that indispensable support, and he earnestly solicits the same invocations from all classes and conditions of men. Believing that these prayers will not be denied by the God of our fathers, he trusts and expects that the result of this most unhappy attempt at revolution will confirm and strengthen the Union of the republic, and ultimately renew the fraternal affections among its members, so essential to a restoration of the public welfare and happiness.

I am, very sincerely, your very humble servant,
WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

THE DEFENCE OF CHARLESTON, S. C.

Among the documents found in Fort Walker, S. C., was the following order from General De Saussure, providing for the defence of Charleston in case of an attack:

HEAD-QUARTERS FOURTH BRIGADE S. C. M. }
CHARLESTON, October 12, 1861. }

ORDERS No. XLIX.—I. In case of an alarm, requiring the prompt assembling of all the troops in the City of Charleston, the signal for each assembling will be fifteen strokes upon all the fire bells; an interval of one minute and the fifteen strokes will be repeated. The strokes will be repeated five times.

II. Upon the sounding of such a signal, the troops in the city will immediately assemble, under arms, and in marching order, at the respective regimental muster grounds, and being formed in line will await further orders.

III. The regiment of reserves will assemble on the street immediately in front of the Citadel, the color company resting on the gate of the Citadel, and will be retained in the city for its immediate defence, unless otherwise specially ordered.

IV. The officers commanding the Sixteenth and Seventeenth regiments of infantry, First regiment of rifles, and First regiment of artillery, will have their transportation wagons turned out and loaded with the regimental tents and stores, and pursuant to section CXLVII., A. A., 1841, will proceed to press horses and mules, as may be required for the transportation.

V. Upon an alarm being communicated to the country, the officers commanding companies will immediately extend the same in the mode pointed out in section CXLI., A. A., 1841.

VI. The alarm being communicated, the several companies composing the Eighteenth and Nineteenth regiments of infantry will promptly assemble at their respective muster grounds, and be governed by the following instructions, viz.:

1. If the information is that the enemy has landed north of Santee River, the several companies will be marched and stationed as follows:

The St. James Santee Company will be marched to South Santee Ferry, and will collect all the boats and flats and conceal them on the right bank of the river.

The St. Andrew's Company will be divided into two platoons, one of which, composed of the members of the main, will patrol the main, and the other, composed of the members on the islands, will patrol the islands. The commanders of the two platoons will promptly communicate any suspicious movements in the water-courses intersecting the beat limits to these head-quarters. This instruction will govern the St. Andrew's Company, from whatever side the invasion is made.

2. If the information is that the enemy has landed between South Santee River and Charleston, the several Companies will be marched and stationed as follows:

The mounted Company of St. James Santee will patrol the country between the Santee River and the intersection of the Georgetown and See Wee Roads.

The St. James Santee Company will be marched to Steed's Bridge, and will destroy that and the Owendaw Bridge, if necessary to prevent the enemy's advance.

VII. The field-officers of the Eighteenth and

By order of Brig.-Gen. DE SAUSSURE.

RECONNOISSANCE AT PORT ROYAL.

COMMANDER DRAYTON'S REPORT.

UNITED STATES STEAMER PAWNEE, }
PORT ROYAL HARBOR, Nov. 25, 1861. }

Flag-Officer S. F. Dupont:

SIR: In obedience to instructions contained in your letter of the 24th instant, I left this harbor at three A. M. of the 25th inst., in company with the Unadilla, Lieutenant Commanding Collins, and the Pembina, Lieutenant Commanding Bankhead, piloted by the Vixen, Captain Boutelle. We crossed this bar at half-past four, and that of St. Helena at half-past nine—a steamer, supposed to be the General Clinch, being then off the Edisto River, which position she shortly left, and steamed up the river.

I soon afterward came in sight of a fort on the point of Otter Island, into which, at the distance of a mile, I threw a few shells, as did the gunboats, to discover if it were occupied. There being no answer, I sent a boat on shore to take possession, and found it to be a regular triangular work, with two faces toward the water, of two hundred and fifty feet each, with bastions and a curtain on the land side, the whole surrounded by a ditch. The magazine had been blown up, and every thing carried away or destroyed, the only thing left being the fragments of an eighty-pound rifle gun, which had been burst. There was also, on the outside, a large quantity of timber and palmetto logs, which I left undisturbed, there being little or no probability of any one coming to remove it, and considering that, should we occupy the place, it would be required to finish the work.

Having made the above examination, I continued up the Coosaw River with the gunboats, piloted by Captain Boutelle. When just passing Morgan River, about two miles from Otter Island, I came in sight of a fort directly ahead, and at the junction of Barnwell Creek with the Coosaw. When within a mile, we threw a few shells into it, and there being no signs of occupation, and the negroes showing themselves in the neighborhood, I sent a boat on shore to take possession, and found it to be a redoubt, with a ditch on three faces, and a steep slope toward the water, above which the parapet was elevated thirty feet; its name being (as we found by papers picked up) Fort Hayward. The armament had consisted of only three guns—one rifle, which had been removed, and two eighteen-pounders, which, being of a very antiquated make, and spiked, I destroyed by breaking the trunnions off.

The next morning early I returned and removed to this vessel a quantity of intrenching tools which I found near the fort, together with a large sling cart and two siege carriages, which had not been much injured by the fire, which had consumed sufficiently to render useless the other one and all the limbers. This being completed, I returned to Otter Creek Island, and found there the Vixen, which had preceded us for the purpose of bringing off an engineer—Lieutenant O'Rourke—who had been sent by General Sherman to join us at Coffin's Landing. He desired to make a drawing of the fort, and, as it was late, I anchored for the night, leaving again on the morning of the 27th with the gunboats and Vixen (there not being water for the Pawnee) to ascend the Ashepoo River, as I understood that there was a military station a short distance up. After running a few miles I discovered a redoubt, and having, as before, satisfied myself that it was not occupied, I landed and found that, like the others, it was very carefully and scientifically built, with a deep ditch around it. Every thing had been destroyed and carried away except a rifled twenty-four-pounder, and an old English eighteen-pounder, both of which had been burst, and another eighteen-pounder, which I destroyed.

Having performed this duty, I continued up the river, thinking that I might find fortifications at Mosquito Creek, which offers the only inland channel of communication with Charleston. None had, however, been erected there, and I continued up the river to the plantation on Hutchinson Island, about twelve miles above Otter Island, which was as far as the vessels could go. Here were a large number of negroes, but no white men, although they told me there was a picket of soldiers about three miles beyond. At this time I heard heavy firing, and as we all supposed it proceeded from the Pawnee, I hurried every one on board and returned down the river as quickly as possible; but, on reaching that vessel, was told that the sounds came from the direction of Beaufort.

Then, with the Pawnee, got under way, and, accompanied by the other vessel, ran across the bay to Hunting Island's River, where I landed and looked for the fortifications on the point of Hunting Island, but could not find the least appearance of there ever having been any there. The light-house had been recently blown up, and all the public property carried away. I had now examined all the points mentioned in your letter, except Coffin's Landing, which had been visited by Lieutenant O'Rourke on his way across, and he reporting that no works had been erected there, I did not think it worth the delay that would have been occasioned there. I left Hunting Island harbor at seven o'clock this morning, and reached my anchorage here at meridian.

With regard to the other inquiries that I was ordered to make, I would beg leave to say, that whenever practicable, the slaves have been removed, as on the northern side of the Ashepoo, where there is no communication with the Edisto. At all the plantations south of that, a great many still remain at Hutchinson Island, not less, I think, than one hundred and twenty. Not a white man seems to be left anywhere outside the line of military occupation, which was higher than I was able to go with the vessels.

The slaves are doing nothing, are very friendly, and assisted us voluntarily whenever we wanted their aid; and sometimes, as at Fort Hayward, worked very hard. I overheard one of them say, that it was but fair they should do so for us, as we were working for them. The more intelligent among them told me that there was no packed cotton this year, and that not much more than half the cotton and scarcely any of the provision crop had been gathered.

I forgot to mention that, as far as we could make out, on our return down the river, (the Ashepoo,) they appeared to be burning houses in the direction of the South Edisto River, or on those plantations which must have still been in the possession of the whites, and the same thing seemed to be continued during the night.

I cannot finish without mentioning the obligations I am under to Captain Boutelle for the skill and untiring energy he displayed in piloting us through those inland waters; and I think the people must have been a little surprised at seeing vessels of war passing at full speed up narrow, and not overdeep, rivers, such as the Coosaw and Ashepoo.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

P. DRAYTON,
Commander, (commanding Pawnee.)

THANKSGIVING IN VIRGINIA.

NOVEMBER 28, 1861.

Gov. PIERPONT, of Virginia, issued the following proclamation, November 14th, 1861:

In the mid-st of war and its afflictions, we are more forcibly reminded of our dependence upon Divine Providence; and, while in all we suffer, we should own His chastening hand, we should be ready to acknowledge that it is of His mercy that we are not destroyed, and that so many of the blessings of life are preserved to us. Seed-time and harvest have not failed; the early and the latter rain have fallen in their seasons, and the toil of the husbandman has been abundantly repaid. It is, therefore, becoming, that while we earnestly pray that the days of our affliction may be shortened, we should thankfully acknowledge the manifold mercies, of which, nationally and individually, we are still the recipients.

Now, therefore, I, Francis H. Pierpont, Governor of Virginia, do hereby recommend to the good people of the Commonwealth the observance of Thursday, the 28th inst., as a day of Thanksgiving to Almighty God for the blessings of the year; and of humble and fervent prayer that He will, in more abundant mercy, bring to a speedy end the heart-burnings, and civil strife, which are now desolating our country, and restore to our Union its ancient foundations of brotherly love and a just appreciation. And I do further recommend that all secular business and pursuits be, as far as possible, suspended on that day.

[L. S.] In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the Great Seal of the Commonwealth to be affixed, at the city of Wheeling, this 14th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, and of the Commonwealth the eighty-sixth.

FRANCIS H. PIERPONT.

By the Governor.

THE SIEGE OF LEXINGTON, MO.

SPEECH OF COL. MULLIGAN.

At the reception given to Colonel Mulligan in Detroit, Mich., on the 29th of Nov., the Colonel delivered the following speech:

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: It is with no ordinary pleasure that I appear before you this night. It is with a peculiar pride that I stand in Detroit, so sacred to the memories of the past—in the home of that statesman (Cass) whose life has been devoted to his country—that monument of a man living and embodying the history of the nation. God grant that he may live to see our country again united! (Applause.) It is with pleasure that I stand here in the home of that man whose blood has baptized our great cause, for which he lies this night confined in a hostile dungeon. When I utter these words of bravery and patriotism, you know I embody the name of Wilcox, of Michigan. (Prolonged cheers.) And I trust that the time is not far distant, when he shall again stand by the side of Corcoran, of the glorious Sixty-ninth—that loyal wall of true Irish hearts—restored to the country which he has honored. (Cheers.) Let me now plainly and briefly relate the circumstances of a little affair that happened to us in Missouri. Just outside the limits of Jefferson City, overlooking the broad Missouri, were encamped two regiments, over which floated twin banners—banners which have been twins in the past, and may they ever be so in the future—the harp of Ireland and the stars of America. (Applause.) Under these twin banners lay as rollicking and happy a regiment as was ever collected together. It was the Irish Brigade of Chicago. At the hour of midnight, it received an order to march to the relief of Col. Marshall's Cavalry, then threatened by the enemy, and with them to cut their way through to Lexington and hold it at all hazards. The next morning saw the Irish Brigade with its face set towards Lexington. We started with forty rounds of ammunition and three days' rations, and advanced for nine days without meeting the enemy, foraging upon the country in the mean time for support. As we moved along, war smoothed his wrinkled brow. The chaplain mixed his admonitions with an occasional snatch of an Irish melody. The Major was a married man and chanted—

"Ever of thee I'm fondly dreaming."

The Lieutenant-Colonel was a married man, and, not to be formal, I was a married man, and followed the Major. (Laughter.) Thus we went on, until at length we arrived within two miles of Lexington. The brigade sat down, pitched its camp, the men rested, and preparations were made for advancing into the city. We went in, with our solitary six-pounder muzzled in roses and breeched with evergreens. The men had travelled nine days, by forced marches, as it is called in the regular army, yet they never looked better. On arriving at Lexington, we found Col. Marshall's Cavalry and a few Home Guards, and I wish, for our sakes, there had been fewer. I have a very poor opinion of Home Guards. I have found them invincible in peace and invisible in war. (Laughter.) They are generally content to stay at home under the shadow of the paternal mansion and let the country take care of itself. I say, we found a few of these Home Guards there. On the 10th of September, a letter arrived from Col. Peabody, saying that he was retreating from Warrensburg, twenty-five miles distant, and that Price was pursuing him with ten thousand men. A few hours afterward, Colonel Peabody, with the Thirteenth Missouri, entered build fortifications around the sick man's couch. I had thought that, among civilized nations, the soldier sickened and wounded in the service of his country, would, at least, be sacred. But I was inexperienced, and had yet to learn that such was not the case with the rebels. They besieged the hospital, took it, and from the balcony and roof their sharpshooters poured a deadly fire within our intrenchments. It contained our chaplain and surgeon, and one hundred and twenty wounded men. It could not be allowed to remain in the possession of the enemy. A company of the Missouri Thirteenth was ordered forward to retake the hospital. They started on their errand, but stopped at the breastworks, "going not out because it was bad to go out." (Laughter.) A company of the Missouri Fourteenth was sent forward, but it also shrank from the task, and refused to move outside the intrenchments. The Montgomery Guard, Captain Gleason, of the Irish Brigade, were then brought out. The commander admonished them that the others had failed; and with a brief exhortation to uphold the name they bore, gave the word to "charge." The distance was eight hundred yards. They started out from the intrenchments, first quick, then double-quick, then on a run, then faster. The enemy poured a deadly shower of bullets upon them, but on they went, a wild line of steel, and what is better than steel, human will. (Cheers.) They stormed up the slope to the hospital door, and with irresistible bravery drove the enemy before them, and hurled them far down the hill beyond. (Vociferous cheers.) At the head of those brave fellows, pale as marble, but not pale from fear, stood the gallant officer, Captain Gleason. He said, "Come on, my brave boys," and in they rushed. But when their brave captain returned, it was with a shot through the cheek and another through the arm, and with but fifty of the eighty he had led forth. The hospital was in their possession. This charge was one of the most brilliant and reckless in all history, and to you, Captain Gleason, belongs the glory. (At this mention, the gallant Capt. Gleason was brought to the front, when the whole assembled audience rose with one accord, and greeted his appearance with the most tumultuous cheers.) Each side felt, after this charge, that a clever thing had been done, and the fire of the enemy lagged. We were in a terrible situation. Towards night the fire increased, and in the evening word came from the rebels that if the garrison did not surrender before the next day, they would hoist the black flag at their cannon and give us no quarter. Word was sent back that "when we asked for quarter it would be time to settle that." (Cheers.) It was a terrible thing to see those brave fellows mangled, and with no skilful hands to bind their gaping wounds. Our surgeon was held with the enemy, against all rules of war, and that, too, when we had released a surgeon of theirs on his mere pledge that he was such. Captain Moriarty went into the hospital, and,

with nothing but a razor, acted the part of a surgeon. We could not be without a chaplain or surgeon any longer. There was in our ranks a Lieutenant Hickey, a rollicking, jolly fellow, who was despatched from the hospital with orders to procure the surgeon and chaplain at all hazards. Forty minutes later and the brave lieutenant was borne by, severely wounded. As he was borne past I heard him exclaim, "God have mercy on my little ones." And God did hear his prayers, for the gay lieutenant is up, as rollicking as ever, and is now forming his brigade to return to the field. (Applause.) On the morning of the 19th the firing was resumed and continued all day. We recovered our surgeon and chaplain. The day was signalized by a fierce bayonet charge upon a regiment of the enemy, which served to show them that our men were not yet completely worried out. The officers had told them to hold out until the 19th, when they would certainly be reinforced. Through that day our little garrison stood with straining eyes, watching to see if some friendly flag was bearing aid to them—with straining ear, awaiting the sound of a friendly cannonade. But no reinforcements appeared, and, with the energy of despair, they determined to do their duty at all hazards. (Prolonged cheers.) The 19th was a horrid day. Our water cisterns had been drained, and we dared not leave the crown of the hill, and make our intrenchments on the bank of the river, for the enemy could have planted their cannon on the hill, and buried us. The day was burning hot, and the men bit their cartridges; their lips were parched and blistered. But not a word of murmuring. (Applause.) The night of the 19th two wells were ordered to be dug. We took a ravine, and expected to reach water in about thirty hours. During the night, I passed around the field, smoothed back the clotted hair, and by the light of the moon, shining through the trees, recognized here and there the countenances of my brave men who had fallen. Some were my favorites in days gone past, who had stood by me in these hours of terror, and had fallen on the hard fought field. Sadly we buried them in the trenches. The morning of the 20th broke, but no reinforcements appeared, and still the men fought on. The rebels had constructed movable breastworks of hemp bales, rolled them up the hill, and advanced their batteries in a manner to command the fortification. Heated shot were fired at them, but they had taken the precaution to soak the bales in the Missouri. The attack was urged with renewed vigor, and, during the forenoon, the outer breastworks were taken by a charge of the rebels in force. The whole line was broken, and the enemy rushed in upon us. Captain Fitzgerald, whom I had known in my younger days, and whom we had been accustomed to call by the familiar nickname, "Saxy," was then ordered to oppose his company to the assailants. As I gave the order, "Saxy, go in," the gallant Fitzgerald, at the head of company I, with a wild yell rushed in upon the enemy. (Great applause, mingled with cries for "Saxy.") The commander sent for a company on which he could rely; the firing suddenly ceased, and when the smoke rose from the field, I observed the Michigan company, under their gallant young commander, Captain Patrick McDermott, charging the enemy and driving them back. (Prolonged cheers.) Many of our good fellows were lying dead, our cartridges had failed, and it was evident that the fight would soon cease. It was now three o'clock, and all on a sudden an orderly came, saying the enemy had sent a flag of truce. With the flag came the following note from General Price:

"Colonel—What has caused the cessation of the fight?"

The Colonel returned it with the following reply written on the back:—

"General—I hardly know, unless you have surrendered." (Laughter.)

He took pains to assure me, however, that such was not the case. I learned soon after that the Home Guard had hoisted the white flag. The lieutenant who had thus hoisted the flag was threatened with instant death unless he pulled it down. The men all said, "we have no cartridges, and a vast horde of the enemy is about us." They were told to go to the line and stand there, and use the charge at the muzzle of their guns or perish there. They grasped their weapons the fiercer, turned calmly about, and stood firmly at their posts. And there they stood without a murmur, praying as they never prayed before, that the rebel horde would show themselves at the earthworks. An officer remarked, "this is butchery." The conviction became general, and a council of war was held. And when, finally, the white flag was raised, Adjutant Cosgrove, of your city, shed bitter tears. (Applause.) The place was given up, upon what conditions, to this day, I hardly know or care. The enemy came pouring in. One foppish officer, dressed in the gaudiest uniform of his rank, strutted up and down through the camp, stopped before our men, took out a pair of handcuffs, and holding them up, said, "Do you know what these are for?" We were placed in file, and a figure on horseback, looking much like "Death on the pale horse," led us through the streets of Lexington. As we passed, the secession ladies of Lexington came from their houses, and from the fence tops jeered at us. We were then taken to a hotel with no rations and no proprietor. After we had boarded there for some time, we started with Gen. Price, on the morning of the 30th, for "the land of Dixie." The column of our escort was fifteen miles long. Of our imprisonment there I will say nothing. We all feel, every man of us, that we have been fighting for a great cause, that we were not spared from Lexington to sit idly in our homes while our country is in danger. (Cheers.) We all feel, that that republic which was cemented by the blood of our fathers, is to be again baptized and made stronger with our blood. And I feel for myself, that while a half million of bristling bayonets are standing up for it, God will crown with success the efforts of these defenders of the Union, the constitution, and the laws. And when next I meet you, I hope it may not be as when we put our armor on, but as when we put our armor off, to sit down in peace and again enjoy the blessings of an undivided and glorious nation. (Loud and long-continued applause.)

EXPERIENCE OF LIEUT. WORDEN

RELEASE OF THE FIRST PRISONER OF WAR.

LIEUTENANT JOHN P. WORDEN, of the United States Navy, who was arrested by the rebels at Montgomery, in April, 1861, is a resident of Dutchess County, in the State of New York. He graduated at Philadelphia, Pa., and has been twenty-eight years in the navy. He was the first prisoner of war, and his arrest created considerable excitement at the time.

Lieut. Worden left Washington on the 7th of April, 1861, as bearer of despatches to Captain Adams, of the frigate Sabine, in command of the fleet at Pensacola. The fleet had previously been sent to Fort Pickens, with two companies of artillery, for the purpose of reinforcing the fort when so ordered, and the despatches carried by Mr. Worden contained orders to that effect.

Lieut. Worden arrived at Pensacola by way of Richmond and Montgomery, on the 11th, having committed the despatches to memory, and torn them up for fear of arrest and search, owing to the excited state of the country. Arriving at Pensacola he obtained an interview with General Bragg, the rebel commander, and obtained a pass to visit Captain Adams, stating, in reply to an interrogatory, that he had a verbal communication from Secretary Cameron to the captain. Owing to a gale which was blowing at the time, Lieutenant Worden did not visit Captain Adams until the following day, when he delivered his orders and received a written reply in return, acknowledging the receipt of the despatches, and stating that they should be executed, together with other verbal information for the Government. Fort Pickens was reinforced by Captain Vodges that night. Lieutenant Worden took the cars at eight P. M. on the 12th on his return, and on the morning of the 13th, when within about five miles of Montgomery, five officers of the rebel army came in and arrested him, taking him to the office of the Adjutant-General at Montgomery.

A cabinet meeting was held to decide upon his case, and during the day he was remanded to the custody of a deputy marshal, in whose rooms he remained until the 15th, when he was removed to the county jail. Lieutenant Worden could get no reply to a request to know the grounds of his arrest, but learned verbally that General Bragg, in order to exonerate himself for permitting Lieutenant Worden's visit to Captain Adams, stated that the Lieutenant had violated his word of honor; a charge, however, which Mr. Worden emphatically denies—no such pledge having been given.

Lieutenant Worden also heard it stated that there was an agreement between Capt. Adams and Gen. Bragg that no attempt should be made to reinforce or take the fort without previous notice to the other party, and that Gen. Bragg accused Captain Adams of violating the agreement.

The excitement in Pensacola and Montgomery can easily be imagined, when it is known that General Bragg had collected a force of one thousand men, and made all preparations to attack the fort on the night when the reinforcements were thrown in. He then ordered the arrest of Mr. Worden.

Lieut. Worden was well treated during his imprisonment, and was allowed such provisions as he chose to purchase, receiving all the attention he could expect in his situation. While the seat of Government remained at Montgomery, he received visits from Captain Ingraham, and a large number of other officers, with whom he had been acquainted in the service. Every effort was made on their part to obtain his release or parole. He remained in prison until the 13th of November, and was in regular communication with his friends and family until mail communication was cut off. All letters, excepting some of those from his family, were opened and read before he received them. He had access to the daily papers in Montgomery, and occasionally received papers from Richmond.

The tone of the papers, and of persons with whom he conversed, were arrogant and confident even to boasting, until the arrival of intelligence of the attack and capture of Beaufort by the Federal forces. This news fell like a wet blanket upon all their hopes. They made no secret of denouncing the rebel Government for not making a better defence, declaring there was no safety to the cities on the coast, and that no dependence whatever could be placed upon the fortifications. A tone of despair seemed to prevail, and the people were loud in their denunciations of a Government which gave them no security, nor intelligence of the actual condition of affairs, and the result of operations.

On the 13th of November Quartermaster Balloun informed him that he had received a despatch ordering his release on parole, to go to Richmond to carry out a proposition for an exchange.

Lieut. Worden left Montgomery on the 14th, having given his parole not to divulge any thing which he might learn while in transit, to the advantage of the rebel Government. This parole was of no disadvantage to the National Government, from the fact that he saw nothing.

He arrived at Richmond on Sunday evening,

November 17th, having been detained one day by failure to connect, and stopped at the Exchange Hotel, which was filled with army officers. He obtained an interview with the Adjutant-General, and Acting Secretary of War Benjamin, and left early on Monday morning for Norfolk, and the following day went on board the frigate Minnesota, at Hampton Roads.

After the fight at Santa Rosa Island, Major Vogdes and twenty-two of Wilson's men were confined in jail with him, from whom he learned further of the actual condition of Fort Pickens. He has no doubt that Fort Pickens can easily reduce the batteries and fortifications in the vicinity, as well as Fort McRae.

GEN. PRICE'S PROCLAMATION.

NOVEMBER 1861.

The following is the proclamation from Gen. Price, issued at Neosho:

FELLOW-CITIZENS: In the month of June last, I was called to the command of a handful of Missourians, who nobly gave up home and comforts to espouse in that gloomy hour the cause of your bleeding country, struggling with the most heartless and cruel despotism known among civilized men. When peace and protection could no longer be enjoyed but at the price of honor and liberty, your chief magistrate called for fifty thousand men to drive the ruthless invaders from a soil made fruitful by your labors and consecrated by your homes. And to that call less than five thousand responded out of a male population exceeding two hundred thousand men. One in forty only stepped forward to defend with their persons and their lives the cause of constitutional liberty and human rights. Some allowances are to be made on the face of the want of military organization, a supposed want of arms, the necessary retreat of the army southwards, the blockade of the river, and the presence of an armed and organized foe. But nearly six months have now elapsed. Your crops have been tilled, your harvests have been reaped, your provision for winter has been made. The army of Missouri, organized and equipped, fought its way to the river. The foe is still in the field. The county bleeds and the people groan under the inflictions of a foe marked with all the characteristics of barbarous warfare.

And where now are the fifty thousand, to avenge our wrongs and our country? Had fifty thousand men flocked to our standard, with their shot guns in their hands, there would now be no Federal hirelings in the State to pollute our soil. Instead of ruined counties, starving families, and desolated districts, we should have a people blessed with protection and with stores to supply the want of the necessaries and comforts of life. Where are those fifty thousand men? Are Missourians no longer true to themselves? Are they a timid, time-serving race, fit only for subjugation to a despot? Awake, my countrymen, to a sense of what constitutes the dignity of true greatness of a people! A few men have fought your battles. A few have dared the dangers of the battle-field. A few have borne the hardships of the camp,—the scorching of the sun of summer, the frosts of winter, the privations incident to our circumstances, fatigue, hunger and thirst, often without blankets, without shoes, with the cold, wet earth for a bed, the sky for a covering, and a stone for a pillow; glad only to meet the enemy in the field, where some paid the noblest devotion known among men on earth to the cause of your country and your rights, with their lives. But where one has been lost by battle, many have been lost by disease induced by privation. During all these trials we murmured not. We offered all we had on earth at the altar of our common country, our own beloved Missouri; and we only now ask our fellow citizens, our brethren, to come to us, and help maintain what we have gained, to win our glorious inheritance from the cruel hand of the spoiler and oppressor. Come to us, brave sons of the Missouri valley! Rally to our standard! I must have fifty thousand men. I call upon you, in the name of your country, for fifty thousand men. Do you stay at home to take care of us and your property? Millions of dollars have been lost because you stayed at home. Do you stay at home for protection? More men have been murdered at home than I have lost in five successive battles. Do you stay at home to secure terms with the enemy? Then I warn you, the day may soon come, when you will be surrendered to the mercies of that enemy, and your substance given to the Hessians and the Jayhawkers.

I cannot, I will not, attribute such motives to you, my countrymen. But where are our Southern Rights friends? We must drive the oppressor from our land. I must have fifty thousand men. Now is the crisis of your fate; now is the golden opportunity to save the State; now is the time for your political salvation. The time of the enlistment of our brave bands is beginning to expire. Do not hold their patience beyond endurance. Do not longer sicken their hearts by hopes deferred. Boys and small property holders have in the main fought the battles for the protection of your property, and when they ask, where are the men for whom we are fighting, how can I explain, my fellow-citizens? I call upon you, by every consideration of interest, by every desire of safety, by every tie that binds you to home and country, delay no longer. Let the dead bury the dead. Leave your property to take care of itself. Come to the army of Missouri—not for a week, or a month, but to free your country.

"Strike, till each armed foe expires!
Strike, for your country's altar fires!
Strike, for the green graves of your streets,
God and your native land!"

The burning fires of patriotism lead us on just at the moment when all might forever be saved. Numbers give strength. Numbers intimidate the foe. Numbers save the necessity of often fighting battles. Numbers make our arms irresistible. Numbers command universal respect and insure confidence.

We must have fifty thousand men. Let the herdsman leave his folds, let the farmer leave his field, let the mechanic leave his shop, let the lawyer leave his office, till we restore the supremacy of the law. Let the aspirants to office and place know, that they will be weighed in the balance of patriotism, and may be found wanting. If there be any craven, cringing spirits, who have not the greatness of soul to respond to their country's call for help, let them stay at home, and let only the brave and true come out to join their brethren in the tented field. Come with supplies of clothing, and tents, if you can procure them.

Come with your guns of any description, that can be made to bring down a foe. If you have no arms, come without them. Bring cooking utensils and rations for a few weeks. Bring no horses to remain with the army, except those necessary for transportation. We must have fifty thousand men. Give me these men, and, by the help of God, I will drive the hiring thieves and marauders from the State. But if, Missourians, you fail now to rise in your strength and avail yourselves of this opportunity to work for honor and liberty, you cannot say we have not done all we could to save you.

You will be advised in time at what point to report for organization and active service. Leave your property at home. What if it all be taken? We have twenty million dollars worth of northern means in Missouri which cannot be recovered when we are once a free State, which will indemnify every citizen who may have lost a dollar by adhesion to the cause of your country. But, in the name of God and the attributes of manhood, let me appeal to you by considerations nobler and firmer than money. Are we a generation of drivelling, snivelling, degraded slaves; or are we men, who can maintain the rights bequeathed to us by our fathers? These rights cannot be surrendered. They are founded on principles, pure, and high, and sacred. Be yours the office to choose between the glory of a free country and a just government, or the bondage of your children. I, at least, will never see the chains fastened upon my country. I will ask for six and a half feet of Missouri soil on which to repose, for I will not live to see my people enslaved. Are you coming? Fifty thousand men of Missouri shall move to victory with the tread of a giant. Come on, my brave fifty thousand heroes—gallant, unconquerable southern men! We await your coming.

STERLING PRICE,
Major-General Commanding.

THE SCHOONER "E. WITHINGTON."

THE following particulars of the capture of the schooner is taken from a letter dated Hilton Head, December 1st:

I received an invitation to go down to Tybee Light in steamer Beu Deford, and gladly accepted the opportunity to see the rebel country. Before starting, we took on board three hundred soldiers as guard, and started on Friday afternoon at four o'clock. We arrived off Tybee Light at dusk, and waited till morning to enter the channel and land the men. Next morning we got under way, and having anchored, prepared to disembark the men. While disembarking, we discovered a schooner with all sail set, steering dead on to the beach. Our captain immediately exclaimed, "That is a rebel schooner trying to run the blockade, and finding she cannot, the captain will beach her."

As soon as we had landed the men, the captain of the Ben Deford, young Deford of Baltimore, Pilot Norris, and myself, took a boat and started for the schooner. On landing and getting nearer, we met the captain of the rebel vessel in charge of a marine. The schooner proved to be the E. Withington, with a cargo of coffee. A little further on we met the mate, the same way, and on arriving at the schooner, found her to be, as we supposed, trying to run the blockade, and loaded with cigars, coffee, oranges, wines, olives, and a variety of small stores, which were immediately taken by our forces.

I took four boxes of cigars and some oranges, and my friends did the same. This makes one of seven vessels which they have taken at this place within a short time. This finished our tour for Saturday. The soldiers then commenced to reconnoitre the island. All this time we were within gunshot of Fort Pulaski, and yet received no notice from it, and the rebel steamer Gordon was looking on. After lying here all night, we started this morning for Port Royal, and arrived here at nine o'clock A. M. After supper this evening I found Capt. Eldridge on the steamer Atlantic, with Messrs. Eben Bacon and Joseph Balch, President of the Boylston Insurance Office in Boston, and had a long talk with them, and received from them much information from home. II.

COL. LEADBETTER'S PROCLAMATION

TO THE CITIZENS OF EAST TENNESSEE.

HEAD-QUARTERS, GREENVILLE, E. T.,
November 30, 1861.To the Citizens of East Tennessee:

So long as the question of Union or Disunion was debatable, so long you did well to debate it and vote on it. You had a clear right to vote for the Union, but when secession was established by the voice of the people you did ill to distract the country by angry words and insurrectionary tumult. In doing this you commit the highest crime known to the laws.

Out of the Southern Confederacy no people possess such elements of prosperity and happiness as those of East Tennessee. The Southern market which you have hitherto enjoyed only in competition with a host of eager Northern rivals, will now be shared with a few States of the Confederacy, equally fortunate, politically and geographically. Every product of your agriculture and workshops will now find a prompt sale at high prices, and, so long as cotton grows on Confederate soil, so long will the money which it brings flow from the South through all your channels of trade.

At this moment you might be at war with the United States, or any foreign nation, and yet not suffer a tenth part of the evils which pursue you in this domestic strife. No man's life or property is safe, no woman or child can sleep in quiet. You are deluded by selfish demagogues, who take care for their own personal safety. You are citizens of Tennessee, and your State one of the Confederate States.

So long as you are up in arms against these States, can you look for any thing but the invasion of your homes and the wasting of your substance? This condition of things must be ended. The Government commands the peace, and sends troops to enforce the order. I proclaim that every man who comes in promptly and delivers up his arms, will be pardoned on taking the oath of allegiance. All men taken in arms against the Government, will be transported to the military prison at Tuscaloosa, and be confined there during the war. Bridge burners and destroyers of railroad tracks are excepted from among those pardonable. They will be tried by drumhead court-martial, and be hung on the spot. D. LEADBETTER,
Colonel Commanding.

THE MANUFACTURE OF SALT.

ITS NECESSITY AT THE SOUTH.

THE Norfolk (Va.) Day Book of November 30, holds the following language on this subject:

An opportunity is now presented to individuals or companies, whereby they may not only make money, but give an expression of patriotism which will be too plain to be misapprehended. We refer to the manufacture of salt, as it is well known this article may be manufactured all along our coast, in great plenty and at but little expense; the only process necessary, being the boiling of the water and bleaching the salt, and the only outlay, that attending the purchase of pans and the price paid for labor. Hitherto, the great difficulty in the way of the manufacture of salt, has been the lack of the pans necessary to the boiling of the water. This difficulty, we are glad to state, has been removed by the proprietors of the Atlantic Iron Works of this city, who, if we are rightly informed, are prepared to fill orders for these pans. When we say that money may be made by any enterprising individual, or individuals, who may engage in this business, we mean precisely what we say, and we mean further that it may be made without any exorbitant charge upon the article. Salt is a necessary, not a luxury of life. Sugar, coffee, and very many other articles, may be dispensed with, and man will be none the worse off for the deprivation; but with salt it is different. Man's health—aye, his very life—depends upon the presence of this article in the food which he consumes; hence, it is not a question with him whether he will use salt or not, but a sheer necessity—an imperative nature that compels him to its use. Its use, then, is universal—the rich, the poor, the high, the low, the great and the small, all require salt, and must have it. Consequently it is an article for which there is always a sale, and which must be had at all hazards. He, then, who undertakes to supply this demand, does it with the perfect knowledge beforehand, that he will sell all of the article that he can possibly make. There is not the least reason for him to apprehend that he can make so much salt that he will never find a market for it; on the contrary, he should and will have reason to congratulate himself if, after his best efforts, he shall be able to meet the demands upon him. For this reason he can manufacture the article and sell it at a reasonable price and make money. His outlay has been small—so small, indeed, as to be liquidated by the sums realized from the sale of the sacks with which he introduces himself in the market. His expenses are exceedingly light, his stock is always salable, and therefore he can afford to sell at a price at which all can purchase, and accumulate in the end a handsome sum as the result of his labor. But not only will he make money, but he will display a patriotism which none can misinterpret. He is not the only patriot, who goes to the tented field and meets the enemy in sanguinary strife. Every individual who lends his aid to the establishment and maintenance of his government, whether it be by military achievements in the field, or in the thousand and one ways which present themselves in the path of the civilian, is a patriot. He who places the means of sustenance within the reach of his people, and he who at the point of the bayonet protects the means thus afforded, are alike patriots, though they labor in different fields. Now let us see if we cannot with this view of the subject, prove the man who undertakes the manufacture of salt at this important crisis a patriot, exhibiting his patriotism in the very act of the undertaking. We are a people battling for our rights—for the protection of our homes and firesides from a ruthless foe who seeks to desecrate them; and for the maintenance by force of arms of the independence we have proclaimed, we have sent our armies to the field. We have supplied them with arms and munitions of war, and in every sense they are a formidable body. But, as strong and formidable as they are, it is possible to reduce them to the helplessness of children, and that by the simple process of withholding salt from them. Its absence from their food will occasion disease and eventually death, and the very object for which they were organized will be defeated, not by the process of opposing hosts, but by the process we have just given. That there is a scarcity of salt we need not endeavor to hide; and equally apparent is the fact, that if it is not manufactured among us, our people—our army—must suffer for it. Now, does not the individual who supplies this great necessity to the armies of this country, serve her as acceptably and as successfully as the glittering hosts who stand upon her borders for her defence? What could these hosts accomplish, should he withhold that which is essential to their health and life? Their proud banners would soon trail in the dust, and that which is now difficult to our foes, would then become easy. If it should be replied, to what we have written, that no such danger as we apprehend will ever come to pass, and that we are giving too much importance to a small consideration, we have only to say that he who thus thinks cannot be acquainted with the facts which have suggested this article.

FIGHT WITH THE PATRICK HENRY

OFFICIAL REPORT BY HER COMMANDER.

CONFEDERATE STATES STEAMER PATRICK HENRY, }
Off MULBERRY ISLAND, JAMES RIVER, VA., }
Dec. 2, 1861.

SIR: Since the 18th of November the enemy have accumulated at Newport News several small gunboats and armed tugs. Learning that they were in the habit of sending several of these gunboats up the river at night, and withdrawing them in the morning, induced me to take the first favorable opportunity to surprise and attack them. This morning being dark and suitable for the enterprise, I left our anchorage, off Mulberry Island, at four o'clock A. M., and proceeded cautiously down the river, all lights carefully concealed. I regret, however, to say, that I was disappointed in not finding the steamers as high up the river as I expected. At early daylight we discovered four steamers anchored in line, this side of the frigates, but in supporting distance of them, and the battery at Newport News. We rounded to at a supposed distance of a mile, and commenced the attack with our port battery and pivot guns, which was returned by the steamers and the battery on shore, from rifled and other guns. Many of the rifled shells came near and over us, and one struck us, going through the pilot house, and exploding in the starboard hammock nettings, producing slight injury, and wounding one of the pilots and a seaman, very slightly, by the splinters. The engagement lasted two hours, when we returned to our anchorage, the enemy evincing no disposition to advance, either during the engagement or afterwards. We expended twenty-eight shells and thirteen solid shot, some of which must have struck, but with what injury to the enemy we are unable to say. * * *

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
 JOHN R. TUCKER,
 Commander C. S. N.
 HON. S. R. MALLORY,
 Sec'y of Navy, Richmond.

A NATIONAL ACCOUNT.

ON BOARD THE GUNBOAT SAUSHEENE, }
 JAMES RIVER, OFF NEWPORT NEWS, Dec. 2, 1861. }

At six o'clock this morning, in the gloaming, as I still lay snug in my berth, on board the gunboat Sausheene, boom came the roar of a heavy gun, and the yell of a big shell passing over us. In about one minute and a half I was dressed and on deck. At short distance from us lay the little fleet of three small gunboats—the Hetzel, Saybrook, and Whitehead—in line of battle, and two miles off up the river, just discernible in the heavy morning mists, lay the long hull of the rebel steamer Patrick Henry, the masts hidden by the fog and the smoke of her guns. In another minute we opened on her with our thirty-two-pounder. The rest of the fleet pitched in with their various armaments. Our orders being positive, in case of attack, to fall back on the heavy ships of war lying off Newport News—we being merely a picket guard—we slowly dropped down the river, firing at every moment, and thus led on the enemy until we were within three miles of the frigates. At this moment we perceived that the Patrick Henry was aground, by her remaining stationary and working her engines disconnected. We ran alongside the senior officer's steamer, Capt. Davenport, stated this fact, proposing to run up and rake her before she could get off, but that officer refused, on the ground that the enemy's metal was heavier and her sides iron-plated, rendering it imprudent to attack at close quarters with our small boats. So we had to content ourselves with lying off and practicing long-range firing at the pirate. The Patrick Henry's sides appear to be only plated about the bulwarks. No signs of them could be discerned below, nor does she draw water enough to make it probable that she has plates all over, as, with her armament, she would be very deep. With a glass, her decks could be seen to be crowded with men—three to four hundred at least. Her firing was very good, the shells striking all around us, sometimes striking within twenty feet of us, the pieces flying over us like a flock of birds. During the heaviest firing, we were surprised to see, just ahead of us, a small wherry with an officer and a black man in it. It lay in the track of the shells, and every few minutes would be half submerged by the bursting of them on the water. After the fight was over, we found it to be a young officer, Capt. Drake De Kay, of the army, aid to a General on shore, who had pulled off alone to join in the fun. He came on board, to the great relief of his nigger, who was nearly white with fear. The firing was kept up for about two hours—no damage being done on our side, and our shots only hulling the Patrick Henry, and one or two shells bursting over her, the effect of which it was impossible to make out. She then veered around, and, firing a few random shots as a parting salute, steamed rapidly up the James River. Had we had one or two regular gunboats, and not weak tug-boats with heavy guns mounted on them, we could have run up and cut out the rebel flag-ship; but with the poor tubs we have, nothing could be done more than we did do.

A SECESSION ACCOUNT.

NORFOLK, December 3, 1861.

For some days past two or three of the Federal gunboats have been in the habit of running up James River five or six miles above Newport News each evening, and remaining there all night. What the object of this was is unknown, unless it may have been to keep a watch on the movements of the Confederate steamer Patrick Henry. These gunboats on Sunday evening repeated this same manoeuvre, and on yesterday morning the Patrick Henry got under way from her position further up James River and came down. On seeing her, the gunboats left immediately and put out down the river towards the blockading ships. The Patrick Henry continued her chase after them, and they ran in under the protection of the guns of the frigates Cumberland and Congress and the fort at Newport News. The Patrick Henry opened fire among them, after getting a desirable position, from her after-gun, firing shell; and, our informant tells, for as much as a half hour she continued to drop her shell on and around the frigate Congress, many of which it is believed, bursted on her decks, with what effect we shall be unable to determine, as the Federals keep all such matters too close. The engagement commenced about quarter-past six and lasted two hours. During the time, the gunboats would frequently sally out from behind the frigates to give the Patrick Henry a shot, and on such occasion she would soon force them back by a well-directed shot, several of which, it is believed, struck these gunboats. Two of them, (there were four altogether,) after receiving a shot from the Patrick Henry, retired to the immediate vicinity of the wharf at Newport News, while the other two kept their position out of harm's way in the rear of the frigates. They at one time made an attempt to pass up James River so as to flank the Patrick Henry, and, when getting well out from under the protection of the frigate's batteries, the Patrick Henry put chase after them, and they scampered back. After this, they appeared to have become afraid to venture out again, and the Patrick Henry had to then remain satisfied with peppering the frigates, which she did, it is said, in a masterly and beautiful manner.

It is said by those who witnessed the entire engagement, that the Patrick Henry was handled in a thoroughly seamanlike manner by those on board, and her guns were worked to perfection. She played upon the enemy mostly with her after-gun while lying off Newport News, and would occasionally back up towards the enemy when she would drift out of range of her mark. It is supposed she used her after-gun, in order to keep the best position to prevent being outflanked, and to keep the enemy from having a chance at her broadside.

We are unable to say what damage was done to either party in this engagement, and, so far as the Federal vessels are concerned, we shall not be able to ascertain; but our informant tells us it is his opinion that the Patrick Henry is entirely unharmed, notwithstanding she was the single object of attack from the four gunboats, the two frigates, and four guns from the fort at Newport News. After the firing ceased, she passed up James River to her position, apparently as fresh as a lark.

MR. SAULSBURY'S RESOLUTIONS.

OFFERED IN THE U. S. SENATE, DEC. 4, 1861.

WHEREAS, the people of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas and Tennessee, are in revolt against the Constitutional Government of the United States, and have assumed to secede from the Federal Union, to form an independent Government, under the name of the "Confederate States of America;" and

Whereas, the Congress of the United States, approving the sentiments of the President in his annual message, that "the Union must be preserved," and hence all indispensable means must be employed; and believing that kind and fraternal feeling between the people of all the States is indispensable to the maintenance of a happy and prosperous Union, and being willing to manifest such feeling on their part to them, and that peace may be restored to a distracted country, and the Union and Constitution be preserved and maintained, and inviting the cooperation of the people of the aforesaid States in the accomplishment of this object—it is desirable to each and all—do resolve as follows:—

Resolved, That Millard Fillmore, Franklin Pierce, Roger B. Taney, Edward Everett, Geo. M. Dallas, Thomas M. Ewing, Horace Binney, Reverdy Johnson, John J. Crittenden, George E. Pugh and Richard W. Thompson be, and they are hereby, appointed Commissioners on the part of Congress, to confer with a like number of Commissioners, to be appointed by the States aforesaid, for the preservation of the Union and the maintenance of the Constitution; and that they report the result of said conference of Congress for approval or rejection.

Resolved, That upon the appointment of Commissioners, as hereby invited by said States, and upon the meeting of the joint commission for the purpose of conference as aforesaid, active hostilities shall cease and be suspended; and shall not be renewed unless said commission shall be unable to agree, or in case of an agreement by them, said agreement shall be rejected either by Congress or by the aforesaid States.

REBEL OPINIONS OF THE RESOLUTIONS.

Our readers will find in our columns to-day, the preamble and resolutions of Mr. Saulsbury, of Delaware, offered in the Senate of the United States, proposing to put an end to the revolt, by appointing commissioners to confer with commissioners to be appointed by the Confederate States, "for the preservation of the Union and the maintenance of the Constitution." Here is reconstruction proposed, more formidable, perhaps, to the liberties and the lasting peace of the Confederate States, than cannon and bayonets. As the action proposed is by the Congress of the United States, it must be met, we presume, by the action of the Congress of the Confederate States. The Congress of the Confederate States will never, we presume, appoint any commissioners to meet commissioners from the United States, "for the preservation of the Union and the maintenance of the Constitution." They represent a confederacy of independent States. As the representatives of an independent people, they can authorize no conference with the United States, on the assumption that they are a portion of the United States. When propositions to treat for peace come to us, as an independent people, we can, with propriety, listen to them. But in any other form, they should be rejected with contempt, since, by our acquiescence, they would convey an acknowledgment of guilt in asserting our independence. But laying such views aside, we do not think that the Confederate States can make a peace with the United States, which will secure to them the frontier States of Missouri, Kentucky, and Maryland; and without these States in our Confederacy, any treaty of peace with the United States, surrendering them, would be disgraceful, and, perhaps, ruinous in the future, to the Confederate States. Slavery would speedily be abolished in them, when left a portion of the United States. Every principle of policy and of honor requires that we should fight the war out to the bitter end, before we surrender a single slave State to the brutal fanaticism of the North. We have no fear of the result in the war in which we are engaged. But a policy which war and rapine and murder cannot force upon us, may be fastened upon us by the cunning slime of diplomacy. We have vanquished our enemies in every pitched battle; and now, insulted England and interested Europe, may come to our aid. It is a good time for Yankee diplomacy to crave fraternity, and reconstruct our dependency. Yet we do not believe that these resolutions will, at the present time, pass the Congress of the United States. Matters are not yet ripe for peace on either side.

—Charleston Mercury, Dec. 12.

A PEACE FROM YANKEEDOM.

We see by the proceedings of the Federal Congress, that in the Senate on the 4th of Dec. Mr. Saulsbury offered a joint resolution, that Willard Fillmore, Franklin Pierce, Roger B. Taney, Edward Everett, George M. Dallas, Thomas M. Ewing, Horace Binney, Reverdy Johnson, John J. Crittenden, Geo. E. Pugh, and Richard W. Thompson, be appointed commissioners on the part of Congress to confer with the commission appointed by the "so-called Confederate States," "for the preservation of the Union and the maintenance of the Constitution."

We conceive that this is a pretty bright idea on the part of the Yankees; but we are at a loss to fully appreciate the compliment of their all on us to maintain an instrument (the Constitution) that they have long since smashed into smithers, unless it is that there is a party among them that still believe in the superior statesmanship of our Southern leaders, and they wish to get them to fix it up again for their special benefit, seeing its destruction has enabled the Autocrat to trample rather severely upon their liberties.

We would recommend to those "Constitution" cobblers the peculiar virtue of "Spalding's" for their purpose, with the assurance that they will find quite as much virtue in that article as they would likely find in the combined wisdom of all the statesmen in the world, for the repair and preservation of an instrument that has been so badly rent as what was once the "Constitution of the United States." As for their Union, we would remind them that it is an excellent Union for them, being composed of such despicable God-forsaken scoundrels as are never raked together in one parcel since the world has been a world. It is now a perfect dog-dog conglomeration of negro thieves and rogues; and as they have got rid of the honest people of the South, they are now at liberty to go it with a rush.

Maybe they would like a cessation of hostilities for a time—during the palaver of the commissioners, as another resolution proposes—in order to get an opportunity to accomplish some object they have in view. But possibly our people have had enough of such dodges in the intended compromise schemes, which were afterwards proved to be but means used to gain time on their part.

If they desire peace, they have but to withdraw their troops from our soil, and let us alone, and until they do this, we should perseveringly scorn any proposition emanating from them.

We wonder if these poor, miserable, degraded, negro-stealing wretches do really think to gammon the people of the South still further? What under Heavens should we want with a union with them? To share the debts caused by their folly? To share alike with them the contempt of the world? For surely we can conceive of nothing else we should gain by any future alliance with them.

GEN. PHELPS' PROCLAMATION.

HEAD-QUARTERS MIDDLESEX BRIGADE,
SHIP ISLAND, Mississippi, December 4, 1861.

To the loyal citizens of the Southwest:

Without any desire of my own, but contrary to my private inclinations, I again find myself among you as a military officer of the Government. A proper respect for my fellow-countrymen renders it not out of place that I should make known to you the motives and principles by which my command will be governed.

We believe that every State that has been admitted as a slave State into the Union since the adoption of the Constitution, has been admitted in direct violation of that Constitution.

We believe that the slave States which existed, as such, at the adoption of our Constitution, are, by becoming parties to that compact, under the highest obligations of honor and morality to abolish slavery.

It is our conviction that monopolies are as destructive, as competition is conservative of the principles and vitalities of republican government; that slave labor is a monopoly which excludes free labor and competition; that slaves are kept in comparative idleness and ease in a fertile half of our arable national territory, while free white laborers, constantly augmenting in numbers from Europe, are confined to the other half, and are often distressed by want; that the free labor of the North has more need of expansion into the Southern States, from which it is virtually excluded, than slavery had into Texas in 1846; that free labor is essential to free institutions; that these institutions are naturally better adapted and more congenial to the Anglo-Saxon race than are the despotic tendencies of slavery; and, finally, that the dominant political principles of this North American Continent, so long as the Caucasian race continues to flow in upon us from Europe, must needs be that of free institutions and free government. Any obstructions to that form of government in the United States, must inevitably be attended with discord and war.

Slavery, from the condition of a universally recognized social and moral evil, has become at length a political institution, demanding political recognition. It demands rights, to the expulsion of those rights which are insured to us by the Constitution; and we must choose between them which we will have, for we cannot have both. The Constitution was made for freemen, not for slaves. Slavery, as a social evil, might for a time be tolerated and endured; but as a political institution, it becomes imperious and exacting, controlling, like a dread necessity, all whom circumstances have compelled to live under its sway, hampering their action, and thus impeding our national progress. As a political institution, it could exist as a co-ordinate part only of two forms of government, viz., the despotic and the free; and it could exist under a free government only when public sentiment, in the most unrestricted exercise of a robust freedom, leading to extravagance and licentiousness, had swayed the thoughts and habits of the people beyond the bounds and limits of their own moderate constitutional provisions. It could exist under a free government only where the people, in a period of unreasoning extravagance, had permitted popular clamor to overcome public reason, and had attempted the impossibility of setting up permanently, as a political institution, a social evil which is opposed to moral law.

By reverting to the history of the past, we find that one of the most destructive wars on record—that of the French Revolution—was originated by the attempt to give political character to an institution which was not susceptible of political character. The Church, by being endowed with political power, with its convents, its schools, its immense landed wealth, its associations, secret and open, became the ruling power of the State, and thus occasioned a war of more strife and bloodshed, probably, than any other war which has desolated the earth.

Slavery is still less susceptible of political character than was the Church. It is as fit at this moment for the lumber-room of the past as were, in 1793, the landed wealth, the exclusive privilege, etc., of the Catholic Church in France.

It behooves us to consider, as a self-governing people, bred and reared and practiced in the habits of self-government, whether we cannot, whether we ought not, revolutionize slavery out of existence, without the necessity of a conflict of arms like that of the French Revolution.

Indeed, we feel assured that the moment slavery is abolished, from that moment our Southern brethren, every ten of whom have probably seven relatives in the North, would begin to emerge from a hateful delirium. From that moment, relieved from imaginary terrors, their days become happy and their nights peaceful and free from alarm; the aggregate amount of labor, under the new stimulus of fair competition, becomes greater day by day; property rises in value; invigorating influences succeed to stagnation, degeneracy, and decay; and union, harmony, and peace, to which we have so long been strangers, become restored, and bind us again in the bonds of friendship and amity, as when we first began our national career under our glorious government of 1789.

Why do the leaders of the rebellion seek to change the form of your ancient Government? Is it because the growth of the African element of your population has come at length to render a change necessary? Will you permit the free Government under which you have thus far lived, and which is so well suited for the development of true manhood, to be altered to a narrow and belittling despotism in order to adapt it to the necessities of ignorant slaves, and the requirements of their proud and aristocratic owners? Will the laboring men of the South bend their necks to the same yoke that is suited to the slave? We think not. We may safely answer that the time has not yet arrived when our Southern brethren, for the mere sake of keeping Africans in slavery, will abandon their long-cherished Free Institutions and become slaves themselves.

It is the conviction of my command, as a part of the national forces of the United States, that labor—manual labor—is inherently noble; that it cannot be systematically degraded by any nation without ruining its peace, happiness, and power; that free labor is the granite basis on which Free Institutions must rest; that it is the right, the capital, the inheritance, the hope of the poor man everywhere; that it is especially the right of five millions of our fellow-countrymen in the slave States as well as of the four millions of Africans there; and all our efforts, therefore, however small or great, whether directed against the interference of governments from abroad, or against rebellious combinations at home, shall be for Free Labor. Our motto and our standard shall be, here and everywhere, and on all occasions, FREE LABOR AND WORKINGMEN'S RIGHTS. It is on this basis, and this basis alone, that our munificent Government, the asylum of nations, can be perpetuated and preserved. J. W. PHELPS,

Brigadier-General of Volunteers, Commanding.

GEN. PHELPS' OFFICIAL REPORT.

SHIP ISLAND, MISSISSIPPI SOUND, Dec. 5, 1861.

Major-General B. F. Butler, commanding Department of New England, Boston, Mass.:

SIR: A part of the Middlesex Brigade, consisting of the Massachusetts Twenty-sixth and Connecticut Ninth Infantry, volunteers, with Capt. Manning's battery of artillery, volunteers, numbering in all (servants included) one thousand nine hundred and eight, arrived off Fortress Monroe, Virginia, on board the steam transport Constitution, on the 26th of November. In compliance with previous orders and commands, I relieved Colonel Jones, of the Massachusetts Twenty-sixth, in command, and we stood out to sea on the afternoon of the 27th.

After a pleasant passage, we reached Ship Island harbor, Mississippi Sound, on the evening of the 8d of December. Despatches for Flag-officer McKean, with which I was intrusted, were sent by Lieut. Winslow, of the

R. Cuyler, the same evening to Pensacola station, where the flag-officer then was, and to whom I made known my arrival. Captain Smith, of the steamer Massachusetts, offered us the means within his power to facilitate our landing, an operation which we have not yet completed, and which we should have found very difficult, if not impossible, but for the alous assistance rendered by Lieut. Buchanan and the officers of his command, aided by two high-pressure steamers which the navy had recently captured. We found in the harbor the United States war vessels Massachusetts and R. Cuyler, beside several prizes, and not long afterward the gunboat New London and an armed schooner came in.

Upon the west end of the island a partially finished fort is occupied by about one hundred and seventy sailors and marines, commanded by Lieut. Buchanan, of the navy, who has several large calibre Dahlgren guns in position on navy carriages. The rebels, by whom the island was held several months, abandoned it in September last, and destroyed nearly every thing which they could not carry off. The fort and lighthouse, with the keeper's lodgings, remain, the former unfinished, and the latter injured to some extent by fire. The walls of the fort have been carried up to a sufficient height by the shells to form nearly a tier of casemates, and are partly covered over. With some considerable masonry work, and with materials, (none on the island except lime,) it might receive some heavy guns on casemate carriages.

The island is a long, narrow strip of land, running north of east some six or seven miles toward the west end, where the harbor lies, and where we are encamped, it consists of hummocks of fine white sand, interspersed with sedgy spots of water. It bears evidence of having been overflowed in some extraordinary rains, large trunks of trees having drifted on some of its higher hummocks. The east end extends out in triangular shape, embracing about one square mile, and is covered with pine trees. I made an unsuccessful effort to have it mined the day after our arrival, and regretting being too much occupied since to return to it.

For the present, I concluded to land here, where I can place, though indifferently well, one or two more regiments. The land is in no respect suitable for a camp, especially in view of such instruction as one of the regiments particularly needs. Should the stay here be of long continuance, huts with floors will be necessary. I regret to learn that, in landing my baggage, one of Capt. Manning's six-pounders was lost overboard.

It seeming it proper to make known to this people the remote objects of this expedition, I have prepared a proclamation, which I shall endeavor to have disseminated as early and fully as possible, consistent with the more pressing demands of the service.

December 6, 1861.

I have to-day, in accordance with my instructions, held an interview with Capt. Smith, of the Massachusetts, Flag-officer McKean not having arrived. Capt. Smith thinks there is water enough on the island and in the vicinity to supply gunboats and other vessels of the station, although procuring it will be slow and difficult. He says the flag-officer has ordered more guns for the fort, which are daily expected. He suggests a coal depot on the island, and a regular steam packet between the island and Fortress Monroe, or some other Northern port.

The discharging of the Constitution is still going on. The wind since our arrival has prevailed from north and east, and the water last night rose so high that a considerable portion of the island between the fort and lighthouse was overflowed, leaving a thin sheet of water there—an event which, I am informed, is not unfrequent. The narrow strip of land, about a quarter or a third of a mile in width, which forms the western extremity of the island, is but ill-suited for a camp, either for regulars or volunteers. I have visited the eastern extremity of the island, beyond the lagoon. There is sufficient space for five thousand men, but the land is so interspersed with marshes that I consider a camp there for that number out of the question. The water along the northern shore for some distance is so shallow that our rowboats dragged bottom. The beach is lined with a ridge of sand hummocks, some ten feet in height; but beyond these the land is generally low, and covered with pines, scrub oak, scrub palmetto, and marsh grass in patches. Mosquitoes would be troublesome there at all seasons, and in rainy weather much of the ground would be under water. The process of reclamation seems still to be going on with an activity as if it had but just begun, although the island is probably as old as the mainland. The animals here are snakes, toads, birds, raccoons, pigs, and, it is said, alligators.

The New London, with four long thirty-twos and one rifled cannon, appears to be, under her present commander, a very effective and well-managed craft, giving the enemy much annoyance. The enemy's gunboats are of light draught, armed with rifled guns, and it is folly to allow them such an advantage. With such an advantage on our side we could make ourselves felt in this quarter.

December 7—2 P. M.

The Constitution has been discharged, and will sail before dark. While re-perusing this report, the De Soto and New London have been engaging the enemy's boats in the direction of New Orleans.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
your obedient servant,
J. W. PHELPS,
Brigadier-General Commanding.

NOTE FROM MAJOR-GENERAL BUTLER TO THE
ADJUTANT-GENERAL.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 19, 1861.

To the Adjutant-General of the United States Army:

SIR: I have the honor to forward to the Commanding General this report of Brigadier-General Phelps. I have not received from General Phelps any official copy of the proclamation to which he refers, but from other sources have such information as renders it certain that the printed copies are nearly correct. I need hardly say the issuing of any proclamation, upon such occasion, was neither suggested nor authorized by me, and most certainly not such a one. With that exception, I commend the report, and ask attention to its clear and business-like statements. I have the honor to be, your obedient servant, BENJ. F. BUTLER,
Brigadier-General Commanding.

AFFAIR AT WHIPPOORWILL BRIDGE, KY.

DECEMBER 4, 1861.

THE Louisville-Nashville Courier, of the 9th of December, gives the following details of the bridge-burning affair at Whippoorwill:

A detachment of fifteen had been stationed at the bridge to guard it, of whom two were absent at the time of the attack.

The Federals, fifty or sixty in number, under command of a Dutch Jew peddler named Netter, and among whom were several who had been raised in the neighborhood, made their appearance about daybreak Thursday morning. Four of the guard, who were on duty, and who were standing by a plank cabin, fired upon them, whereupon they received a volley of over one hundred rounds from Sharp's revolving rifles, killing two instantly and wounding another. Most of the shots were fired into the cabin, on the supposition that the rest of the guard were asleep in it, but fortunately they were in a cabin a little distance off. They were aroused by the firing, but by the time they were up, the Federals were at the cabin, and they had to surrender. They put the prisoners under guard, tore down the cabins, put the planks on the bridge, which they sprinkled with turpentine, and then fired it. Our informant was set about gathering up the baggage of the guard, but, finding an opportunity, he made his escape and came to Russellville.

Willis Campbell, of Logan County, a member of Captain King's company, and Hatch Jupin, of Bardstown, a member of Captain Wickliffe's company, were killed, and Joseph Wilson, of Bardstown, also in Captain Wickliffe's company, was severely but not dangerously wounded in the thigh. While loading his gun for the second fire, his right forefinger was shot off. Joseph Hall, James Watshall, and John Jernigon, of Captain Mitchell's company; Isaac Duckwall and Joseph Johnson, of Boshe's Portland Rangers; Thomas Lilly and Messrs. Dougherty and Fox, of Captain Wickliffe's company, and Paul Burgett, of Captain King's company, were taken prisoners.

Four of the Federals were wounded—not killed, as we understood yesterday. They got a wagon in the neighborhood, in which their wounded were placed, and a little boy who saw them an hour or two after the fight said that one was dead.

SECRETARY SEWARD'S LETTER.

CONTRABANDS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON CITY, December 4, 1861. }To Major-General George B. McClellan, Washington:

GENERAL: I am directed by the President to call your attention to the following subject:

Persons claimed to be held to service or labor under the laws of the State of Virginia, and actually employed in hostile service against the Government of the United States, frequently escape from the lines of the enemy's forces and are received within the lines of the army of the Potomac. This Department understands that such persons, afterward coming into the city of Washington, are liable to be arrested by the city police, upon presumption, arising from color, that they are fugitives from service or labor.

By the fourth section of the act of Congress approved August 6th, 1861, entitled "An Act to confiscate property used for insurrectionary purposes," such hostile employment is made a full and sufficient answer to any further claim to service or labor. Persons thus employed and escaping are received into the military protection of the United States, and their arrest as fugitives from service or labor should be immediately followed by the military arrest of the parties making the seizure.

Copies of this communication will be sent to the Mayor of the city of Washington and to the Marshal of the District of Columbia, that any collision between the civil and military authorities may be avoided.

I am, General, your very obedient,
WM. H. SEWARD.

THE IROQUOIS AND THE SUMTER.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF COM. PALMER.

THE following official report from Captain Palmer, of the Iroquois, embraces his account of his experiences with the privateer Sumter at Martinique:

UNITED STATES STRAMER IROQUOIS, }
OFF ST. PIERRE, MARTINIQUE, Nov. 17, 1861. }

SIR: I addressed a letter to the Department on the 11th inst., upon my arrival at St. Thomas.

On the day following, in the midst of coaling, a mail steamer arrived, bringing information that the Sumter had just put in on the 9th to Port Royal, Martinique, in want of coals.

I had been often led astray by false reports, but this seemed so positive that I instantly ceased coaling, got my engines together, and was off at 2 in the mid-watch for Martinique, arriving at St. Pierre in thirty-six hours. On turning into the harbor I discovered a suspicious steamer, which, as we approached, proved to be the Sumter, flying the secession flag, moored to the wharf, in the midst of this populous town, quietly coaling. The town and shipping in the harbor were instantly all excitement. I could not attack her in this position, for humanity's sake, even were I disposed to be regardless of the neutrality of the port. I did not anchor, but cruised around the harbor within half gun-shot of her during the night.

In the morning a French man-of-war arrived from Port Royal, the seat of government, only twelve miles distant. The Sumter had been there for the last two days. The government, it is true, had refused to give her any of its coals, but had allowed her to come around to St. Pierre, where she readily obtained them from some merchants, (English, I believe.)

She evidently had been received with courtesy at the seat of government, and this farce of the non-recognition of the Confederate flag is played out of both France and England in the most flagrant manner.

I now addressed a letter to the Governor, assuming him to be ignorant of the character of the Sumter, a copy of which I enclose. I also enclose a translation of his reply. The Department will observe that from the generous disposition of the Governor, the Sumter has the same privileges as this vessel.

The captain of the French war-steamer also addressed me a letter, saying he was directed by the Governor to request me no longer to compromise the neutrality of the French waters by establishing a blockade within their jurisdiction, but to anchor, when every hospitality and facility should be afforded me, or to take my position without the distance of a marine league from shore. At the same time, that, while anchor weigh it was contrary to the police regulations of the port to communicate with the shore.

I consequently decided upon anchoring, which I had no sooner done than the French commander paid me a visit, offered me every civility and attention, saying that he did not doubt that all international law would be respected by me; and in the course of conversation, quoting from Wheaton, reminded me that one belligerent could not depart until twenty-four hours after the other. I instantly got under weigh, with him on board, fearing that the Sumter should do so before me, as her steam was up.

I have now accepted the alternative, and established myself at the mouth of the harbor, without the marine league, with much anxiety, lest during the darkness of the night, under cover of the high land, the Sumter should be able to get off without my being aware of it.

The majority of the town is in favor of the Sumter, and with the utmost vigilance, which all on board exert, she may yet escape some night for want of signals from the shore to give us notice of her departure.

I am also in want of coal, and shall send over to St. Thomas to-morrow for a supply, as well as provisions, stores, &c., for when I left I did not bargain for this blockade.

The Sumter seems in good condition. The consul informs me she has one hundred and twenty men. She does not certainly appear to be in the disorganized state in which late accounts have represented her.

She has latterly captured but two American vessels—one the brig Joseph Parke, of Boston, on the 25th of September; the other the schooner Daniel Trowbridge, of New Haven, on the 27th of October. She has landed here fourteen prisoners on their parole. Three of the Joseph Parke's men (all foreigners) joined the Sumter.

I regret to give the government so long and unsatisfactory a letter, but must avail myself of the opportunity for St. Thomas, which offers to-morrow.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant, JAMES S. PALMER,
Commander.

To Hon. GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C.

P. S.—November 18.—I feel more and more convinced that the Sumter will yet escape me, in spite of all our vigilance and zeal, even admitting that I can outsteam her, which is a question.

To blockade such a bay as this, which is almost an open roadstead, fifteen miles in width, the surrounding land very high and the water very bold, obliged, as we are by the neutrality laws, to blockade at three miles' distance, it would require at least two more fast steamers, and a vessel of war of any description in port to notify us by signal of her departure, to give any reasonable hope of preventing her escape.

Even now, moonlight though it be, she may yet creep out under shadow of the land, and no one be able to perceive her, she being always able to observe my position, open to seawards. Though I have made arrangements to be informed by signal of her departure from shore, I fear I cannot depend upon the parties, so fearful are they of the authorities and of popular indignation.

I have done all I can, and if she escapes me, we must submit to the distress and mortification.

I believe we have no vessel on this station except the Macedonia, and there is no knowing when she may get up this way to learn our situation.

I wish the Sumter were anywhere else except in this port, or under French protection. The authorities here, under plea of neutrality, are throwing every obstacle in my way, in the way of communicating with the shore. They are so full of punctilio, and, withal, so polished, that it is provoking to have any thing to do with them.

CORRESPONDENCE.

UNITED STATES STEAMSHIP IROQUOIS, }
OFF ST. PIERRE, NOV. 15, 1861. }

SIR: As circumstances prevent my paying my personal respects to your Excellency or your representative at this place, I write to announce my arrival in the afternoon of yesterday, as well as to inform you that to my surprise I find a notorious steamer, called the Sumter, quietly coaling at the wharves, and enjoying the hospitalities of the port.

As your Excellency cannot be aware of the character of this vessel, I denounce her to you as one that has been for some time engaged in pirating upon the commerce of the United States, robbing, burning, or otherwise destroying all American vessels that come within her reach.

May I not hope, therefore, that your Excellency, upon this representation, will not allow her to enjoy the privileges I complain of, but direct her to leave the protection of the French flag, and the immunities of a French port?

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
your obedient servant,
JAS. S. PALMER,
Commanding U. S. steamship Iroquois.

To his Excellency, the Governor of Martinique.

TRANSLATION.

GOVERNEMENT DE LA MARTINIQUE, }
CABINET DES GOUVERNEUR No. 430, FORT-DE-FRANCE, }
Le 15h Nov., 1861. }

MONSIEUR LE COMMANDANT: I have the honor to reply to the letter which you addressed me this morning.

I am not ignorant, Mons. le Commandant, of the presence in the roads of St. Pierre of a vessel belonging to the States of the South, who profess to have formed a separate Confederation.

To accomplish the generous intentions of the Emperor, I wish to be hospitable to the vessels of the two belligerent parties, but I will not, neither cannot, without violating the orders of his Majesty, divest myself of the absolute neutrality that I ought to observe.

This is to say to you, Mons. le Commandant, that if it is not my intention to refuse an anchorage to a vessel belonging to the States of the South, I offer to you, on the other hand, the same hospitality, and the same facilities to the vessel belonging to the Government of the Union, which you have the honor to command.

There exist, besides, international laws, that every civilized nation scrupulously observes, and which I need scarcely recall to you, Mons. le Commandant, nor to the Commandant of the Sumter.

Accept, Mons. le Commandant, the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

LE ADMIRAL,
Gouverneur de la Martinique, etc.
Monsieur le Commandant de la Iroquois.

U. S. S. IROQUOIS, OFF, ST. PIERRE, MARTINIQUE, }
November 23, 1861. }

SIR: I think it is well in my present provoking and anxious position to keep the Government informed by whatever opportunity may offer.

It is now the ninth day that I have been blockading the Sumter. She lies still at the wharf, surrounded by more or less of a crowd day and night, all anxious for her escape, sympathizing with their fellow Frenchmen of the State of Louisiana, to which State they believe the Sumter to belong. The authorities, from the Governor down, I believe to be all in their favor. I directed the Consul the other day to call upon the Governor and inform him that I regarded the attitude of the authorities as unfriendly to the United States. I quote you the Consul's reply:

"I called on the Governor on Monday night, but could do nothing more than to ask an audience for next day, as his salon was full of people, among them the Captain of the Sumter. When I saw him he said the sanitary regulations were such as were enforced on Monday, and that he had no control over them. The vessel having gone beyond the regular health and Custom House limits, has lost the rights of regular pratique, the Governor of course repudiating any thing like unfriendliness, and regretting the necessity of submitting to the laws in your case, and would be glad to see you in here at anchor to prove the sincerity of his good wishes."

Unfortunately for me the coming to an anchor involves the necessity of waiting twenty-four hours after the departure of the Sumter, for I have consented to the Governor's expressed hope that I would abide by all rules of international law, consequently I am obliged to cruise outside, and run the risk of her escaping every night.

Thus far we have had the moon, but it is now waning fast, and, with the most intense watching and devotion, I fear I may yet have to report her escape. Would that there were another fast steamer to watch the other point of the bay. I have some understanding with some loyal people on shore to notify by signal of her departure.

The French will doubtless think it a great outrage upon their neutrality, but they will have to pocket this, as I have been as forbearing as they can expect, and nothing but the feeling of the impolicy of bringing on hostilities between my country and France, makes me submit with any thing like grace.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
your obedient servant,

JAMES S. PALMER, Com'g.

HON. GIDRON WELLES,
Sec'y of the Navy, Washington, D. C.

UNITED STATES STEAMSHIP IROQUOIS, }
ST. THOMAS, W. I., NOV. 25, 1861. }

SIR: As I expected, I have to report the escape of the Sumter, to the great dejection of us

l, for never were officers and crew more zealous for a capture.

At eight o'clock on the night of the 23d, the signal was faithfully made us from the shore, that the Sumter had shipped to the southward. Instantly we were off in pursuit, soon at full speed, rushing down to the southern part of the bay, but nothing was visible on the dark background.

A small steamer, apparently one plying between St. Pierre and Port Royal, was off the point making signals, doubtless for the benefit of the Sumter. But we could see nothing of her as we proceeded on, so dark was the shadow thrown by the high land. Still we went on, all searching the darkness in vain. So soon as I had opened Port Royal Point, and seen nothing on the now open horizon, I concluded that we had passed her, or that she had doubled on us and gone to the northward. I then turned, keeping close on the shore, looking into her former anchorage, thinking she might possibly have returned.

No sign of her there. We continued on to the northward, but when we opened the port nothing of her this way.

We were now at fault which way to steer. Something like smoke being reported to seaward, I determined to start out, taking the direction to St. Thomas, to which place I was anxious to return, ere the vessel with our coals and provisions should leave, and thus check at least a small evil, for I now became hopeless of ever discovering the Sumter.

I reached this port this morning, and found that the Dacotah, which had arrived on the 21st from the East Indies, had taken in tow my vessel, with her stores, and gone to meet me.

It is, of course, all conjecture, where the Sumter will next cruise. I learned at St. Pierre that she had purchased sea-jackets for her crew, which may look like a cruise on our Northern coast, though I question whether she is calculated for winter service in that quarter. Should she continue in this vicinity, I will soon hear of her from the constant arrivals here.

I shall be glad to understand from the Government whether they wish me to respect international law in the case of the Sumter, which gives her so great immunity, and makes every foreign port her asylum.

I was informed at Martinique, that France would regard it as an act of war if I attacked her within the marine league of the island.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
your obedient servant,

JAMES S. PALMER, Commander.

MOVEMENTS NEAR PORT ROYAL, S. C.

DECEMBER 4-6, 1861.

REPORTS OF COMMODORE DUPONT.

PORT ROYAL HARBOR, S. C., December 4, 1861. }
FLAGSHIP WABASH, }

SIR: The apprehension of losing possession of the Bay of St. Helena, so exceedingly valuable for a harbor, for its proximity to Charleston, and for the command it secures of large rivers supplying interior communication with the State of South Carolina, has induced me to despatch a second expedition there, under Commander Drayton, with orders to hold the island until Gen. Sherman is prepared to assume military occupation of it, when he will transfer the fort to his troops.

I have also despatched Commander C. R. P. Rogers to make a reconnoissance of Warsaw Inlet, in order to ascertain the position and force of the enemy's battery there—information which the Commanding-General has expressed to me is his desire to obtain before landing troops on Tybee Island.

The department will have the goodness to observe that, in the necessary occupation of St. Helena Sound and of Tybee Roads, and in the examination of Warsaw Inlet, a large number of the vessels of my squadron is engaged, which will be released and employed on blockading duty as soon as Otter and Tybee Islands are held by the army.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,
S. F. DUPONT,
Flag-Officer Commanding.

UNITED STATES FLAGSHIP WABASH, }
PORT ROYAL HARBOR, S. C. December 6, 1861. }

SIR: I have the honor to inform the department that the fortifications at Warsaw Island have been abandoned by the rebels, after moving the guns, cutting up the platforms, and breaching one face of the fort. For the circumstances attending this important discovery, and the temporary occupation of the waters of Warsaw Sound, as well as for a knowledge of the inner and ultimate line of defences selected by the enemy, I have the pleasure to refer to the accompanying report of Commander C. R. P. Rogers, upon whose judgment and skill I relied for the execution of this undertaking. Warsaw Inlet and Sound constitute a second entrance into Savannah River; and, as twenty-one feet can be carried over the bar at high water, this passage is but little inferior to Tybee entrance. The highest point reached by Commander Rogers was about eight miles from Warsaw bar, about ten from Savannah, and between four and five from Thunderbolt on one side and Montgomery on the other. These two last places are described in the coast survey memoirs and reports. I attach the highest value to this possession.

I have the honor to be sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,
S. F. DUPONT,
Flag-Officer Commanding.

REPORT OF COMMANDER C. R. P. ROGERS.

UNITED STATES FLAGSHIP WABASH, }
 PORT ROYAL HARBOR, December 6, 1861. }

SIR: On yesterday morning I left Tybee Roads before daylight, with the steamers Ottawa, Seneca, and Pembina, and crossed the bar of Warsaw Sound, at half tide, not having less than eighteen feet of water upon it. We approached the fort on Warsaw Island within a mile, and, seeing neither guns nor men, we did not fire, but I sent Lieutenant Barnes to it with a white flag. He found it an enclosed octagonal work, with platforms for eight guns on the water faces. The land faces were protected by abatis. The work was well constructed. The guns had been removed, the platforms cut, and the magazine blown up. From the freshness of the footprints and other signs, it appeared to have been abandoned very recently. Adjoining the fort are huts or sheds for a large garrison. Some lumber and bricks remain. Everything else had been carried away. We immediately pushed on to Cabbage Island, where we had been led to look out for another battery; but there was nothing of the kind there. We went to the mouth of the creek, through the Romilly Marsh, and to the mouth of Wilmington River. From the mouth of Wilmington River we observed a battery bearing from us about northwest by west, one-half west, and distant about three miles. It is on the river, and just above a house with a red cupola, which is one of the coast survey points of triangulation, and is about ten miles from Savannah. Between the house and the fort was a large encampment; but we could not count the tents. We counted five guns, apparently of large calibre, on the face of the battery toward us. We could only see one gun upon the other face; but there may have been more. We were near enough to see the men on the ramparts, and the glittering of their bayonets. We saw several small vessels. Some of them in Romilly Marsh were in tow of a small steamtug; but they were beyond our reach. Upon Little Tybee Island we could see no earthworks, but could not get nearer to it than two miles, because of the shoals. In coming out of Warsaw Sound, at high tide, we had not less than twenty-one feet of water on the bar. Returning to Tybee Roads at one o'clock, I landed and made a reconnoissance on foot, with the marines of the Savannah and detachments of small-arm men from that ship and the Ottawa. Upon reaching the mouth of Lazarus Creek, having no boats in which to cross, our progress was stopped. We waited until low tide; but the creek was unfordable. I was able, however, with the assistance of Lieut. Luce, to obtain from the top of a tree the position in which a battery has been supposed to exist, and I am satisfied that there is no battery there. The spar which was mistaken for a derriek is simply a place of lookout, and there was no appearance of any earthwork or position for guns. A battery at such a place would be of no use whatever. There may, however, have been a signal gun placed there, as the point upon which the spar is raised is the southeastern point of observation.

I have to thank Lieutenant Commanding Stevens for the most earnest, cordial, and efficient co-operation, and also Lieutenant Commanding Ammen and Bankhead, whose vessels were always in the right place, and always well handled.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
 C. R. P. ROGERS,
 Commander.

Flag-Officer S. F. DUPONT,
 Commanding.

THE CONFEDERATE FLAG.

THE Richmond Dispatch of the 7th of December held the following language on the subject of the rebel flag:

The adoption of our present flag was a natural, but most pernicious blunder. As the old flag itself was not the author of our wrongs, we tore off a piece of the dear old rag and set it up as a standard. We took it for granted a flag was a divisible thing, and proceeded to set off our proportion. So we took, at a rough calculation, our share of the stars and our fraction of the stripes, and put them together and called them the Confederate flag. Even as Aaron of old put the gold into the fire and then came out "this calf," so certain stars and stripes went into committee, and then came out "this flag." All this was honest and fair to a fault. We were clearly entitled to from seven to eleven of the stars, and three or four of the stripes.

Indeed, as we were maintaining the principles it was intended to represent, and the North had abandoned them, we were honestly entitled to the whole flag. Had we kept it, and fought for it, and under it, and conquered it from the North, it would have been no robbery, but all right and fair. And we should either have done this, i. e., kept the flag as a whole—or else we should have abandoned it as a whole and adopted another. But if we did not choose to assert our title to the whole, was it politic or judicious to split the flag and claim one of the fractions? We had an equal right also to "Hail Columbia" and "Yankee Doodle." We might have adopted a part of "Yankee Doodle," (say every third stanza,) or else "Yankee Doodle," with variations, as our national air. In the choice of an air we were not guilty of this absurdity, but we have perpetrated one exactly parallel to it in the choice of a national flag. There is no exaggeration in the illustration. It seems supremely ridiculous, yet it scarcely does our folly justice.

There is but one feature essential to a flag, and that is distinctness. Beauty, appropriateness, good taste, are all desirable, but the only thing indispensable is distinctness—wide, plain, unmistakable distinction from other flags. Unfortunately this indispensable thing is just the thing which the Confederate flag lacks. And failing in this, it is a lamentable and total failure, absolute and irredeemable. The failure is in a matter of essence. It is as complete as that of writing which cannot be read—of a gun which cannot be shot—of a coat which cannot be worn. It is the play of "Hamlet" with the part of Hamlet left out. A flag which does not distinguish may be a very nice piece of bunting—it may be handsomely executed, tasteful, expressive, and a thousand other things, but it has no title at all to bear the name of flag.

We knew the flag we had to fight, yet instead of getting as far from it, we were guilty of the huge mistake of getting as near to it as possible. We sought similarity. Adopting a principle diametrically wrong, we made a flag as nearly like theirs as could, under favorable circumstances, be distinguished from it. Under unfavorable circumstances (such as constantly occur in practice) the two flags are indistinguishable. In the wars of the Roses in Great Britain one side adopted the white and the other the red rose. Suppose that one side had adopted milk white and the other flesh white, or one a deep pink and the other a lighter shade of pink, would there have been any end to the confusion?

When a body of men is approaching in time of war it is rather an important matter to ascertain, if practicable, whether they are friends or foes. Certainly no question could well be more radical in its influence upon our action, plans, and movements. To solve this important question is the object of a flag. When they get near us there may be other means of information; but to distinguish friends from enemies at a distance is the specific purpose of a flag. Human ingenuity is great, and may conceive some other small purposes—presentations, toasts, speeches, &c.—but that this is the great end of a flag, will not be denied; and it is in this that the Confederate flag fails.

There is no case in history in which broad distinction in the symbols of the combatants was more necessary than it has been in the present war. Our enemies are of the same race with ourselves—of the same color and even shade of complexion—they speak the same language, wear like clothing, and are of like form and stature. (The more shame that they should make war upon us.) Our general appearance being the same we must rely solely upon symbols for distinction. The danger of mistake is great after all possible precautions have been taken. Sufficient attention has never been paid to this important matter, involving life or death—victory or defeat. Our badges, uniforms, flags, should be perfectly distinguishable from those of the enemy. Our first and distant information is dependent solely on the flag.

To argue this objection further would be a waste of words. And yet this one objection is vital and insuperable. We shall, nevertheless, add some other considerations in another article on the same subject.

AFFAIR NEAR WILLIAMSPORT, MD.

CAPTAIN ROBINSON'S OFFICIAL REPORT.

HEAD-QUARTERS CO. D, FIRST REG. VA. BRIGADE,
U. S. VOLUNTEERS, FOUR LOCKS,
NEAR WILLIAMSPORT, Md., Dec. 9, 1861. }

Col. S. H. Leonard, Commanding Williamsport and Vicinity, Md.:

SIR: I have the honor to report that, on Friday afternoon, the 8th inst., my pickets at Dam No. 5 and Back Creek were fired on by the enemy, by cavalry at the former place, and infantry at the latter. The sergeants in charge of each of those pickets immediately communicated with me here, and I despatched reinforcements to both places; but after some shots had been exchanged all remained quiet during the remainder of that day and night. The sergeant at dam No. 5 reported three wounded on the side of the enemy, but none of our men were hurt at either place.

On Saturday afternoon, about half-past three o'clock p. m., I was apprised of the advance of the enemy in strong force in the direction of Dam No. 5. I immediately took my second lieutenant and twenty men of my command toward the Dam, and sent my first lieutenant with ten men to Fankell's Ferry, that point being opposite and in close approximation to the road leading from Little Georgetown to the Dam. The enemy perceived this party, and at once opened fire on them; he returned the fire, and he believes with effect. Before I could arrive with my party at the Dam, rifle-shots had already been fired there, and within a short distance of the Dam myself and party were fired on with shot and shell from rifled cannon. The enemy ceased their fire at the Dam, and kept up an incessant fire at us until dark, bringing all their guns to bear on us, the number being six; their firing was very regular and accurate, and although none of my party were hurt, there were many narrow escapes. Under cover of the darkness I succeeded in reinforcing the picket, and on my return to head-quarters also despatched what available men I had left, as a reinforcement, to my first lieutenant at Fankell's Ferry, at which place an incessant firing on the enemy's side, from rifles, was kept up all night, and answered by us with musketry, which appeared to be unheeded by them, although my lieutenant reports seeing several fall, until I obtained from the reinforcement sent to the Dam by you a squad of six men armed with the Enfield rifle, the sound of which they seemed to fear. At the Dam, musketry firing recommenced about nine o'clock p. m., on the part of the enemy, the object of which seemed to be to cover a party endeavoring to destroy the wooden cribs of that work, as we could plainly hear the noise made in endeavoring to effect this. We opened fire on them, and the firing was kept up on both sides until about two o'clock in the morning, shortly after which the reinforcement sent me by you arrived. Nothing further was done until daylight, when the enemy commenced throwing shot and shell across the Dam, and also at Fankell's Ferry—their object at the latter place, in particular, appearing to be the destruction of property. At Dam No. 5 they succeeded in setting fire to and destroying a barn. Firing at each of the above places was kept up all day, with little intermission on both sides. I am happy to be able to state that none of my company were wounded, although one man of the Massachusetts regiment was severely so. I have great pleasure in speaking well of the prompt action and willingness on the part of some of the Union men in this vicinity in rendering me all the assistance they could, not only in showing me the best points for cover for some of my small party, but also in handling the musket with them. I have learnt, from reliable information, that the enemy's known loss in killed and wounded amounted to twelve—seven at the Dam, and five at Fankell's Ferry; but I believe it to have been heavier. Two of their cannon burst, and one was rendered unserviceable by the breaking of the axle of the gun-carriage. Also, that their total force was about fifteen hundred strong. From what shot and shell we have picked up, their guns appear to be of the latest improved pattern. The enemy appear to have left this district, with the exception of some few pickets, as nothing is observable of them in force from Fankell's Ferry or the Dam, at which place they left behind them a considerable quantity of intrenching tools. I have the honor, &c., GILBERT ROBINSON,

Captain Commanding Post.

An "eye-witness" gives the following account of the attack:

WILLIAMSPORT, Md., Sunday, December 8, 1861.

I have just returned from Dam No. 5, about seven miles above this on the Potomac, where a sharp skirmish has been going on all day. When the firing was first commenced, about four o'clock last evening, by the rebels on the other side of the river, Capt. Robinson's Company, of Col. Lehman's regiment, the Virginia First, who were on picket duty at that point, were the only men we had present; but they were reinforced this morning about two o'clock by Company C, Capt. Wm. H. Jackson, of the Thirteenth Massachusetts, Col. Leonard, who left this place last night about ten o'clock.

The rebels opened the battle by throwing shell and canister in rapid succession. They had four or five ten-pound rifled cannon, and one large Parrott gun; but when they had ceased firing at dark last evening, had succeeded in doing nothing but destroy Mr. Stanhope's house, which stood close by the river on this side. They also threw several cannon balls into several other small buildings which stood in the neighborhood of Stanhope's house. Our men had no artillery, and returned the fire occasionally with small arms. Some of our men were in and about the buildings toward which the enemy's shot was directed, but most of Capt. Jackson's company were stationed along a fence running parallel with the river, on the brow of the hill on this side of the river. There was also a large hill on the opposite side, and it was on the top and the slope of this hill that the rebel cannons were planted.

The firing ceased at dark last evening, but was renewed with shell and canister at daylight this morning. It was at once as brisk and unceasing as it had been yesterday, but was immediately returned vigorously by Capt. Jackson's company, who had by this time arrived and taken their position on the top of the hill. As soon, however, as the rebels had discovered their position this morning, they elevated the range of their artillery, and the second shell they threw struck a large barn on the brow of the hill, a little to the right of Robinson's men, belonging to John Sterling, which immediately took fire and was burned to the ground. Some of the Massachusetts boys, who had been enjoying a nap on the hay-mow during the after part of the night, had just left the barn when the shell struck it. Mr. Sterling had barely time to get his horses and cattle from it, and lost his entire crop of grain.

The cannonading ceased about nine o'clock this morning, but was renewed again about four this evening, and kept up till dark, since which time there has been no firing on either side. The enemy's shells, this evening, were directed toward Sterling's house, which stood a little in the rear of the barn, but they did not succeed in hitting it.

None of our men were killed or wounded, save James Kenney, of Company C, of the Massachusetts Thirteenth, who received two pretty severe flesh wounds in the thigh and in the calf of the leg. He was wounded while coming up the hill from the river, where he had taken his position during the night, with some others, behind Stanhope's house. He was first struck in the thigh, and in an effort to get away was again struck in the leg. He was lying in Sterling's house this evening, while the shells of the enemy were flying thick and fast about it; but he will soon be on his way to Boston, from whence he hails. It is not known how many the rebels lost, but several were seen to fall, and taken into a couple of houses which stand on the Virginia side. Kenney was wounded by a Minié ball, which seemed to be the only kind of small shot the rebels used. The firing of small arms was very brisk on both sides during the whole day.

We expect some artillery here daily, but the rebels have removed from the Dam, and will not likely appear soon again. They showed themselves about a thousand strong.

A FIGHT ON THE LOWER POTOMAC.

LIEUT. WYMAN'S REPORT.

UNITED STATES STEAMER HARRIET LANE, }
OFF MATTAWOMAN CREEK, December 9, 1861. }

Hon. Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy:

SIR: I have the honor to report to you that this morning, about half-past nine o'clock, seeing the enemy's pickets, three camp wagons, and a mounted officer coming down the road to the southward of Freestone Point, and halting at some buildings near the beach, I directed the steamers Jacob Bell and Anacostia to shell the buildings. I stood in with this vessel as far as the draft of water would admit to protect them in the event of the enemy's bringing a field battery to Freestone Point.

After shelling the buildings and hill, and driving back the pickets, Lieutenant-Commanding McCrae landed with a few men, and fired four houses, which have since burnt to the ground. They contained sutler's stores, flour, &c. As eighteen hours elapsed before the fire subsided, I judge that the quantity of stores must have been considerable. The enemy fired but a few musket shot.

I am, very respectfully, &amp;c.,

R. H. WYMAN, U. S. N.,
Lieutenant-Commanding Potomac Flotilla.

The correspondent with General Hooker's Division, near Budd's Ferry, says of this affair:

December 9, 1861.

The lower Potomac was enlivened this morning by the gunboats of the upper flotilla shelling the woods and burning the buildings at Freestone Point, while about the same time there was a fine review of New Jersey troops on the Maryland side. At nine o'clock in the morning the New Jersey Brigade, recently arrived in General Hooker's Division, was reviewed and inspected by him. The day was one of the finest ever known in Maryland at this season. It was like a delightful day of the early Indian summer. The brigade, consisting of the Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth regiments, is under command of Colonel Starr, of the Fifth, an officer of extensive experience in the regular army. The appearance of the men was highly commendable, eliciting complimentary encomiums from the Commanding General, who never praises those who are undeserving. After the review he proceeded to carefully inspect the different regiments.

The morning being calm and clear, I made an ascension in the balloon to draw a sketch of the rebel camps on the Virginia side of the river. Six steamboats belonging to the upper flotilla were seen near the mouth of Mattawoman Creek. Presently, at half-past ten o'clock, the Jacob Bell, Lieutenant McCrae commanding, got under way and went within about a thousand yards of Freestone Point. She fired five ten-second shells into the woods, and then put about. Several wagons were seen approaching the buildings near the shore, where the rebels had some store. Lieutenant McCrae, of the Jacob Bell, communicated with Captain Anstin, commanding the Anacostia, and both vessels stood off Freestone Point, where they commenced shelling the woods and buildings.

The Harriet Lane, flag-ship of the flotilla, Captain R. H. Wyman commanding, was stationed a mile or more behind. She fired two ninety-six-pound shots. On a line with her, a little lower down the river, were the Reliance and Herbert, with the Stepping Stones immediately behind, all in the mouth of Mattawoman Creek. This was the position of the steamers, with a sloop lying near, when the cannonade commenced. For an hour and a half the two steamers poured shell into the woods. From the balloon I could see the shells burst over the tops of the trees and near the surrounding buildings. Some struck the residence of Mr. Fairfax, situated in a grove upon the hill. Fairfax is said to be a Colonel in the rebel army. The wagons moved away as quick as possible, and several mounted officers scampered off as well.

The booming of the cannon aroused the camps, and hundreds of our men covered the hills on the Maryland side, from which the whole action could be seen.

While the vessels were firing into the woods, our guns at Budd's Ferry sent a few shells across. The rebel batteries directly opposite, at Shipping Point, returned the fire. Several of their shells exploded on this side without doing any damage, and one of ours burst right in their upper battery. The rebels ran in every direction.

In the mean time I had descended in the balloon and embarked in a boat which Lieutenant-Colonel Wells, commanding the First Massachusetts regiment, had kindly placed at my disposal, with a crew under Lieutenant Carruth, and was on my way up to the flotilla.

The Anacostia fired twenty shrapnel, one five-second and two ten-second shell. The Jacob Bell fired seventeen six-inch and fifteen eight-inch shell. Fifty-seven were fired altogether. The Jacob Bell then went close to the shore, and Lieutenant McCrae, with four men in a small boat, accompanied by another boat from the Anacostia, landed and set fire to the buildings near the water's edge, which they said contained stores belonging to the rebels. One containing empty barrels was not burned. The other buildings were soon enveloped in a sheet of flame. They were formerly used as a fish house, and rented for three thousand five hundred dollars per annum. The boats presently returned to their respective steamers, which then fell back and anchored near the Harriet Lane.

The reflection of the setting sun on the Potomac, which was placid as a lake on a summer evening, together with that of the burning buildings, rendered the scene exceedingly beautiful.

In the evening a light breeze came up, and to-night a number of small vessels, mostly oyster boats, are passing up the river.

It is now a quarter to nine o'clock, and the rebel batteries at Shipping Point have just opened on two of the larger ones—the Oriental and the Shining Light, Captain Walker—which the rebels can easily distinguish by reason of the clearness of the night and the brightness of the moon. Both batteries are keeping up a rapid fire upon them. The flashes of two, three, and four guns are seen simultaneously. Shells, with the burning fuse, are making graceful curves through the air like shooting stars, and then comes the loud reports of their bursting.

We have a fine view of this magnificent night cannonade from the rear verandah of Mr. Posey's residence. Some of the shells have struck the water, several are bursting in the air, and some have come over here to the Maryland shore. One shot which ricocheted along the water touched the side of the Shining Light about the water mark, but being spent did not do any damage. About forty shots were fired by the rebels, but none of the vessels sustained any injury. The firing soon ceased, and every thing was quiet during the remainder of the night.

MR. CARDWELL'S RESOLUTIONS,

OFFERED IN THE TENNESSEE LEGISLATURE,
DECEMBER 10, 1861.

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, As its unanimous sense, that any and all propositions of the Congress of the (so-called) United States of America to reconstruct a Union which they have prostituted to the base purposes of annihilating the liberties, trampling upon the rights, destroying the lives, and plundering the people of the Confederate States, thus driving them to the assertion of their independence and the formation of a new Confederacy, for the maintenance of their inalienable rights and the preservation of their sovereignty, is but another form under which our enemies would subjugate the South and reduce us to the despotism of their degraded doctrines, and that we cannot view any such proposition of reconstruction in any other light than as a crowning insult to our intelligence and manhood, to thus approach us after the acts of rapine, murder, and barbarity which have marked their inhuman invasion of our territory; and that any such proposition should be met promptly and unhesitatingly with our indignant rejection.

Resolved, That the secret sympathizers of Lincolnism in the South, if any there be, who may favor any such insulting approach of our enemy, deserve to be branded as traitors to the South and enemies of their country.

Resolved, That any commissioners appointed by the Lincoln Congress at Washington to the government of the Confederate States, having for the object of its mission a reconstruction of the old Union, should be at once promptly rejected by the government of the Confederate States.

Resolved. That the Confederate States and their people ardently desire a peaceful solution of existing difficulties with the Northern States, and that an honorable peace, guaranteeing our independence, would be hailed by our people with joy and satisfaction, but that, having taken up arms to achieve our independence of a government which has cruelly persecuted and oppressed us, and which has shown a determination to overturn every guarantee of our constitutional rights, by a long train of abuses and usurpations, the people of Tennessee cannot with honor and safety to themselves, and with security to their posterity, consent to any treaty which shall not recognize our entire independence of any political connection with the government of the so-called United States.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to forward a copy of these resolutions to each of our Representatives to Congress, and also a copy to each of the Governors of the Confederate States, with a request that they be laid before their respective State Legislatures.

ASHEPOO RIVER EXPEDITION.

COMMANDER DRAYTON'S REPORT.

UNITED STATES STEAMER PAWNEE,
PORT ROYAL HARBOR, Dec. 9, 1861. }

SIR: In obedience to your order of the 4th instant, I proceeded to sea at daylight of the 5th, accompanied by the gunboat Unadilla, Lieutenant-Commanding N. Collins; steamer Isaac Smith, Lieutenant-Commanding Nicholson, and coast survey steamer Vixen, Captain Boutelle, and reached anchorage off the fort on Otter Island, St. Helena Sound, at mid-day. In the course of the afternoon, some negroes coming on board, and reporting that there was a body of soldiers at the entrance of Mosquito Creek, a place up Ashepoo, where the inland route to Charleston commences, I proceeded as far as that place, when night coming on, obliged me to return. I saw, however, no signs of the presence of white people, excepting that some buildings, which I discovered next day to have been on Hutchinson's Island, were burning.

On the morning of the 6th, the United States steamship Dale, Lieutenant-Commanding, W. T. Truxton, appearing off the harbor, I sent the Isaac Smith to tow her in. Unfortunately, however, when half way up, the Dale stuck fast, and no exertions could get her afloat until one o'clock that night, when she was forced into deep water, having suffered no apparent injury, and towed the following morning by Capt. Boutelle in the Vixen, around Morgan Island. So soon as she was safely at her anchorage near us, I proceeded up Ashepoo with the Unadilla, Isaac Smith, and Vixen, to examine the river further up than I had been able to do on the previous occasion.

On approaching Mosquito Creek, we saw a picket of soldiers, who took to their horses on our approach, and escaped into the woods, hastened perhaps in their flight by a shot or two which were thrown after them. Continuing up the river, I landed on Hutchinson's Island, and found that two days before, all the negro houses, the overseer's house, and outbuildings, together with picked cotton had been burned. The attempt had, at the same time, been made to drive off the negroes, but many had escaped, although some of their number, they said, had been shot in attempting to do so. The scene was one of complete desolation.

The smoking ruins and cowering figures which surrounded them, of those negroes who still instinctively clung to their hearthstones, although there was no longer there shelter for them, presented a most melancholy sight, the impression of which was made even stronger by the piteous wailing of the poor creatures, a large portion of whom consisted of the old and decrepit. They were not able to leave until some time after dark, and, singular enough, the moment we were fairly under way, a bright signal light was burned on the very plantation we had just quitted, showing that some of the blacks, for there was certainly no white man there, were communicating our departure.

On the following morning, with the same vessels, I started to explore Coosaw River, but very soon after leaving, the Unadilla was completely disabled by the breaking of the main cross-head, and I was obliged to leave her at anchor and continue on with the other two vessels. When off Fort Heyward, I left the Isaac Smith, it not being quite safe to take so long a vessel higher up, and continued in the Vixen, so far as the entrance of Beaufort Creek, to a place called the Brick Yards, where I had been told there was either a fort or a guard of soldiers. Nothing, however, being seen of either, I anchored off a plantation belonging to Mr. Bychewood, close by, for the purpose of getting information, as I saw a great many negroes there.

On landing, I found that a short time previously, the cotton-house, with its contents, had been burned, and all the negroes that could be caught, had been taken away. Here were large numbers of those, however, who had left Hutchinson's Island after their houses had been burned, and who, with their household effects piled up about them, lined the beach. Some of them, begging to be permitted to go to Otter's Island, saying that they had neither shelter nor food, were taken back with us.

Late in the afternoon I returned down the river, reaching our anchorage off Fort Otter at sunset. As I did not see that the services of the Pawnee were any longer necessary in St. Helena Sound, and thinking it important to get the Unadilla as soon as possible to a place where her engines could be repaired, I determined this morning to tow that vessel to Port Royal harbor, which I have done, reaching here in company with the Vixen at half-past seven this evening.

In obedience to your instructions, before leaving, I transferred the charge of the fort and adjacent waters, to Lieutenant-Commanding Nicholson, who, with the Isaac Smith and Dale, will remain there until he receives further orders from yourself.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

P. DRAYTON,

Flag-officer S. F. DUPONT,
Commanding South Atlantic Squadron,
Port Royal Harbor.

As about one hundred and forty negroes, most of them in a very destitute condition, had collected at Otter Island before my departure, I directed Lieutenant Nicholson to see that they were supplied with food, until some disposition would be made of them, or until he heard from you. Very respectfully, P. DRAYTON.

CAPTURE OF REBELS IN CALIFORNIA

MAJOR RIGGS OFFICIAL REPORT
CAMP WRIGHT, OAK GROVE, SAN JUAN COUNTY,
LOWER CALIFORNIA, NOV. 29, 1861.

COLONEL: I take advantage of the hour of Senor Sepulva Ramon, Carillo's brother-in-law, to inform you of the arrest of the latter party, Showalter with them. Incessant sixteen men, each armed with rifles and a pair of revolvers. They gave us a hard fight, but we finally captured them. They finally concluded not to resist, although upon the advice of Showalter.

The names of the party are T. A. King, Tennessee; W. Woods, Missouri; Charles Broth, Kentucky; Wm. Sands, Tennessee; L. Roberts, South Carolina; R. H. Wood, Mississippi; T. W. Woods, Virginia; J. W. Mason, Kentucky; S. A. Rogers, Tennessee; Lawrence, Arkansas; Levi Rogers, Alabama; Henry Crowell, Pennsylvania; Wm. King, Georgia; Dan. Showalter, Pennsylvania; King, Tennessee.

Retook two of the party on the 21st at the post, viz.: E. B. Sumners and F. V. O. They were the advancing party, eight in all. I am now examining them, and will send you by express, that will leave here to-night, a full time, full particulars. They now regret that they did not resist; if they had they would have given us a hard fight. There is no doubt that every one of them is a secessionist, and on their way to lend aid and comfort to an enemy. I would like to know as soon as possible what to do with them. They have no mules, and are well fitted out, and a desperate set of men.

I am under great obligations to Francis Ocampo for my success. It is reported that some eighty men are getting ready, and on the road. I will keep a good watch for them.

Very respectfully,
EDWIN A. RIGGS,
Major First Infantry, commanding Camp Wright.

To Col. JAS. H. CARLETON,
First Infantry C.V., Los Angeles, Cal.

P. S.—They were captured at daylight on the morning of the 29th, at John Winter's ranch, near San José Valley. EDWIN A. RIGGS.

GEN. HUNTER AND SI GORDON.

GEN. HUNTER'S PROCLAMATION.

HEAD-QUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF KANSAS,
FORT LEAVENWORTH, Dec. 1, 1861.

To the Trustees of Platte City, Platte Co., Mo.
GENTLEMEN: Having received reliable information of depredations and outrages of every

d committed by a man named Si Gordon, a leader of rebel marauding bands, I give you notice that unless you seize and deliver the said Gordon to me at these head-quarters, within ten days from this date, or drive him out of the county, I shall send a force to your city with orders to reduce it to ashes, and to burn the use of every secessionist in your county, and to carry away every slave.

Col. Jennison's regiment will be entrusted with the execution of this order.

The following persons are particularly directed to this notice:—David Hunt, Clinton Cockrell, James Merryman, Robert Cain, John Murray, H. T. Freeland, William Paxton, W. C. Remington, Andrew Tribble, R. P. S. Ely, Jackson Miller, Robert Clark, W. Tutman, H. F. Cochrane, Samuel M. Hayes, Joseph Todd, and Jonas Burkhardt.

D. HUNTER,
Major-General Commanding.

The part of Missouri in which Platte County is situated borders on Leavenworth County, Kansas, the Missouri River only being the dividing line; and as long as the rebels are allowed to roam about in the former county, committing depredations without let or hindrance, so long will this part of Kansas be hourly in danger of a raid from such lawless vagabonds. The rebels there are not an army fighting for independence, but more like a body of reckless banditti, who would scarcely have any more respect for those who sympathize with the doctrine they pretend to uphold, than they would for those who are opposed to them, providing that by an attack they could obtain plunder of any value. Such being the case, General Hunter issued his proclamation.

EXPEDITION TO OSSABAW, GA.

COMMANDER RODGERS' REPORT.

UNITED STATES FLAGSHIP WABASH, }
PORT ROYAL HARBOR, Dec. 12, 1861. }

SIR: I left Tybee Roads before daylight yesterday morning, with the Ottawa, Seneca, Pembina, and Henry Andrew, and crossed the bar of Ossabaw soon after eight o'clock. Entering and passing up Vernon River, we discovered, on the eastern end, on Green Island, a fort mounting eight guns, apparently of heavy calibre. Near it we saw about seventy-five tents. There was a barrack near the fort, and another building was in process of erection. I think the work is not yet completed.

The fort is advantageously placed, and its approaches landward are well protected by marshes. It has three faces, upon two of which guns are mounted. It commands not only Vernon River, but Little Ogeechee and Hellgate passage from Vernon River into Great Ogeechee. Long-range guns will also reach the channel of the Great Ogeechee. We were exactly two nautical miles from the fort, and after observing carefully, we steamed down the river. When the Seneca, the second vessel of the line, had turned, a well-directed shot was fired at her, apparently from a rifled cannon, which fell not more than two hundred yards astern.

A shot was also fired at the Pembina, apparently from a heavy smooth-bore gun, which fell much short. We did not fire from the vessels, being at too long range for effective practice. Nor was I willing our simple reconnaissance should be reported for the comfort of the enemy as an engagement and repulse. Passing again in to Ossabaw Sound, we entered the Great Ogeechee, and steamed up it about four miles to Morrell's plantation and Ossibaw Island, where I landed, but found it abandoned. There are no batteries on Ossabaw Island for the defence of the Sound. I saw Vernonsburg, but could observe no battery, save the one off Green Island. We saw over land two or three schooners at the head of Warsaw Sound, which had probably passed from Ossabaw through Romilly Marshes.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
C. P. R. RODGERS,
Commander.

To Flag-officer S. F. DUPONT,
Commanding South Atlantic Blockading Squadron.

A WRITER on board one of the vessels composing the expedition relates the following:

UNITED STATES GUNBOAT OTTAWA, }
PORT ROYAL, S. C., Dec. 11, 1861. }

A third of the series of important reconnoissances projected by Flag-officer Dupont, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of penetrating, by our light draught gunboats, the internal waters of the rebel coast, and then, by cutting off the illicit commerce of the same, was made to-day, proving a complete success. Of course, in addition to the foregoing object, these reconnoissances have another equally important object—to obtain a correct knowledge of the position, nature, and extent of the rebel works erected to defend these internal waters from visits of our dashing gunboats; and in pursuing this object we are frequently treated to a discharge of shot and shell, which have as yet done us no injury.

The reconnoissance in the direction of Vernonsburg—a village on the Vernon River, of Georgia—which we made to-day, was made in force. Our force consisted of the gunboat Ottawa, Captain Stevens, the flagship of Captain C. R. P. Rodgers, of the Wabash; the Seneca, Captain Ammen, the Pembina, Captain John Bankhead, and the Mary Andrews, in command of Acting Master Mathews, late of the Quaker City. We left Port Royal yesterday (Tuesday) at noon, and the Ottawa leading, followed by the Pembina and Mary Andrews in the line, steamed south, and at sundown anchored in Cockspur harbor, off Tybee Island, Savannah River. The Seneca came in half an hour later. As we passed over the bar the water was dotted by hundreds and thousands of wild ducks of every variety, which lazily flapped their wings and sailed slowly away, without exhibiting the least alarm at our presence. The waters hereabout are black with water fowl, and I am told that they have but just begun to arrive. Throughout the winter millions upon millions throng the bays, rivers, and lagoons of the Southern coast, and afford to the sportsman one of the finest fields for his art imaginable.

When our vessels had come to anchor, Commander Rodgers visited the Savannah frigate, which lies at anchor inside the bar; and during the evening the commanders of the gunboats visited the Ottawa to obtain their instructions for the morrow. They were the same as on previous occasions. As we shall need in a few days the services of every light draught vessel in the fleet for an important expedition, of a military as well as naval character, the gunboats were not to risk an engagement and not to fire a shot unless actually necessary. The accommodations on the Ottawa being rather cramped, on account of the large number of guests, your special accepted Captain Bankhead's courteous invitation, and went on board with him to his vessel—the Pembina—calling on Commander John Rodgers, of the Flag, on our way, who set before us some good cheer. As it is desirable not to afford the rebels a too conspicuous mark for their artillery, all the lights were out in the harbor; but the moonlight was so strong that each hull was brought out quite distinctly. Commodore Tatnall, having already enjoyed a taste of our metal, keeps safely out of our way and troubles not our fleet.

At four o'clock this morning three white lights were displayed from the Ottawa, as a signal for getting under weigh, and in a few moments she had her anchor up and steamed out of the harbor. The Seneca followed, her and we (the Pembina) took our position astern of her, the Mary Andrews bringing up the rear, in line. Daylight found us at sea, standing south, and at about eight o'clock we stood in toward the low, marshy shores that lie on either side of the entrance to Ossabaw Sound, about eighteen miles south of Tybee. Our engine was slowed down, and, following the Ottawa and Seneca, the Pembina ran cautiously in over the bar, the lead going constantly to guide us, as there were no buoys or spars to mark our course. We carried nearly five fathoms across the bar, which we passed at nine o'clock, and nearly as much clear up to the mouth of the Vernon River. When we entered the river, taking the north channel, every one was engaged in scrutinizing the low wooded shores and the marshes to find batteries. Nothing of the kind was seen until we reached a point about ten miles from the bar, when we discovered tents upon the point of Green Island, and on approaching nearer made out a strong field work, over which flew the dirty rebel stars and bars. The river here winds about through marshes and low lands, and the channel is very intricate, sandbars putting out on either side at frequent intervals, making navigation somewhat difficult. We proceeded cautiously in a line on, guided by the lead, and stood toward a battery on the island, at a bend of the river, and commanding the approaches by either north or south channel. Our main quarters; the huge eleven-inch gun as a looked fiercely toward the rebel camp, and the rifled piece on the fore-castle, in the same way, was ready for the fray. So we steamed on until reaching a point on the river less than two miles from the bar. After we had counted the guns in position, we ascertained the character of the work, and satisfied ourselves of our ability to deal with it, the Ottawa turned and steamed down the river again. The Seneca, close behind her, began to turn, and while presenting her bow to the battery a flash was seen, a cloud of white smoke arose over the ramparts, and in an instant a rifled shot, probably a six-pounder, struck the water about fifty yards from the Seneca's side. The sound of the shot sent the water was heard in the twinkling of an eye, followed by the hum of the projectile, and the explosion of the gun. The Seneca made no reply to this shot, but turned down the river. The Pembina had nearly turned toward the battery fired a shot at her; but it was far short of us. We did not burn a grain of powder, but passed along in a dignified manner. The Mary Andrews, in obedience to orders, stopped at the first discharge, and when passed by her she turned and followed her down the river. The battery on Green Island was an open work, mounting eight or ten guns, one or two of which are rifled, and of a heavy calibre. To the right of the battery was an encampment of seventy-five men in a small building on the extreme right, which was as a hospital. The troops manning the battery were undoubtedly members of the Georgia Coast Guard, and were doubtless very glad to see us turn without firing a shell, of which they had a well-founded fear. While we were approaching within range the greatest commotion among them was visible. They ran to and fro in the most hurried manner, and otherwise exhibited a most extraordinary state of alarm. We saw the gleam of bayonets above the ramparts, and the men at their guns. As we only desired to learn their strength and the calibre of their guns, we drew their fire and retired, having accomplished our object. We shall hear of a victory from rebel sources; but what it was based upon you now know.

After we had reached the confluence of the Vernon and Ogeechee rivers, we ran up the latter to a point abreast of Racoon Key, opposite Bryan Morell's plantation, where boats were sent ashore from the gunboats after they had come to anchor. The boats penetrated the bay and through a creek, and landed at Morell's plantation. They found it perfectly deserted—not a living animal, man or beast, was seen.

on the plantation. All the negro cabins were empty and empty. On their flight they had moved household furniture, poultry, and pigs, every thing movable. It was desolation itself. The party soon returned, and, as the schooner was to run into Tybee to get detachments, I again went on board the Ottawa, and the flotilla steamed rapidly toward Port Royal. A short time after dark, while we were between Tybee and Port Royal, a strange steamer was seen ahead. The men were sent to quarters, the guns cast loose, and the ship prepared for action. We ran down toward her, and an officer was despatched in the gig to ascertain her character. While on the way he was met by a boat from the steamer, coming toward us. An officer stepped aboard and stated it was the Rhode Island, bound from Port Royal to Tybee. Having lost her way, he wished directions. They were given, and we both went on our respective ways. We arrived at our anchorage at nine o'clock, after a most delightful trip of two days. The weather throughout was lovely—perfect June weather—perhaps a little too warm in the noonday sun for comfort, but altogether very desirable weather. The sea was smooth and the sail delightful. Of all things all are now fully convinced, and that the new gunboats are the most efficient and serviceable vessels that we have in the navy. Their light draught enables them to penetrate into the waters that lead into the creeks along the coast, and go anywhere they can be of the least service. Unfortunately they were not put together so well as they ought to have been, and their engines fall far short of the contract standard. In short, they are not what they ought to be, and what they were contracted to be. But with all their faults, I wish we had fifteen or twenty more in the waters this very day. We could then accomplish much.

SKIRMISH AT DAM No. 4,

POTOMAC RIVER, DECEMBER 11, 1861.

SHARPSBURG, December 13, 1861.

On the morning of the 11th instant heavy cannonading was heard in the vicinity of Dam No. 4, and about one o'clock P. M. a messenger was sent in haste for reinforcements, stating that the enemy had attacked the pickets and were endeavoring to demolish the Dam, by cannonading. When the enemy were first seen they were ordered to be out on a scouting expedition, Major Hubler immediately sent twenty men to a lock about one mile above the Dam, and so soon as the enemy arrived at that place they commenced firing on our pickets. We returned the fire, instantly killing four and wounding ten, three mortally. The enemy fled back to a house about one mile from the river, when the men remaining at the Dam commenced firing on the house, killing three and wounding several.

At this time the enemy retreated back to the woods, and after waiting some time, Capt. Williams, of Company E, obtained permission to cross over and reconnoitre; and upon going near to the house they had been firing at he observed a company of infantry, who commenced firing upon him and his men, consisting of Corporals H. W. Wescott, R. S. Richards, privates; James McGuire, Lemuel Hazzard, Oliver Hubler, T. Robbins, of Company E, and private Isaac Hall, of Company K. They returned the fire and retreated while loading. In the mean time, while their attention was directed to the infantry, some eighty cavalry rushed in between them and the river, thereby cutting them off from the assistance of their friends. As soon as they discovered their position they returned their fire upon the cavalry, unhorsing several. In a few minutes they were completely overpowered and borne off prisoners in the sight of their friends, as the distance was too great to reach with the guns and there being no artillery, all hope of relieving them for the present disappeared, as it was understood the enemy was two thousand one hundred strong; one thousand five hundred came from toward Shepherdstown and six hundred from Martinsburg, bringing with them fourteen boats to use in crossing the river.

It was the intention for one part to attract the attention of our troops, and in the mean time the other company were to cross at the lock and come in on the rear, and either capture or drive away our men, and then rush to the Dam and break it, thereby rendering the canal entirely useless. In this they were foiled, and kept at a distance until reinforcements were sent for. One messenger was despatched to Williamsport for artillery, and another sent to this place. But a short time elapsed, when Company B, commanded by Captain Noel, and Company G, commanded by Lieutenant Baldwin, were on their way to meet the enemy, and as the report of the guns were heard in the distance, it gave renewed vigor to those who had already marched to Shepherdstown and returned without a shot at Secesh; and having partaken of a light dinner, were off in another direction, prepared for a heavy conflict with those marauders who attack the unprotected portion of our picket lines. We arrived at Dam 4 just after dark, and it then being too late to see the enemy, and as they had threatened to break the Dam at daylight, our men were set to building breastworks and digging rifle pits, which were finished and occupied in time to give them a warm reception; but, as they have done in every skirmish along our lines, they finished their work, and left before the reinforcements arrived.

We remained in our position until about nine o'clock A. M., and no one being observed on the other side it was supposed that quite a number had taken refuge in an old church, when the cannon was placed in position and threw a ball into the building, but no one was there. About eleven o'clock Lieut. Gallagher crossed the river, under cover of our guns, to see if he could learn any thing relative to Capt. Williams and his party, and learned that they were safe, though prisoners, and on their way to Martinsburg. Captain Williams was much beloved by the entire regiment, and his vacancy will be hard to fill, and all that were with him were picked men. That they fought hard for their freedom was plainly seen and sensibly felt, as they killed five and wounded quite a number during their capture.

There is much credit due Companies E and K for the coolness and decision shown during the time, and every shot fired was expected to tell, and for that reason the enemy fell back, as the officers thought best to leave the Dam rather than lose their men. While they were in consultation one man was struck in the right eye and instantly killed, at a distance of seven hundred yards. During the evening a few cavalry made their appearance at the Lock, when Orderly Brown, of Company K, fired and killed one instantly, and the rest took a hasty departure and have not been seen since.

BATTLE OF CAMP ALLEGHANY, VA.,

FOUGHT DECEMBER 13, 1861.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Cincinnati Commercial gives the following particulars of the battle.

CHEAT MOUNTAIN SUMMIT,
December 20, 1861.

On Thursday morning, December 12th, the Union troops under command of Brig.-Gen. R. H. Milroy, took up their march for the enemy's camp, which is situated on the top of the Alleghany Mountains, eight and a half miles beyond the Greenbrier River, or what is better known, Camp Bartow. This Camp Bartow is the Camp at which Gen. Reynolds reconnoitered so effectually October 3d last, and from which the rebels have since fled. This Camp Bartow, is at a point on the Staunton Pike, called "The Traveller's Repose." The Union command, consisting of detachments from the Ninth and Thirteenth Indiana, Twenty-fifth and Thirty-second Ohio, Second Virginia regiment, and Bracken's Cavalry, numbered in all about two thousand men. The column reached Camp Bartow about eight o'clock P. M., where the same halted and rested.

At this point the column was divided into two divisions—one consisting of the detachments from the Ninth Indiana and Second Virginia regiments, numbering about one thousand strong; the other consisting of the detachments from the Thirteenth Indiana, Twenty-fifth and Thirty-second Ohio regiments, and Bracken Cavalry. At 11 P. M. the Ninth Indiana and Second Virginia took up their march on what is known as the old "Greenbrier Fall" attack the enemy on his left—the Ninth Indiana under Col. Moody and Major John L. Bracken, Second Virginia under Major Owen, at 10 o'clock A. M., December 13th, the Thirteenth Indiana, Twenty-fifth and Thirty-second Ohio, and Bracken Cavalry under Major Jones, J. A. Jones, Captain Hamilton and Lieut. Bracken, accompanied by Brigadier-General H. Milroy, his staff, consisting of Colonel Drum, A. Q. M., Lieut. J. O. Craven, Camp, and Lieut. Aide-de-Camp J. McDonald, of Gen. Reynolds' staff. They took the Staunton pike and moved on cautiously, meeting with no opposition within sight of the rebel camp, where an advance guard, a young man by the name of Latham, of the Twenty-fifth Ohio, was killed by a rebel picket. After sending out additional skirmishers, the column moved and marched to a point within a mile of the enemy's camp, where a halt was made. Here the column waited only a short time, they were ordered to march, when they left the road and commenced ascending the mountain to the enemy's right. After in and capturing some of the rebel pickets the column reached the top of the mountain on the enemy's right in good order.

The fight commenced about twenty minutes after daylight. The following, from the report of the fight by Col. Jas. A. Jones, of the Twenty-fifth Ohio regiment, I am permitted to extract. Col. Jones is a cool and brave officer and saw the whole action on the enemy's side. He says: "After leaving the pike we ascended up the mountain, which was very steep and rocky, for about one mile, to the summit on the right and rear of the enemy's camp, at the attack of the Ninth Indiana and Second Virginia, as you directed. But as we approached the top of the hill we discovered the rebel pickets, who immediately retreated on our approach. I gave the order to pursue them double-quick, as the enemy would be apprised of our advance. One company of the Thirteenth Indiana, being in advance, was commanded by Lieut. McDonald, of Gen. Reynolds' staff. As we arrived at the edge of the woods we had a view of the enemy's camp. Finding the enemy already formed, and advancing with a force to attack us, Lieut. McDonald halted his company of the Thirteenth Indiana and ordered it to deploy into line, immediately forming the Twenty-fifth Ohio on his left, and the other two companies of the Thirteenth Indiana on his left, and a detachment of the Thirty-second Ohio formed on their left. The fire was opened on the right, and was carried down the lines. After a few rounds the enemy was treated in great confusion, with great slaughter, leaving their dead and wounded. They again rallied, and commenced to advance, turning our fire with great vigor. Some of our men commenced falling to the rear all along the line. Captains Charlesworth and Chew the Twenty-fifth Ohio, Lieut. McDonald, Captains Myers and Newland, of the Thirteenth Indiana, and Captain Hamilton, of the Thirty-second Ohio, rallied them, and brought them to line in a few moments. The enemy fell and attempted to turn our right flank, but immediately met and repulsed. Our men in this time had become broken, but were again rallied by the officers of the different commands, and conducted themselves nobly. The enemy attempted to advance upon us, but shared the same fate as before, and, after making several attempts to drive us from the woods, retired to the left to turn our left flank and to our rear. I ordered a portion of the Twenty-fifth to advance and attack them, which they did in a gallant manner, the enemy retreated to their cabins. They soon appeared again, however, and our men finding that they were not receiving the support of the Ninth Indiana and Second Virginia, quite a number commenced retreating, and it was with great difficulty that they were rallied. Some did not return, but disgracefully left the field. The remainder of the command fought like veteran soldiers, and drove the rebels again to their cabins; but they were soon rallied by their officers, and renewed the attack with a large reinforcement, pouring a galling fire into our ranks; yet our men held their position, and returned the fire with great energy and determination, the officers of the different detachments encouraging and cheering them on. Many of the men had left the field with the wounded, and some without cause, which had much reduced our number, and our ammunition was almost exhausted. Their artillery directed upon us with shot and shell, but without any effect, and the enemy was again ordered to retire to their cabins, with great success, as usual. Our ammunition being exhausted, I thought it prudent to fall back to the headquarters of the Commanding General, and was done in good order."

The fight here lasted about three hours. The forces engaged at this point were about one hundred and fifty strong; the rebels about twenty-five hundred, and nine pieces of artillery. The following are the officers who were engaged on the right, all of whom, it is believed, behaved well to the last: Colonel Jones, of the Twenty-fifth Ohio; Captains Charlesworth, Johnson, and Askew; Lieutenants Bowler, Merriman, Wood, and Haugh, of the Twenty-fifth Ohio; Lieut. Aide-de-camp McDonald, of General Reynolds' staff; Captains Dobbins, Adjutant C. H. Ross, Captains Johnson, Harrington, Clinton, Kirkland, Myers, Smith, Delong, Shields, Bailey, Jones, (killed,) and many others, of the Ninth Indiana; Captain Hamilton and Lieutenant Brent, of the Thirty-second Ohio. These did their duty manfully, and made a great slaughter among the rebels.

They retreated to the very bad road which the Ninth Indiana and the Second Virginia had to travel, and the amount of fallen timber thrown in their way by the rebels the day previous, their march was much impeded, so that they did not reach in time to make a simultaneous attack with Gen. Milroy's column on the right. Col. Moody arrived with his force just about the time the Twenty-fifth, Thirty-second Ohio, and Thirteenth Indiana had retired, hence had to fight the rebels single-handed, which he, Major Milroy, of the Ninth, and Major Owens did until three o'clock p. m., when they retired in fine order, bringing off all their wounded and most of their dead. Whenever the rebels would come out of their works, the Ninth and part of the Second Virginia would drive them back with great slaughter. This force fought the rebels for six hours, killing many men and officers.

Taking the whole matter as a fight, the Union troops did very well—though their plans were thwarted by the fallen timber on the left of the rebel camp, thereby frustrating a simultaneous attack. The fight has done much good—in the first place it has taught the rebels that our boys are not afraid of them, even three to one. Considering the severity of the battle, and the length of the same, our loss is small when compared with that of the enemy, which cannot be less than two hundred killed, thirty-one prisoners, and a great many wounded. The gallant Union boys feel encouraged by the result. Col. Anderson, Major Rigger, Capt. Mollison, and many other officers, are acknowledged to be killed, and that Gen. (or Col.) Johnson, commanding, was wounded in the mouth. So you see that the late battle was a good thing on our part—the rebels so regard it.

I here venture to say that there has not been a single fight of the war as nobly fought as the late one at Camp Alleghany. The troops which attacked the enemy on the right of their camp—the Thirteenth Indiana and Thirty-second Ohio, together with over two-thirds of the Twenty-fifth Ohio—fought beyond description; never did old veterans fight more bravely; and had the column on the other side succeeded in making time, one of the grandest victories of the war would have been achieved in a short time. As it is, our boys did well, and are satisfied.

Bracken's Cavalry, though not directly engaged, were on the ground anxious for a "pitch in." The gray-haired Captain Bracken is a cautious and watchful man, and has splendid boys. Gen. Milroy, the commander of the expedition, was quite energetic, and always in the lead in the proper place—no braver man lives.

The following is a list of our killed and wounded, as many friends will look with interest to see the fate of their friends in the battle, to wit:

WHEELING “INTELLIGENCER” ACCOUNT.

CAMP ELKWATER, VA., Dec. 18, 1861.

ON the 9th of December, an order was received from head-quarters, at Huttonville, for a portion of the Second Virginia to report at Cheat Mountain Summit immediately, or as soon as the weather and muddy roads would permit. About 2 o'clock P. M. of that day, detachments of Companies A, C, D, G, H, I, J and K, in all about two hundred and ninety men, under command of Major Owens, took up the line of march for the Summit, where we arrived at 9 o'clock, and were joined by detachments of the Twenty-fifth and Thirty-second Ohio, Ninth and Thirteenth Indiana regiments, making a column of one thousand four hundred men at the Summit. The object of the expedition was explained to us, it being to clean out Camp Baldwin, situated on top of the Alleghany Mountains, distant from Cheat Mountain Summit about twenty-five miles.

On the 12th instant we left there, (the Summit,) and marched to the old camp of the rebels at Greenbrier, and there halted long enough to get supper and rest, where our force was divided, seven hundred going up the Greenbrier River, and a like number up the turnpike toward Staunton, where the two columns were to make the attack at 4 o'clock in the morning; but owing to the roughness of the road, and three miles of it up the mountain, much steeper than any part of Wheeling Hill, the column which your correspondent was with could not get up until about 8 o'clock in the morning, when we commenced the fight, on our side, by wounding two of the rebel pickets and killing one; our lines were formed, and forward, charge bayonets given; away we went, whooping like devils, within two hundred yards of the rebel intrenchments, when the fire became so hot that all had to take shelter behind logs, trees, and whatever else could be found. In this position we kept up a regular Indian fight for over four hours; toward the last the firing became so accurate, that if an inch of one's person was exposed, he was sure to catch it. At last came orders to draw off, which was done in tolerably good order. My opinion is that there were over three thousand rebels we had to fight, and at no time had we over two hundred and fifty men in the fight; opposed to this force was at least one thousand five hundred rebel muskets, and four or five pieces of artillery, among which was a thirty-two pounder.

Our loss in killed and wounded, I think, will reach nearly one hundred and fifty, and the rebel loss in killed alone, over two hundred. It was one of the hardest fought battles that has yet occurred in Western Virginia. The fight occurred in Highland County, seven miles from Monterey, from which place they (the rebels) received large reinforcements. I notice that some member of the Convention proposed to include Highland in the new State. I think if he had been at the fight he would accept the amendment to strike out that county.

The loss in the Second Virginia regiment is three killed and ten wounded—some mortally, though they have not died, and one missing. Among the killed was Lieut. Sickman, of the Plummer Guards, now Company G in the regiment. He was highly esteemed and a gallant officer. The rebel artillery was silenced four or five times by some boys of the Second, who annihilated one artillery company. There were many amusing incidents occurring during the fight, which, as I have spun this letter out to a considerable length, cannot be related here. From our column, which was composed of the Second Virginia and Ninth Indiana, all fought bravely, and were deserving of victory, but the odds were too great against us. I have just learned that the rebels contemplate attacking Elkwater in force. Let them come! The rebels also had a Second Virginia in the fight, and they were all fine-looking men, and well clothed. Our regiment was the last to leave the rebels. Considering that this was the first time we had been under fire, the men behaved well indeed. Major Milroy, of the Ninth Indiana, regardless of danger to himself, was everywhere encouraging the men during the fight.

SECESSION NARRATIVES.

RICHMOND "ENQUIRER" ACCOUNT.

RICHMOND, Dec. 16.

THE news has reached this city, both officially and otherwise, of a brilliant triumph of our arms over the enemy, on Friday morning last, the 13th inst.

The scene of the conflict was on the top of the Alleghany Mountain where it is crossed by the turnpike road leading west from Staunton, through Monterey, to Cheat Mountain. This point is about fifteen miles beyond Monterey, and about ten miles this side of the battle of Greenbrier, on the 3d of October. The intrenched camp of the enemy on Cheat Mountain is about seven miles beyond the Greenbrier River, and therefore seventeen miles west of the scene of the battle on Friday last.

The troops of the enemy were supposed to number about five thousand, and supposed also to be under the orders of Gen. Reynolds, the same who commanded at Greenbrier. The troops on our side consisted of two Georgia regiments, Col. J. B. Baldwin's regiment of Virginia troops, and two Virginia battalions—the one commanded by Lieut.-Col. Hansbrough, of Taylor County, the other by Maj. Rogers, of Barbour County. There were also two field-batteries—the one commanded by Capt. Anderson, the other the battery of Capt. Rice. Our whole force numbered about two thousand, and were under the command of Col. Edward Johnson, of the Georgia troops, a native of Chesterfield County, Va.

It has already been stated that our army had fallen back from their entrenched camp at Greenbrier River, the scene of their former glory, and that a portion of our troops had been transferred elsewhere. Encouraged by this, the enemy threw forward their column, and by a night march reached the present camp of our troops, on the Alleghany, on Friday morning. They commenced their attack about sunrise. The battle raged for seven hours, when the enemy, appalled by his heavy losses, and the total failure of his efforts, beat a final retreat.

On our side twenty men fell upon the field. The wounded and missing will amount, it is supposed, to a hundred men. The loss of the enemy was very great. Their ambulances were busy throughout the fight, and as their rear was unmolested, they carried off a vast number of killed and wounded. Notwithstanding, when forced to yield in the field, they left a large number of their dead in our hands. Eighty had already been found, at the date of our reports.

Among the slain on our side, we are sorry to hear the name of Captain Anderson of the artillery. Lieut.-Col. Hansbrough is among the wounded, but, we are happy to hear, not dangerously.

Thus have the heroes of Greenbrier again taught the enemy a bloody lesson. On the river side and on the mountain top, twice has Reynolds sought to overpower them with superior numbers, and twice he has been driven back with shattered lines, and with heavy slaughter. This last failure has proved even far more disastrous than the first; and again have the brave soldiers, who have been enduring the hardships of the Virginia mountains, gladdened the hearts of their countrymen and added new glory to their own fame, by winning a victory of which our whole people will be proud.

For the particulars, as above narrated, we are indebted to a gentleman who came hither from Monterey after the news of the battle had reached there. Since writing it, we have obtained a copy of a despatch received here by the War Department. It is as follows:

STAUNTON, December 14.

A despatch from Col. Johnson states that the enemy attacked him yesterday, five thousand strong, but was repulsed with great loss, after an engagement of seven hours. The battle commenced at seven o'clock A. M. Johnson's force was twelve hundred. W. W. LORING,
Brigadier-General.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT.

CAMP ALLEGHANY, Dec. 21, 1861.

Our boys are laughing heartily over the Yankees' published account of the battle of Alleghany. The following passage is really amusing: "The rebels set fire to their camp and retreated to Staunton. Our boys left the field in good order." Why, my dear sirs, it would have done your heart good to have seen the scoundrels run! The road for three miles was covered with their knapsacks, canteens, blankets, hats, and haversacks, and the citizens from the country bring us the news that they were stricken with the most disgraceful panic. The villains vented their spleen upon an old woman living upon the Greenbank road, aged eighty-two years, by destroying her furniture, carrying off her provisions, and breaking up her cooking utensils. Col. Johnson sent her a sack of flour and some other articles. Their troops went back to Cheat Mountain in wild confusion, demoralized and dispirited. Nothing prevented their entire capture but the withdrawal of Col. Talliferro's brigade from this line of operation.

We learn from our spies, and from men recently from Northwestern Virginia, that the enemy confess a loss, in killed, wounded, and missing, of over seven hundred men. Their dead bodies are still being found in the woods.

Six were found yesterday, with their eyes picked out by the crows, and many more doubtless lie scattered through the dense forest.

Among the officers that distinguished themselves in the late battle was Major Boykin, who commanded the Thirty-first Virginia Regiment. He charged at the head of his men, cheered them on by his valor, and drove the enemy in confusion down the hill. Major Boykin is from Lewis County, a graduate of the Military Institute, and is quite a young man. He is the idol of his men. We learn that he has since been promoted to a lieutenant-colonelcy.

We daily expect a renewal of the attack upon our camp. The enemy, under the guidance of a tory named Slavin, have been reconnoitring our position, with the intention of cutting a road for artillery. A party has gone out to capture them, and I hope they may succeed, as Slavin is a great scoundrel, and guided the enemy in the attack on the 13th inst. If they head "old Johnson," they may next head the devil. T. S.

RICHMOND, Dec. 22.

A letter from Camp Alleghany states that in the bloody fight of the 13th, Col. Johnson appeared upon the field in citizen's dress, gave his commands in the most emphatic manner, and led the fierce charges in person. After the Yankees had been driven to the woods, the Lee battery, of Lynchburg, opened upon them with marked effect. Capt. B. P. Anderson, who commanded this battery, seeing a number of men partially concealed by fallen timber, supposed they were our pickets, and called out to them to come into the ditches. Hardly were the words out of his mouth, when a shower of musketry was poured upon him, and the noble old hero fell from his horse and died in about fifteen minutes. The command of the battery now devolved upon Lieut. W. W. Hardwicke, of Lynchburg, who directed the shots admirably, and exhibited much personal bravery. Capt. Miller's battery, from Rockbridge, opened upon the enemy in the thicket, with canister shot, and sent many a poor Hessian to his last account.

From another letter, addressed to a gentleman in this city, we glean the following incidents:

In the second charge, while leading in the front, Lieut. Lewis Thompson received a shot through his body and another in his arm, just as he had shouted, "Come on, my brave boys, follow me!" He fell into the arms of Col. Johnson, who says he was as brave a man as he ever saw.

Capt. Thompson also behaved with great gallantry. He was surrounded once, but extricated himself, receiving many bullets through his clothing, but sustaining no personal injury.

It is stated of Capt. Anderson, the veteran hero who fell early in the engagement, that this was his fifty-eighth battle.

Col. Johnson said on the battle-field, that he could storm Arlington Heights with ten thousand such troops as the boys from the Northwest.

anson was always in the thickest of the fight, sometimes with a club in his hand, but generally with a musket; and another officer has since remarked that he could load and shoot faster than any man he saw.

The enemy, in the early part of the engagement, got between our commissary stores and the Confederate troops, and afterward two dead Yankees were found close to our tents, who are said to have been shot by a sick man lying in one of them.

Many of our men had bullet-holes through their clothing, and it is miraculous that our list of killed and wounded is so small. Fifty-five of the enemy were buried by our men, and some of them recognized as "Union men" from Marion County, by their old neighbors. It is stated by one who saw a good many of the dead Hessians, that none of them were shot lower than the breast, and many through the heart.

A little hero named Musgrove, from Ritchie County, was shot through the arm by a man concealed behind a log. He immediately got a friend to load his musket, and, jumping over a pile of brush, shot the rascal who had wounded him, and secured his oil-cloth coat, with a name on it.

Every account which we have seen concurs in representing the rout of the enemy to have been complete, though it is not probable that we shall ever learn his actual loss.

PROCLAMATION OF GOV. JACKSON.

DECEMBER 13, 1861.

Officers and Soldiers of the Missouri State Guard, and Fellow-Citizens:

In the month of June last, after having exhausted every honorable means of averting the calamities of civil war, I called upon the State for fifty thousand volunteers, to drive the ruthless bands of hired invaders from our soil. Before making that call, I had asked that you might have the privilege of determining, at the polls, in a peaceable manner, your future political relations with the United States—determined, on my part, to abide that decision, whatever it might be. That privilege—a right which belongs to every freeman—was denied you. Our enemies chose to submit your rights to the arbitrament of the sword, and we accept the issue so boastingly tendered us.

There was no alternative left. We had either to draw the sword and defend our rights, or, like slaves, submit to the worst despotism on earth. Between these I could not and did not hesitate. I chose the former, and hence, from that time to the present, grim-visaged War has stalked through our State, from the Nishnebotena to the St. Francois—from the Desmoines to the Neosho—and in his trail have followed charred walls, bloodstained fields and desolate homes.

When the circumstances by which we were surrounded are considered, it must be acknowledged that the State responded nobly to my call; and to you, who left all the comforts of home, and for six long months have been enduring all the hardships, dangers, and sufferings of a soldier's life, too much praise and credit cannot be given. Patiently have you borne the burning rays of the summer's sun, the beating storm, chilling blasts and sickening hunger pains; and nobly have you stood upon the battle-field, amid showering balls, bursting bombs, and charging horse. Yea, more than this, you have dared the burning fever, the feeble pulse, and risked the solitary grave, with all of a patriot's faith and hope.

These things have you done, my brave soldiers, but our work is not complete yet, for war, with its horrors and train of suffering, still hovers over our beloved State. We are fighting for liberty, equality, and independence, and can never leave the field while the foot of an enemy shall be left to pollute our soil. Every thing on earth that renders life valuable and dear to freemen is at stake, and none but the basest slave and craven coward can yield in such a contest. Not so with the enemy. We seek not his subjugation, his country, or his home. He can quit the field, retire to his home, and thereby give peace and happiness to a bleeding and suffering country. He can by these means at once close the unrelenting crusade which he is now waging against us.

Our enemies in the State, though impudently and arrogantly asserting that a majority of the people are on their side, have by their own conduct given most indubitable evidence that all their claims are false, or that they themselves are too cowardly to fight their own battles.

Are there any so blind among them as not to see that the predominant feeling in the State is with the South? Do they not know that an overwhelming majority of the people will never submit to the rule of an abolition despotism? Are they not aware that the usurpations of their defunct convention are almost universally condemned by the people? If all these things are not well known to them, why did the convention, at its recent sitting, rescind their ordinance of a former session, submitting their high-handed usurpations to a vote of the people for ratification? They know, and everybody knows, that the people would have put their seal of condemnation, in thunder tones, upon all their unholy deeds, had the opportunity been afforded them.

Why, if they have the majority, did they import regiment after regiment, brigade after brigade, general after general, from the ranks of Lincoln's hired hordes in the North to fight their battles in Missouri? Our friends from the South were never invited into Missouri until the Lincoln Government had quartered their Hessian troops all over the State. These troops thus quartered in our midst have been met upon every field, with few exceptions, by Missouri's sons alone, and with almost unvaried success. Now, when we have the assistance of the rich and powerful Southern Confederacy, with all her vast resources, and her gallant sons to stand by our sides, what must be the result? If any among us have hitherto entertained the idea that Missouri can be conquered, let them at once and forever banish the delusion from their minds.

By your own strong arms, and willing hearts, and dauntless courage, you have passed successfully through the darkest hour and greatest peril which can possibly attend the unholy crusade now being waged against you. Our enemies must have been brought to know that a bloody revenge must and will follow a continuance of our persecution. It cannot be supposed that a large majority of our people are to be driven from their homes and firesides, and forced to surrender up the graves of their fathers and their children to Northern invaders. This can never be done as long as a man can be found or an arm shall be left to strike a blow. Overwhelming numbers may sometimes force us to retreat; circumstances may occasionally cause us to fall back; but, as certain as God reigns in heaven, we will return again and again, until the last man shall have perished, or we shall have reclaimed our homes.

I have said, and now repeat it, that our enemies can, at any moment, leave the field in safety, and retire to their homes, whereas we can never lay down our arms without dishonor while an enemy shall pollute our soil with his unhallowed tread. Honor and patriotism alike forbid it. The memories of the past and the hopes of the future equally forbid it. The question for Missouri to determine is now resolved into this single proposition: Shall she be the Empire State of the glorious Southern Confederacy, the bright star and peer of Virginia, in the Southern constellation, or shall she ignominiously submit to the abolition yoke of Northern fanaticism—conquered, humbled and disgraced—forced to remain under a Government made tyrannical by fanaticism, disgraced by its rulers, and contemptible in the eyes of the world?

But it is useless now to argue the interest or policy of the State; our enemies have chosen to submit them both to the arbitrament of the sword, and by the sword they must be settled. There is no reason why we should shrink from the contest. The Missouri State Guard, almost single-handed, have fought the armies of all the Western States for more than six months with unparalleled success. Their victories at Cole Camp, at Carthage, at Oak Hills, Fort Scott, Lexington, Fredericktown, and Belmont, cannot fail to inspire the country with renewed zeal, energy, and courage. These noble and heroic deeds have passed into history, and will form the brightest page of the crisis through which our country is passing.

My brave soldiers, now in the field, the six months for which you were called is now expiring, and many may desire to return to their homes. It is natural you should desire to do so; but let me beg you not now to turn back from the work you have so nobly begun; do not now fail when the eyes of the whole country are upon you; do not lose your glorious reputation for want of a little more patience; do not let the princely heritage of Missouri be lost to you and your children, when a few more weeks or days of perseverance may win it for you. Let me, therefore, entreat you to embrace the opportunity which is now offered you to volunteer in the service of that great young government, the Southern Confederacy—one of the brilliant stars of which is our own loved Missouri—and fight under that bright flag which has yet known no defeat.

That the bond of union between Missouri and her Southern sisters may be more perfect, and that encouragement be given our men, and that system and unity of purpose exist which insures success, it has been determined that the present members of the Missouri State Guard shall have the liberty to reorganize under the laws of the Southern Confederacy—that our Southern brothers may have the privilege of supplying our wants and paying our troops, while we fight our battles, which are also theirs. Do not let the frosts of winter deter you from embracing the opportunity. Do not fail to remember those patriotic sires who wintered at Valley Forge—let their bright example encourage you—the cause is the same—'tis liberty and equality for which we fight. You have no homes to which you can safely go—the Hessian and the Jaylawker go wherever the army is not, and you will but put on the shackles of serfdom whenever you lay down your arms, even though it be but temporarily. I know your patriotism—you have proved it. I know your bravery—the world has seen it. I know your endurance—the cheerfulness with which you have borne your hardships have demonstrated it—then I pray you, maintain your reputation but a little while longer, and Missouri will be regenerated and redeemed.

To my fellow-citizens who have not yet joined the army, I have now a word to say. Can you longer delay? Can there be yet one lingering ray of hope in your hearts that the once glorious Union can ever be reconstructed or reunited? Can you expect to remain as quiet spectators, tilling your fields and attending to your private speculations, while fifty thousand of your brave brothers are on the "War Path"? Do you not know that absence from the field but prolongs the war, and that you are at all times liable to depredations from either party? Come out, then, like men. Remember that "he who is not for us is against us!" You know as well as I that the people of Missouri are Southern people—that their sympathies, their hopes, and their interests are with the South. Then I call upon you in the name of our noble State, now struggling for independence, to come out and help your brothers who in the field. You cannot ask or expect me to do all the fighting, to endure all the hardships, and divide with you their glory and successes. You should not expect to enjoy the reward unless you participate in their struggles for victory and independence.

FIGHT AT MUNFORDSVILLE, KY.

GENERAL BUELL'S DESPATCH.

LOUISVILLE, December 17.

To Major-General McClellan:

Gen. McCook's division is at Munfordsville, and Gen. Mitchell at Bacon's Creek. Zollicoffer is either retiring across the Cumberland River or is preparing to do so at the approach of any superior force.

McCook reported that the rebels attacked my pickets in front of the railroad bridge at two o'clock P. M. to-day. The pickets consisted of four companies of the Thirty-second Indiana, Col. Willich, under Lieut.-Col. Von Trebra. Their force consisted of one regiment of Texas Rangers, two regiments of infantry, and one battery of six guns. Our loss was Lieut. Sachs and eight enlisted men killed and ten wounded. The rebel loss was thirty-three killed, including the colonel of the Texas regiment, and about fifty wounded.

D. C. BUELL,

Brigadier-General Commanding.

GEN. BUELL'S ORDERS.

HEAD-QUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO, }
LOUISVILLE, Ky., December 27, 1861. }

The General commanding takes pleasure in bringing to notice the gallant conduct of a portion of Col. Willich's regiment, Thirty-second, at Rowlett's Station, in front of Munfordsville, on the 17th inst.

Four companies of the regiment, under Lieut.-Col. Von Trebra, on outpost duty, were attacked by a column of the enemy, consisting of one regiment of cavalry, a battery of artillery, and two regiments of infantry. They defended themselves until reinforced by other companies of the regiment, and the fight was continued with such effect that the enemy at length retreated precipitately.

The attack of the enemy was mainly with his cavalry and artillery. Our troops fought as skirmishers, rallying rapidly into squares when charged by the cavalry—sometimes even defending themselves singly and killing their assailants with the bayonet.

The General tenders his thanks to the officers and soldiers of the regiment for their gallant and efficient conduct on this occasion. He commends it as a study and example to all other troops under his command, and enjoins them to emulate the discipline and instruction which insure such results.

The name of "Rowlett Station," will be inscribed in the regimental colors of the Thirty-second Indiana regiment.

By command of Brig.-Gen. Buell,

[Official.]

JAMES B. FRY,

Assistant Adjutant-General, Chief of Staff.

REBEL OFFICIAL REPORT.

HEAD-QUARTERS CENTRAL ARMY OF KY., }
BOWLING GREEN, December 21, 1861. }

Special Order No. 64:

On the 17th inst., our forces, under Brig.-Gen. Hindman, partially engaged a superior force of the enemy near Woodsonville. In the action we sustained a loss of four killed and nine wounded. The enemy was driven back, and left about fifty killed, and seven prisoners. The conduct of our troops was marked by impetuous valor. On charging the enemy, Col. Terry, of the Texas Rangers, was killed in the moment of victory. His regiment deplors the loss of a brave and beloved commander—the army one of its ablest officers.

The General commanding returns his thanks to Brig.-Gen. Hindman and his command for their conduct in the initiative of the campaign in Kentucky, and he bails the brilliant courage shown in the affair as a bright augury of their valor when the actual hour comes for striking a decisive blow.

By order of Major-Gen. HARDEE,
D. H. WHITE, Act. Ass't Adj.-Gen.

A CIRCUMSTANTIAL ACCOUNT BY ONE WHO WAS IN THE FIGHT.

CAMP WOOD, KY., December 17.

We have had the first really earnest fight, and I hasten to give you as full and complete an account thereof as is possible under the circumstances. Since we have been out here on Green River, we have been on picket duty nearly all the time, occupying, as we do, the advance of the army of Central Kentucky. A few days ago we had the first little skirmish. One of our pickets, consisting of six men, had incautiously been advanced a little too far, and were cut off by a party of Rangers. In the fight which ensued, two were wounded, and one of them fell into the hands of the enemy, who had suffered a much larger loss. This little affair led to an order of Col. Willich that, for the future, no member of the regiment should be suffered to remain in the hands of the enemy, even if the whole regiment should be drawn into battle. All the necessary precautions were taken on both banks of the Green River; signal-lists were posted to give instantaneous alarm in case of an attack.

The regiment had usually two companies on the south side of Green River, for the protection and reconstruction of the railroad bridge. But on the evening before the fight another bridge over the river had been completed by our company of sappers, under Lieut. Pietzsch; and the former arrangement, according to which the main defence of the work on the railroad bridge should, in case of an attack, be conducted from the northern bank, was, by order of Colonel Willich, changed, and four companies were ordered to occupy the north bank of Green River as skirmishers, while four other companies were sent over the river in support of the pickets there.

About twelve o'clock on the 16th of December the right wing of the chain of pickets of the second company, Captain Glass, was attacked by cavalry from the enemy. Captain Glass sent reinforcements, who drove back the enemy; and he himself, with the balance of the company, followed. About a mile beyond his chain of pickets he met an infantry company of the enemy, which he saluted with a full volley, whereupon the same retired as quickly as possible. Immediately thereafter large masses of infantry advanced against him, before which he retired to his line of skirmishers, fighting all the time till reinforcements arrived.

About the same time the third company, to the left of the Woodsonville pike, advanced in a southern direction, meeting but very feeble resistance; at the same time the alarm had been given to the other companies, and in an indescribably short time all those on the other side of the river started in "double-quick" step over the bridge.

On account of the hot haste to get to support the companies already engaged, the captains forgot the precautions which, for such an event, had been urged upon them by Colonel Willich, and all of them in fierce haste crossed the river, went up the hill on the other side, and, almost breathless, pushed into the woods in the direction of the firing.

Col. Willich had gone to the head-quarters of the division when the engagement commenced, and Lieut.-Col. Trebra was therefore in command. He sent the Sixth, Seventh, and Tenth companies to support the Second company on the right, and the First, Fifth, Eighth, and Ninth companies to support the Third company on the left flank. At the very first rush of our skirmishers, the infantry of the enemy were thrown into confusion, and driven back at all points.

Then it was, however, when the most severe and bloody part of the battle commenced. With lightning velocity and a demon-like howl, black masses of cavalry—Col. Terry's regiment of Texas Rangers—pounced upon our skirmishers along the whole line. They rode up to them within fifteen or twenty yards, some even in the very midst of our men, and commenced a terrible fire from their carbines and revolvers. At their first onset it seemed as if every one of our men would be destroyed. But here it was that the veteran coolness and bravery of our troops shone forth. They allowed the enemy to come almost as near as he chose, and then poured a deadly fire upon him, which shook the entire line. Upon our left flank Lieut. Sachs, with half of the Third company, in the frenzy of battle, left his covered position and attacked the enemy in the open field. But terrible and fierce as his onset was, the odds were too much against him. The entire number would have been destroyed—for the Rangers, to do them justice, fought with desperate bravery—if they had not been quickly rescued. Upon the right flank of the Third company's position, by order of Adjutant Schmidt, the Eighth company was led forth by Lieuts. Kappel and Levy; upon the left, Lieut.-Col. Trebra advanced with the Ninth company; both attacked the enemy in close skirmishers' line, drove him back, and rescued the rest of the heroic little band under Lieut. Sachs. He himself and a number of his men were, however, already killed, though they had made the enemy pay dearly for their lives.

Now the artillery of the enemy was brought to bear upon our men. Their fire, balls and shrapnells, was well directed, but fortunately not very fatal. Only a few of our men were wounded by splinters of balls; among them was Assistant Surgeon Geanson, who, while devotedly attending to his duty on the battle-field, was struck senseless by a heavy branch of a tree, which had been cut down by a cannon ball. Fortunately for him and us he soon recovered.

While this was going on upon our left wing, the fight on the right was no less severe. The Second, Sixth, and Tenth companies were scattered as skirmishers, while the Seventh was drawn in company column for their support. The Sixth company had taken position behind a fence. The Rangers galloped up to them in loose line, and commenced firing from rifles and revolvers. Their fire was steadily returned by the Sixth company, which held them in check till a part of them got behind the fence, when our skirmishers fell back behind the Seventh company, drawn up in a square. Now a conflict ensued such as has perhaps seldom before taken place. A whole battalion of Rangers, fully two hundred strong, rushed upon the little band of not more than fifty. Upon the front and left flank of the square, they rushed, no doubt thinking that they would easily trample down the squad before them.

Capt. Welschbellich allowed them to come within a distance of seventy yards, and then gave them a volley, which not only staggered them, but sent them back, not, however, till a part of them had returned the fire. But immediately afterward they reformed and again they rushed fiercely upon the front and both flanks of the square. They seemed frantic with rage over the successful resistance offered to them, and this time a number of them rode up to the point of the bayonet. But another well-aimed volley emptied a number of saddles, and sent back the whole mass which but a moment before had seemed to threaten certain destruction to Capt. Welschbellich's company. A few bayonet thrusts and scattering shots brought down those who had ventured to our very teeth. This second repulse seemed to have a marked effect. Yet a third attack was made; however, it was much less determined and force than the two first, though it was more disastrous to them. During this third attack it was that Col. Terry, the commander of the Rangers, was killed. Upon his fall the whole column broke and fled in wild dismay from the field of battle.

In their place a whole regiment of infantry, accompanied by their band of music, marched against the "invincible square." Before this overpowering force Capt. Welschbellich deemed it prudent to retire, and united with the Second, Sixth, and Tenth companies again.

About this time it was that Col. Willich, with foaming horse, had arrived upon the field of battle. He saw the right wing retiring, and the entire infantry of the enemy, two regiments, advancing, thus endangering the line of retreat of the left wing. He therefore ordered the signal for "retiring slowly" to be given, and collected the companies. The Second company, under Capt. Glass, and the Seventh, under Capt.

Welschbellich, were the first who took their places in the line of battle of the regiment.

About this time a manoeuvre was executed by the First company, under Capt. Erdemeyer, which decided the day. When the battle commenced, and the impression prevailed that we were fighting only cavalry, Lieutenant-Colonel Trebra had detached this company, to take a position in the flank of the enemy, and from there to attack them. When the First company arrived at the place of destination, Capt. E. found that the enemy had likewise a large force of infantry and artillery, to attack which would have been certain destruction for his company. He therefore kept his covered position until the time mentioned. Then, finding the larger part of the infantry drawn to another part of the field, he ordered an advance. His appearance was the signal of a general retreat of the enemy. The rest of the cavalry fled precipitately, the artillery retired hastily, and the infantry followed just as quickly.

Then followed the sad business of collecting the dead and wounded. Our loss was eleven killed and twenty wounded, and five missing. Of the wounded, several, according to the reports of the surgeons, may possibly die. The missing will probably turn up. The loss of the enemy is much larger. They left a large number of killed on the field, and the First company saw them, on their retreat, throw about thirty dead bodies into a wagon which was brought off. Among the dead left in our hands was the body of Col. Terry. But his body and several wounded soldiers of the enemy were delivered up to a flag of truce sent by them. Some of their surgeons had humanely bound up the wounds and sent back three of our wounded who had fallen into their hands, and Col. Willich was glad of the opportunity which was allowed him to show his acknowledgment.

Thus our first fight has gloriously ended. The force of the enemy was at least four times as large as ours, and consisted of their best troops, picked for this purpose. Everybody in our regiment has, on this occasion, done his entire duty. Our officers have all acted with coolness and bravery, and did exactly the right thing in the right place. For this reason it would be unjust to name any one especially. I will merely add what I have above omitted, that the Second and Tenth companies, on the right wing, were engaged with the infantry of the enemy, and prevented their attempt to turn our flank. Their engagement became particularly brisk during the cavalry attack upon the Seventh company. We all think we have done justice to our reputation.

To-day we paid the last honors to our dead. The funeral was a very impressive one. Col. Willich, in a touching address, paid a beautiful tribute to the memory of those who have fallen, and at the close of his address every man went up and threw a handful of earth upon the last abode of his fallen comrades. May they rest in peace!

ANOTHER ACCOUNT.

CAMP GEORGE WOOD, MUNFORDSVILLE, }
December 17. }

At about half past one this afternoon our camp was startled by the sharp rattle of musketry, which seemed to come from the south bank of Green River. It was known that a part of Colonel Willich's magnificent regiment, the Thirty-second Indiana, was doing picket duty on that side, and the inference at once was that the lusty Germans had either attacked the enemy or been attacked by them—most likely the former. General Johnson well knew the sound to be that of fight—the direction of the firing and the hour of the day told plainly that at least a skirmish was actually going on—probably a grand battle pending. So he ordered the signal gun to sound, and for the first time our regiments formed in line of battle.

A messenger shortly came over with the intelligence that Willich's pickets had espied rebel soldiers in the woods beyond them, and immediately their lion-hearted Lieutenant-Colonel, Henry von Trebra, had ordered two companies to advance, and, if possible, effect their dislodgment. The enemy retreated half a mile to his main body without firing a shot, and the two companies pursued him, stealthily advancing as skirmishers. Suddenly and unexpectedly a troop of rebel cavalry came dashing over the hill, and a careless volley from their shot-guns told our boys that they were near falling into an ambush, and that the enemy was actually in their front in considerable force. But, nothing daunted, the brave Germans, veteran like, returned the volley with a galling fire, slowly retreating so as to bring the enemy out from the woods, and into a level, open field. The enemy, confident in his numbers, was not slow to accept the invitation. In the mean time, the two companies being hard pressed, the bugle was sounded to bring up the remaining companies of the regiment. They came on right gallantly, part of them having to cross Green River, and fell in upon the right and left flank with as much apparent coolness as if this had been their hundredth battle instead of their first. Then followed an almost hand-to-hand conflict, lasting fully an hour. The enemy strove in vain to draw the Germans up the hill by feigned retreats; a masked battery was so planted as to have swept our brave fellows fore and aft, had they for a moment permitted their valor to get the better of their discretion; but, knowing the fearful odds arrayed against them, they were content to hold their ground. Finally, when the enemy despaired of getting them into the ambush, they unmasked their battery and opened fire. The first ball passed between the adjutant and major of the regiment, who occupied positions not many feet apart. The belching cannon was the signal of another onset by the Texan cavalymen, and right well did they perform the work. Captain Welschbellich, Company G, formed his men in hollow square and the cavalymen charged their front, their right, and their left, but they were as adamant, the square remained unbroken, while many of the Texans, equally brave, but less successful because they were the attacking party, bit the dust. The cavalymen retired, discomfited, and then an entire regiment of rebel infantry darkened the hill and came marching down toward the brave men composing Company G, but a galling fire from our front and right scattered their forces and gave them something else to think about. Colonel Willich had been ordered on duty at head-quarters, and consequently did not get to his regiment until the heat of the battle was over. The regiment was forced to fall back a short distance, not being able to stand against the artillery. The rebels did not pursue. They carried off their wounded, and then beat a hasty retreat. It is known that the rebel force consisted of Terry's regiment of cavalry, two regiments of infantry and three pieces of cannon. The rebels lost forty-nine killed. Their number of wounded is not known, but is undoubtedly large.

December 18.

This morning they sent in a flag of truce, under which they are interring their dead. Willich's entire forces only numbered four hundred and fourteen, including commissioned officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates.

The following is a list of our killed and wounded:

Killed.—Theodore Smith, Christopher Renter, Ernest Schimean, Garry Keifer, all of Company F; Max. Sachs, First Lieut. Company C, (six shots); Frederick Shoemaker, Henry Lohst, B Weke, all of Company C; Daniel Smith and George Burkhardt, of Company G.

A SECESSION ACCOUNT.

At dawn on Tuesday morning, Nov. 17th, a body of men consisting in part of Severt's artillery and a fragment of Col. Terry's Rangers was ordered forward from Cave City, near which they were encamped. They proceeded toward Woodsonville, and after they had passed the deep cut on this side of the dirt road bridge, they found a part of the enemy. It was in the outskirts of Woodsonville. They had learned that the enemy had boasted that they intended cutting off "Terry and his d—d Wildcats." This Col. Terry endeavored to defeat, by turning a gap in an adjacent fence and outflanking them. But this attempt was unsuccessful, as was also an effort to plant Severt's battery. Before other preparation could be made, the fight became general along the fence. The enemy were on both sides of it, extending in a line from one hundred and fifty to two hundred yards in length, and numbering six hundred strong. Our forces did not exceed two hundred and seventy-five. Col. Terry dashed on in advance, having shouted to Capt. Walker, "Come, John, let's charge on them and risk the consequences." Capt. Walker, Dr. Cowan, Capt. Evans Paulding Anderson, the orderly of Capt. W.'s company, (whose name has escaped us.) followed after in a group, firing their six-shooters with great effect as they proceeded, killing numbers on either side of the fence, and scattering to the right and left. They did not retreat, however. They stood up with intrepid firmness and courage. The fight lasted in this way along the fence for fifteen minutes, when our boys had reached the extreme end of it. Just here Col. Terry—always in the front—discovered a nest of five of the enemy. He leaped in his saddle, waved his hat, and said, "Come on, boys, here's another bird's nest." He fired and killed two of them. The other three fired at him simultaneously. One shot killed his charger; another shot killed him. He fell headlong from his horse without a groan or a moan. He was killed instantly, the ball piercing his windpipe and penetrating the lower part of the brain. At the same time, Paulding Anderson and Dr. Cowan rode up and despatched the remaining three of the enemy. The man who killed Col. Terry was a huge, raw-boned German, well dressed, and armed with a fine Belgian musket. The fight ended here.

When Col. Terry's fall was announced, it at once prostrated his men with grief. The enemy had fled; sixty-six of their dead lay upon the field; of ours, only five. Slowly these were collected, and our troops fell back to a secure position. All in all, this is one of the most desperate fights of the war. It was hand-to-hand from first to last. No men could have fought more desperately than the enemy. The Rangers were equally reckless. The result, mournful as it is, in the loss of a brave and gallant soldier, a promising officer, the idol of his men, a beloved and honored citizen, adds another page to the glory of our invincible arms. It opens the ball in lower Kentucky. Stirring scenes may be expected hourly in that quarter.

REBEL REPORT OF THE BATTLE.

HEADQUARTERS ADVANCE GUARD, C. A. KY., }
CAVE CITY, December 19, 1861. }

SIR: At eight o'clock A. M., on the 17th inst., I moved toward Woodsonville for the purpose of breaking up the railroad from the vicinity of that place southward. My force consisted of one thousand one hundred infantry and four pieces of artillery.

When within two and a half miles of Woodsonville, concealed from the enemy's view, I halted the column and ordered forward Col. Terry's Rangers, to occupy the heights of my right, left, and front; and Major Phifer's Cavalry to watch the crossings of Green River, still further to my left.

These orders having been executed, and no force of the enemy or pickets seen, I advanced the column till the right reached the railroad. This brought me within three-quarters of a mile of the river and the enemy, but still concealed, except a small body of cavalry upon the extreme left. Here a company of rangers was detached to observe the enemy from Rowlett's Knob, which was to my right, across the railroad. A strip of timber bordered the river parallel to the line held by my cavalry. Fields were between a body of the enemy's infantry, as skirmishers moved through the timber, by their right, on my left. They were fired upon by a small body of my cavalry, and retired. The firing ceased for about half an hour, and I went in person to select a suitable place for camp, leaving Col. Terry in command, with instructions to decoy the enemy up the hill, where I could use my infantry and artillery with effect, and be out of the range of the enemy's batteries.

Before returning to the column, the fire from the skirmishers recommenced. The enemy appeared in force upon my right and centre. Col. Terry, at the head of seventy-five Rangers, charged about three hundred, routed and drove them back, but fell mortally wounded. A body of the enemy, of about the same size, attacked the Rangers, under Capt. Ferrell, upon the right of the turnpike, and were repulsed with heavy loss. The enemy now began crossing by regiments, and moving about on my right and left flanks. Three companies of Col. Marmaduke's (First Ark.) battalion were thrown out as skirmishers on my left, engaged the enemy's right, and drove them to the river. I now ordered forward Capt. Smith's battery and the Second Arkansas regiment to support it, holding the Sixth Arkansas regiment in reserve. The artillery opened fire upon the enemy in the field adjacent to the railroad, and drove them to the bank of the river.

Firing now ceased on both sides. The enemy made no further attempt to advance, but knowing that he had already crossed the river in force more than double my own, and had the means of crossing additional forces, I withdrew my command by way of the turnpike, two miles and a half, and took position to meet the enemy, if disposed to advance. There being no indications of such an intention, I returned to my camp here, reaching this place at eight o'clock P. M.

My loss in this affair was as follows:—Killed, Col. Terry and three men of his regiment.—Dangerously Wounded, Lieut. Morris and three men, (Texas Rangers.)—Slightly Wounded, Capt. Walker and three men, (Texas Rangers,) and two men of the First Arkansas battalion.

I estimated the enemy's loss at seventy-five killed and left on the ground; wounded, unknown. I have eight prisoners; others taken, were too badly wounded to be moved, and were left at citizens' houses.

The troops under my command who were engaged, displayed courage in excess. The others were as steady as veterans.

Respectfully, T. C. HINDMAN,
Brigadier-General.

Act. Assistant Adj't-Gen. First Division
Central Army of Kentucky.

SECRET HISTORY OF THE REBELLION.***

LETTER FROM EX-GOV. THOMAS, OF MARYLAND.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, }
Wednesday, Dec. 18, 1861. }

To the Editors of the Baltimore Clipper:

GENTLEMEN: A friend to-day directed my attention to an article in which there are some errors, which I beg permission to correct.

Gov. Pickens, of South Carolina, at the meeting of Southern members of Congress, held in the room of the Committee of Claims, in February, 1837, did not propose that resolutions "should be offered to Congress, and if they were not adopted, then every Southern man should leave the capitol," and I regret to discover that I was understood to make such a declaration, recently, in the Front street Theatre. That the occurrence referred to by me, in my remarks before the audience in the theatre, may not be misunderstood, please allow to me space for a brief explanation.

In February, 1837, the day next succeeding that on which the votes for President and Vice-President had been counted, as I entered the Hall of the House of Representatives, I met Gen. McCoy, of North Carolina, who said to me: "Why are you not in the room of the Committee of Claims?" I inquired for what purpose ought I to be there? Gen. McCoy said: "There is a meeting of all the members of the House from the slaveholding States." Without knowing by whom or for what purpose the meeting had been called, I proposed to go and hear what was to be done. When we entered the room together, we found from sixty to seventy members present, Gen. Chambers, of Kentucky, being in the chair, and Mr. Harrison, of Missouri, acting as Secretary. Gov. Pickens was speaking, and was urging the adoption of a resolution which had been submitted. Soon after he closed his remarks, I made inquiry of the Chair as to the object of the meeting, when the resolution was read. I could not now repeat, word for word, the whole resolution, but remember very distinctly its import. The resolution, in substance, declared that no gentleman who represented in Congress slaveholding constituents, ought again to take his seat in the House of Representatives until resolutions, satisfactory to the South on the subject of Slavery, had been adopted.

The instant this resolution was read, influenced by incidents that had prior to this come under my observation, I saw, or at least I thought I saw, one of the objects of the meeting, and asked permission to take part in the proceedings, which was granted.

To unmask the objects of the meeting, I inquired whether, if the House did not gratify our demands, any one present was prepared to say what step was next to be taken? Were we Southern Representatives to retire from Congress and notify our constituents that the Government was a failure, and that a Southern convention ought to be called to form a new Constitution? Having asked these questions, I paused for replies, and as no one undertook to point out the path which we were to pursue, beyond the adoption of the resolution before the meeting, I protested against its adoption, with great earnestness, as a measure leading, necessarily, to secession of the whole Southern representation—reminded the meeting that we were seventy in number—if we deserted our seats in the House, the remaining members might not satisfy our demands on the subject of Slavery, and we could not then, without dishonor, return. I spoke against the authority of members of Congress to initiate measures of such revolutionary character—announced my determination to resume my seat in the House and hold it to the end of my term of service, and to leave to the people of the United States themselves to decide when measures ought to be adopted with a view to change the old, and form a new Government.

As no gentleman undertook either to answer my interrogatories or reply to my remonstrance against the proposed proceeding, I moved an adjournment, sine die, which motion was seconded by Mr. Craig, of Virginia, and the meeting was dissolved.

After adjourning, the members of the meeting resumed their seats in the House, where resolutions on the slavery question, which had been prepared by Mr. W. B. Shepherd, of North Carolina, and Mr. J. R. Ingersoll, of Philadelphia, were offered, and were voted for by every member of the House, excepting three or four of those who were then known as Nullifiers.

This, in substance, I think, was the statement made to the meeting at Front street Theatre. It is proper I should say now, if I did not then, that I have no reason to suppose that there were many persons in this meeting of the members of Congress, who were not trusted any further than I was in the purposes for which it was assembled. Looking to it then, as I did, in connection with many, very many other incidents which had come under my observation, I believed it to be one of the means relied upon to continue that agitation which had commenced with the nullification of the tariff laws, and is now shaking the very foundation of the Government. Very respectfully,

FRANCIS THOMAS.

BATTLE AT MILFORD, MO.

FOUGHT DECEMBER 18, 1861.

HEAD-QUARTERS ST. LOUIS, Dec. 20, 1861.

Major-General G. B. McClellan, Major-General Commanding Army:

A part of Gen. Pope's forces, under Col. J. Davis and Major Marshall, surprised another camp of the enemy on the afternoon of the 18th, at Milford, a little north of Warrensburg. A brisk skirmish ensued, when the enemy, finding himself surrounded, surrendered at discretion. We took thirteen hundred prisoners, including three colonels and seventeen captains, and one thousand stand of arms, one thousand horses, sixty-five wagons, and a large quantity of tents, baggage, and supplies. Our loss is two killed and eight wounded. The enemy's loss not yet known.

Information was received last night from Glasgow that our troops at that place had taken about two tons of powder, in kegs, buried on Jackson's farm. This effectually cuts off their supply of ammunition. H. W. HALLECK, Major-General.

GENERAL POPE'S REPORT.

HEAD-QUARTERS DISTRICT CENTRAL MISSOURI, }
OTTENVILLE, December 23, 1861. }

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to state that, having replaced by troops from Lamine the garrison of Sedalia, I marched from that place on Sunday the 15th instant, with a column of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, numbering about four thousand men. The first brigade was commanded by Colonel J. O. Davis, Indiana Volunteers; the second by Colonel F. Steele, Eighth Iowa regiment. The object of the movement was to interpose between Price's army on the Osage and the recruits, escort, and supplies on their way south from the Mississippi River. This body of the enemy was represented to be between four and six thousand strong, with a large train of supplies.

I encamped on the 15th eleven miles southwest of Sedalia. That the enemy might be thoroughly misled as to the destination of the expedition, it was given out that the movement was upon Warsaw, and the troops pursued the road to that place several miles beyond Sedalia. I threw forward on Clinton four companies of the First Missouri Cavalry, under Major Hubbard, with orders to watch any movement from Osceola, to prevent any reconnoissance of our main column, and to intercept any messengers to the enemy at Osceola. On the 16th I pushed forward by forced march twenty-seven miles, and with my whole force, occupied at sunset a position between the direct road from Warrensburg to Clinton, and the road by Chilhowee, which latter is the road heretofore pursued by returning soldiers and by recruits. Shortly after sunset, the advance consisting of four companies of Iowa Cavalry, under Major Torrence, captured the enemy's pickets at Chilhowee, and learned that he was encamped in force (about twenty-two hundred) six miles north of that town.

After resting the horses and men for a couple of hours, I threw forward ten companies of cavalry, and a section of artillery, under Lieutenant-Colonel Brown, Seventh Missouri regiment, in pursuit, and followed with my whole force, posting the main body between Warrensburg and Rose Hill, to support the pursuing column. I, at the same time, reinforced Major Hubbard with two companies of Merrill's Horse, and directed him, in order to secure our flank in the pursuit, to push forward as far as possible toward Osceola. This officer executed his duty with distinguished ability and vigor, driving back and capturing the pickets, and one entire company of the enemy's cavalry, with tents, baggage, and wagons. One of the pickets and two wagons were captured within the lines of Rains' division, encamped north of the Osage River.

The column under Lieutenant-Colonel Brown continued the pursuit vigorously all night of the 16th, all day of the 17th, and part of the night of the same day, his advance guard consisting of Foster's company of Ohio Cavalry, and a detachment of thirty men of the Fourth regular cavalry, occupying Johnstown in the course of the night. The enemy began to scatter as soon as the pursuit grew close, disappearing in every direction in the bushes, and by every by-path, driving their wagons into farm-yards remote from the road, and throwing out their loads. As these wagons were all two-horse wagons of the country, and had been in fact taken by force from the farm-houses, it was impossible to identify them. When our pursuit reached Johnstown, about midnight on the 17th, the enemy, reduced to about five hundred, scattered completely, one portion fleeing precipitately toward Butler, and the other toward Papinsville.

The main body of my command moved slowly toward Warrensburg, awaiting the return of the force under Lieut.-Colonel Brown, which proceeded from Johnstown to scour the country south of Grand River to the neighborhood of Clinton. In these operations sixteen wagons, loaded with tents and supplies, and one hundred and fifty prisoners, were captured. The enemy's force was thoroughly dispersed.

On the morning of the 18th Lieut.-Colonel Brown's force rejoined the command. Knowing that there must still be a large force of the enemy north of us, I moved forward slowly, on the 18th, toward Warrensburg, and, when near that town, the spies and scouts I had sent out before marching from Sedalia, in the direction of Lexington, Waverly, and Arrow Rock, reported to me that a large force was moving from the two latter places, and would encamp that night at the mouth of Clear Creek, just south of Milford.

I posted the main body of my command between Warrensburg and Knob Noster, to close all outlet to the south between those two points, and despatched seven companies of cavalry, (five of the Ohio First and two of the Fourth regular cavalry,) afterward reinforced by another company of regular cavalry, and a section of artillery, all under command of Col. J. C. Davis, Indiana Volunteers, to march on the town of Milford, so as to turn the enemy's left and rear, and intercept his retreat to the northeast, at the same time directing Major Marshall, with Merrill's regiment of horse, to march from Warrensburg on the same point, turning the enemy's right and rear, and forming junction with Colonel Davis.

The main body of my command occupied a point four miles south, and ready to advance at a moment's notice, or to intercept the enemy's retreat south. Colonel Davis marched promptly and vigorously with the forces under his command, and at a late hour in the afternoon came upon the enemy encamped in the wooded bottom-land on the west side of Blackwater, opposite the mouth of Clear Creek. His pickets were immediately driven in across the stream, which was deep, miry, and impassable, except by a long, narrow bridge, which the enemy occupied in force, as is believed, under Colonel Magoffin.

Colonel Davis brought forward his force, and directed that the bridge be carried by assault. The two companies of the Fourth regular cavalry being in advance, under the command respectively of Lieutenant Gordon and Lieutenant Amory, were designated for that service, and were supported by the five companies of the First Iowa Cavalry. Lieutenant Gordon of the Fourth cavalry, led the charge in person, with the utmost gallantry and vigor, carried the bridge in fine style, and immediately formed his company on the opposite side. He was promptly followed by the other companies. The force of the enemy posted at the bridge retreated precipitately over a narrow open space, into the woods, where his whole force was posted. The two companies of the Fourth cavalry formed in line at once, advanced upon the enemy, and were received with a volley of small-arms, muskets, rifles, and shot-guns. One man was killed and eight wounded by this discharge. With one exception all belonged to Company D, Fourth cavalry, Lieutenant Gordon.

Lieutenant Gordon himself received several balls through the cap. Our forces still continuing to press forward, and the enemy finding his retreat south and west cut off, and that he was in presence of a large force, and at best could only prolong the contest a short time, surrendered at discretion. His force, reported by colonel commanding, consisted of parts of two regiments of infantry and three companies of cavalry, numbering in all thirteen hundred men, among whom there were three colonels, (Robinson, Alexander, and Magoffin,) one lieutenant-colonel, (Robinson,) one major, (Harris,) and fifty-one commissioned company officers. About five hundred horses and mules, seventy-three wagons heavily loaded with powder, lead, tents, subsistence stores, and supplies of various kinds, fell into our hands, as also a thousand stand of arms.

The whole force captured, with their train, were marched into the camp of the main body, reaching there about midnight. Many arms were thrown away by the enemy, in the bushes and creek, when he surrendered, and have not yet been found.

It was impossible to furnish any accurate account of the number of prisoners, arms, or horses, when I telegraphed, as they surrendered just at dark, and were brought into camp at a late hour of the night. The weather was bitterly cold, and the troops marched as early as possible the next morning for Sedalia and Otterville. As the prisoners and arms were at once sent down to St. Louis, I have not yet had the opportunity of making an accurate count of them. The numbers, as stated, were reported to me by Col. Robinson, their commander, by Col. J. C. Davis, and by Major Torrence, Iowa Cavalry.

The forces under Col. Davis behaved with great gallantry, and the conduct of Col. Davis himself was distinguished.

I desire to present to your special notice Col. J. C. Davis, Indiana Volunteers; Major Hubbard, First Missouri Cavalry; and Lieut. Gordon, Fourth regular cavalry. Both officers and men behaved well throughout.

Within five days the infantry composing this expedition have marched one hundred miles, the cavalry more than double that distance—have swept the whole country of the enemy west of Sedalia, as far as Rose Hill, to a line within fifteen miles of the Osage—have captured nearly fifteen hundred prisoners, twelve hundred stand of arms, nearly one hundred wagons, and a large quantity of supplies.

The march alone would do credit to old soldiers, as it gives me pleasure to state that it has been performed with cheerfulness and alacrity. The troops reoccupied their camps at Sedalia and Otterville just one week after they marched out of them.

A list of our killed and wounded will be transmitted as soon as possible. The enemy's loss is not known, and cannot yet be ascertained; some of his dead were found upon the field.

I am, captain, your obedient servant,
JOHN POPP,
Brigadier-General Commanding.

To Captain J. C. Kelton, A. A.-G.,
Department of the Missouri.

CINCINNATI "COMMERCIAL" ACCOUNT.

SEDALIA, December 20.

We have this morning arrived once more at our prairie camp, after a most glorious and successful campaign—the most glorious in results, and the lightest in casualties, which has thus far signaled our success in arms. We have, in brief, returned after being out six days, with an aggregate of near one thousand six hundred prisoners, including two colonels, Robinson and Alexander; one lieut.-colonel, name unknown; one major, Harris; about twenty captains, and fifty lieutenants. In addition, we have taken near one thousand horses, seventy wagons, one thousand guns and fire-arms, besides large quantities of supplies, flour, bacon, hams, powder, pickles, preserves, clothing, &c. We have, indeed, dealt a heavy blow to the rebel General Price, who stands shivering on the banks of the Osage, fearing to advance, and yet fearing that he may any day have to run. Since that great day, when the deathless Lyon stemmed the torrent of their advancing arms with his little band of patriots, at Wilson's Creek, nothing has so disabled the rebels in Missouri. His despatches captured betray plainly the anxiety he feels concerning the safety of his men. His orders are to the various detachments to join him with all speed. There is, in fact, good reason to believe that had General Pope been allowed to continue his march, and if he had been supplied with another regiment of cavalry, he might have forced Price into an engagement in which he would have been worsted, or sent him back in a hurry to the Arkansas line once more. But it is understood that General Halleck sent him peremptory orders not to advance too near to Osceola, but to capture the outlying recruiting parties and return to this post. This would indicate not that we stand in any fear of Price, but rather that it is the intention of General Halleck to entrap and not to frighten him away.

The account of our expedition may be summed up briefly. The plan was matured between Generals Pope and Halleck; and before the outside world suspected it, the division of Gen. Pope was under orders to move. It consisted as follows:

FIRST BRIGADE, ACTING BRIG.-GEN. STEELS:
—Twenty-seventh reg. Ohio Volunteers, Col. Kennett; Twenty-second reg. Indiana Volunteers, Col. Hendricks; First reg. Kansas Volunteers, Col. Thayer; One battery First Missouri Volunteers, Lieut. Marr; four companies regular cavalry, Col. Armory.

SECOND BRIGADE, ACTING BRIG.-GEN. JEFF. O. DAVIS.—Eighteenth reg. Ind. Volunteers, Col. Patterson; Eighth reg. Ind. Volunteers, Col. Benton; Twenty-fourth reg. Ind. Volunteers, Lieut. —; one battery First Missouri artillery, Lieut. Klaus; one squadron First Iowa Cavalry, Mj. Torrence.

The whole were under the immediate command of General Pope. The four companies of regular cavalry mentioned above must be understood to be only the fragments of the original companies, B, C, D, and E, and number in all, now, but a little over a hundred men. They are all under the command of Captain Crittenden, of the regular army, (son of Hon. John J. Crittenden.)

The command started from Sedalia on Sunday, the 15th, and encamped at night eleven miles distant on the direct road to Clinton. The weather was moderately warm for the season, and the road on the undulating prairies of the finest kind. The men were generally in fine spirits, and from the direction all supposed that we were destined for the stronghold of Price, at Osceola, acting as part of a grand concerted movement from four sides. Such, however, we found was not the case.

The next day, Monday, we made a splendid march, all the men being in good marching order; twenty-six miles brought us at sunset to Shawnee Mound, in Henry County. Here the reports of various companies of rebels began to come in from residents and from our scouts. One company of near five hundred was heard of at a point about twelve miles northwest, and several smaller bodies directly south of us, from Clinton to Butler. Gen. Pope then despatched his whole available force of cavalry, nearly seven hundred, before they had had three hours' rest, after the five hundred near Morristown, while our men cooked a hearty meal, and retired to a sound sleep just on the edge of one of the innumerable little prairies of which this region is composed. The cavalry under Lieut.-Col. Brown, of the Seventh Missouri Volunteers, pushed on all night, and arriving at the rebel camp they found it vacated. The rebels had received warning and had fled precipitately, leaving numerous evidences of their haste. The cavalry, notwithstanding their forty miles' continuous march, pushed on after the fleeing rebels till they reached Rose Hill, picking up some twenty or thirty stragglers on the road, who from exhaustion or sickness had been dropped behind. Broken wagons and jaded horses were left behind, and here and there a tent or barrel was thrown out to lighten their load. At Rose Hill the rebels separated into several squads, as was learned from the inhabitants, some taking the road west, others taking the south road to Butler. The fresh wagon tracks and footprints confirmed the report, and Col. Brown had no other alternative than to rest his exhausted horses, and finally to make his way back to the main column next day, near Warrensburg. He brought in nearly one hundred prisoners.

General Pope in the mean time kept advancing in a direction west of north to Chilhowee, a most important point, being the centre of numerous important cross-roads. This was near the site of the rebel camp just referred to, and here our pickets brought in some few straggling men, who could give no satisfactory account of themselves, but who we were certain were bound for Price's army. At Chilhowee we heard of a rebel force from the north, and of the scouring of the country south of Clinton by Major Hubbard, of the First Missouri Cavalry, which deserves separate mention. The direction of our forces was at once east, toward Warrensburg. Report places their numbers as high as eighteen hundred. That night (Wednesday) we camped two and a half miles west of Warrensburg. The reports were again confirmed and magnified by a loyal man, who was on his way to give us the information. He gave their location as at Kilpatrick's mill, on the Clear fork of Blackwater Creek. (Milford is the post-office name.) Early, therefore, on Thursday morning, more prisoners having made their way into our camp during the previous night, we started in the direction of Knob Noster, being directly south of the enemy. Colonel Merrill's Horse was ordered to take the direct road running parallel with the course of the Blackwater, so as to intercept them in case they took a western course.

The brigade of Colonel Davis was placed in the advance, with orders to keep well up to the cavalry, a section of artillery being ready to support the cavalry upon a minute's warning. General Pope, with the main body, kept due west for Knob Noster, so as to be ready to come up if necessary. Colonel Davis, finding that the enemy was still in camp at Milford, diverged to the left, and put the regular cavalry, under Lieut. Amory, in the advance, the four companies of the First Iowa Cavalry, under Major Torrence, being next. On approaching the mill, our men discovered that the rebels were posted on the opposite side of the bridge, across the mill-dam. Finding it would be dangerous to charge the bridge mounted, Lieut. Amory ordered the men to dismount and skirmish with pistols and sabres, as infantry, the fourth man holding the horses of the other three. This they instantly did, and advanced under the lead of Lieut. Gordon, of Co. D, who bravely led the way. Some ineffectual skirmishing took place between the regulars, who sheltered behind a barn on the south of the creek, and the rebels, who were on the north side. One of the rebels was seen to fall; no one on our side was hit. During this interval the Iowa Cavalry filed off to the left, in the attempt to cross the stream higher up, but after vainly traversing its steep sides and muddy bottom for a mile, returned to find Lieutenant Amory charging across the bridge, the rebels having deserted it upon seeing Colonel Davis, with the artillery, advancing. Lieut. Amory followed the road, thinking that the rebels might flee to the north. Lieut. Gordon, immediately after him, dashed after some of the scattering enemy through the wood, and after penetrating a few rods, received a volley from the enemy, whom he just then discovered formed in line. He formed in line as quickly as thought, and ordered his men to fire from their carbines, which they did, but with what effect is not yet known. One of the party, however, advanced and proposed a surrender, and at this they stood for some minutes.

The cavalry, under Major Torrence, and the regulars, under Lieut. Amory, had in the mean time gotten up in the flank and rear of another body of the enemy, who was thus enclosed on one side by a long marsh, on the other by a deep and muddy mill-pond, and on the third by our cavalry. Colonel Davis had by this time come up in the rear. A white flag was displayed, and Colonel Alexander, a young man, came forward and asked if thirty minutes would be allowed them for consultation. Col. Davis's answer was "that as night was closing in, that was too long." Col. A. then asked if he "would be allowed to go to head-quarters and bring back the answer of the commander of the corps, Col. Robinson." Permission being granted, he returned in about five minutes, with the response that "they would be obliged to surrender as prisoners of war." The rebels then stacked their arms, after a fashion, and were formed in line and marched between two files of our infantry, the Eighteenth and Twenty-fourth Illinois, with all the honors of war. Col. Davis immediately sent despatches to General Pope announcing his success, and as night was upon us the plunder was hastily stowed into wagons, and we commenced the march for camp. The spoils, as nearly as could be learned in the confusion, consisted of one thousand guns, of all kinds, from Enfield to common shot-guns, a few pistols, a few sabres, and a small stock of clothing. In their wagons were found jars of apple butter and fruit cakes, undoubtedly designed as presents from loved ones at home for the chivalrous soldiers in the woods. Hams, pork, flour, corn meal, and harness were also stowed away in their wagons. The result of the firing could not be precisely ascertained, as it was getting dark, and the principal firing occurred in the woods. One of the rebels was killed near the bridge, and it is supposed several were wounded nearer the camp. On our side the casualties were unfortunately greater; the unprecedented gallantry of our men, and the superior position of the rebels giving them a temporary advantage, which was followed by their surrender just when they were at our mercy. Lieutenant Gordon, who led the detachment which did all the fighting and received all of the enemy's fire, deserves especial mention. He is of the true fighting stock, and exhibited the utmost coolness in the face of the foe. He brings as a slight memento of the engagement the marks of a bullet hole on the side of his cap, and a buck shot which struck the top and knocked it three paces to the rear. The fighting did not occupy more than forty minutes. We had one man killed on the spot, an Iowa soldier and volunteer aid to General Davis, name unknown; eight wounded. Their names I have ascertained from Dr. Brodie, the division surgeon, under whose care they have been treated: Privates Graham, Twenty-fifth Illinois Volunteers, wounded in intestines, since died; N. Jubert, Company C, Fourth regiment Cavalry, wounded in knee-joint; G. Collenburth, Company D, Fourth regiment Cavalry, wounded in the nose; T. Tracy, Company D, Fourth regiment Cavalry, wounded in the leg; E. Dillon, Company D, Fourth regiment Cavalry, wounded in the lung; William McGee, Company D, Fourth regiment Cavalry, wounded in the head—dangerous; F. Hyar, Company D, Fourth regiment Cavalry, wounded in the head—dangerous; T. Dormey, Company D, Fourth regiment Cavalry, wounded in the ankle; F. Kinney, Company D, Fourth regiment Cavalry, wounded in the head.

The prisoners are composed in great part of recruits from the counties north of the Missouri River, with a considerable mixture of the old soldiers of Gen. Price. Their appearance is decidedly better than that of the rebels I have seen heretofore. More uniformity in dress and more respectability in person. The last draft of Gen. Price is likely to be less numerous than his first, but far more influential in morale.

Col. Robinson, the senior officer, is a man of middle age, intelligent countenance, resided in Cooper County, and has been with Price from the beginning. Col. Alexander is younger, and looks more like chivalry; he also has been through the struggles of Dry Spring, Wilson's Creek, and Lexington, and tells some interesting stories of the hardships and hair-breadth escapes he has undergone. They are well dressed, that is to say, the material of their clothing is not fine, but the ornamentation is showy and evinces some attention to this important military qualification.

Important despatches were received Thursday evening from Gen. Halleck under an escort. It is reported that some of our messengers have been taken prisoners by the secesh, and it is ordered that we fall back to Sedalia. Gen. Pope, therefore, accompanied with the victors as an escort, and the wounded men, started, and made the journey (twenty miles) by two o'clock. The wounded were at once placed in the hospital, and it is feared one more at least may die.

Following close upon us was the brigade of Col. Hovey, of the Twenty-fourth Indiana, who had been despatched with two regiments, a battery, and two squadrons of the First Missouri Cavalry, who proceeded on the Clinton road some twelve miles from Sedalia, when the cavalry, under Major Hubbard, some two hundred and fifty in number, made a reconnoissance of the country extending westward and southward, as far as the Grand River, beyond Clinton. Here they came upon the pickets of Gen. Rains, who, with an advanced cavalry force, was guarding the Grand River. This was, in fact, the outpost of Price's position. The pickets were driven in, one shot, and about sixty prisoners taken within the lines of Gen. Rains. Three miles beyond Clinton he burned a mill, at which the secessionists were grinding wheat and corn, took about six wagon-loads of feed, and found some mules, branded U. S. The owner of the mill pleaded the most unconscious innocence, but his reputation was undoubted, so the major informed him that he would only burn his mill down. "Oh God!" cried the man, "it cost me five thousand dollars." He was informed that if he heard of any more outrages on Union men, he would return and burn every house in the county belonging to a traitor. This is, among the soldiers and citizens, regarded as not only just, but necessary, to stop the cruelty and murder which have prevailed of late wherever the rebels have the sway.

The detachment of cavalry under Lieut.-Col. Brown also burned a mill near Johnstown, on the border of Bates County. His force have travelled two hundred and fifty miles in six days, and have done an immense service to the country in that time. But the spirit of the men is up, and if their horses would stand it, they would soon clear the whole of Western Missouri of roving bands. This may also apply to the infantry and artillery, for never was there better feeling and more pluck than at this moment. The unexpected and unparalleled success has stimulated them to the highest pitch, and if Gen. Halleck would give the order to-morrow to attack Price in his intrenchments, a cavalry force would be in his rear before he could move. A force of cavalry has been ordered to make a circuit from Warrensburg, and we may expect to hear of more good luck in the way of captures. The prisoners will all be in to-morrow. Gen. Pope says there are over one thousand six hundred in all.

The slavery insurrection has completely turned the heads, as well as hearts, of the traitors in Missouri. Neither the ties of religion, humanity, patriotism, nor neighborhood, have kept their wonted hold. This lunacy has of late taken a very strange and very cruel shape. The Union men are being hunted out by these lawless dare-devils, like wild beasts or noxious reptiles. A remarkable instance of this species of diabolism was related by a very worthy gentleman at head-quarters this morning. It appears that the loyal people of Lexington have been banished from their homes for some weeks. One of the Home Guards, a German, Fettes by name, ventured to revisit his home in Lexington, since the proximity of General Prentiss. A party of rebels discovered him in a house, under a bluff, and seized him. They did not swear him, as some of our good-natured friends may imagine, but as the river was conveniently near, they tied a rock to his neck with a rope, and threw him into the river. The poor martyr, struggling for his life, managed to swim ashore, when these chivalrous sons of Mars threw him over again, and again he regained his foothold; a third time they cast him into the stream, and then left him for dead. Fettes, however, managed to carry the rock until he got into shoal water, and after waiting until his captors had gone, he made his escape, and by the help of friends, is now believed to be on the north side of the river.

From Colonel Hovey, of the Twenty-fourth Indiana, we learn the particulars of a successful ruse, whereby he succeeded in making a capture of six prisoners and two hundred bushels of corn meal, but recently ground for the use of the rebels. He was ordered by Gen. Turner to reconnoitre with about a hundred men on the road to Clinton. He left on Monday morning, taking Fairview and Siseonville on his route. Learning on Tuesday that a party of the enemy was encamped at a mill near Chapel Hill, he adopted a scheme for bagging the whole of them next day.

He ordered his men into the wagons, and had them drawn, with the exception of a small guard, resembling a provision train. As they approached Hall's store the rebels appeared in the brush ready to seize the train. One of his officers rode around a hill to see the whereabouts of the party, when he encountered a mounted rebel, who raised his shot-gun, when he was brought to the ground by the revolver of Capt. ——. Col. Hovey then ordered his men to emerge from their concealment, and a search made for the enemy. One of them was wounded in the fray, and one killed, two balls lodging in his neck. A few horses and mules fell into our possession, some of which were branded U. S. The mill was afterward burned, and the meal loaded up into our wagons. Col. Hovey arrived at Sedalia on Saturday morning, regretting that he had not been allowed to remain a day longer, as other bands are reported in the same vicinity.

The prisoners arrived at the camp near Knob Noster late on Thursday night, and on the next morning a detachment was sent back to Milford to discover, if possible, the wounded of the enemy. Gen. Pope, accompanied by the regular cavalry, engaged in the capture, as an escort returned to Sedalia. Early in the morning the weather, hitherto so favorable, turned to an extremely cold and bitter December blast, sweeping over the prairies with intense keenness. Many of the cavalry men suffered from frozen feet and ears; the insufficiency of the hats to protect them being painfully apparent. If a cap or hood to the overcoat could be introduced into our army, it would be worth all the cost. Later in the day a snow storm came up, as we reached the railroad. The prisoners with the infantry would make an easy march to the edge of the wide prairie intervening between them and Georgetown, and will, consequently, be in on Saturday night.

RECONNOISSANCE NEAR PORT ROYAL.

COMMANDER DRAYTON'S REPORT.

U. S. STEAMER PAWNEE, }
PORT ROYAL, S. C., Dec. 21, 1861. }

Sir: In obedience to your order of the 14th instant, I left this harbor at daylight of the 16th instant, accompanied by the gunboat Seneca, Lieutenant Commanding Daniel Ammen, and coast survey steamer Vixen, Capt. C. O. Boutelle; but at the bar found that the heavy north-easter which was blowing had raised such a sea as to render it out of the question to attempt entering the rivers which I was directed to examine. I therefore returned to my anchorage, which I left a second time, however, on the following morning, and reached the North Edisto at two o'clock. Shortly after, I crossed the bar with the Seneca, piloted in by Capt. Boutelle in the Vixen, which vessel he, however, left when we were inside for the Pawnee, his vessel remaining astern of us.

At this time we could plainly see fortifications ahead on Edisto Island, distant a mile and a half. As it was reported to me they were filled with men, I commenced firing slowly from my bow guns, as did the Seneca; but, receiving no answer, soon ceased and, running by the batteries, anchored in the North Edisto River. On landing I found the fort, which was entirely deserted, to consist of two redoubts for five guns each, connected by a long curtain, and protected in the rear by a double fence of thick plank, with earth between, and loopholed. The guns, as the negroes informed me, had all been removed toward Charleston some weeks back. While I was making this examination Lieutenant Commanding Ammen had proceeded up the river for about five miles, the effect of which was immediately apparent in the firing of cotton-houses and outbuildings.

As during the night some negroes came on board and informed us that at the small town of Rockville, which was in full sight, there was a large encampment of soldiers, at least five hundred, and Capt. Boutelle offering to go up the creek on which it was, I determined to make them a visit in the Vixen, and at daylight of the 17th went on board of that vessel for the purpose, taking with me the boats and marines of the Pawnee and Seneca, under charge of Acting Master Snell. Owing to our running ashore we did not reach the town until near eight o'clock, a little above which was a sloop laden with cotton and provisions, which I took possession of and towed alongside.

There being still no signs of life on shore, I landed with about fifty men to reconnoitre, and was soon satisfied that the troops had left, as the first thing seen was the negroes pillaging a building, in which was a large quantity of commissariat stores, consisting of rice, sugar, bacon, corn, &c. This I stopped at once, and had what remained removed to the Vixen.

Being then informed that the camp, which was a mile from the water, was entirely deserted, I went there; but although, so far as I could learn, the troops had left at daylight, and it was then only a little after eight, the negroes, whom I found as busy as bees, had removed the most valuable part of what had been left, which was nearly every thing, excepting their arms. The encampment was a large one, had been occupied for many months, and its late tenants had evidently been in the possession of every comfort. I removed to the boats forty Sibley and four ordinary tents, besides a quantity of articles of no particular value, which were lying about, and found at a neighboring house, which seemed to have been used as head-quarters, a Confederate flag.

Having pretty well cleared the ground of what was worth removing, and being desirous of examining above, I left at two o'clock, and, proceeding up the river with the Vixen, not liking to trust the Pawnee in so narrow a channel, came on the Seneca, which had started at nine o'clock to explore, fast on a mud bank. We remained by her until nine o'clock, but found it impossible to pull her off, owing to the night tide not being as high as the morning one. While lying here, however, I sent the boats and burnt a sloop which had been run ashore some distance beyond, while attempting to escape from the Seneca, and which could not be got afloat.

The Vixen afterward returned for the night to the neighborhood of the Pawnee, but went back at daylight of the following morning with a party of men and boats from this vessel to lighten the Seneca, which vessel was got off at high tide.

While the Vixen was running up the river she came on a small sloop laden with cotton, from which two white men were taken, whom I now have on board as prisoners. As in the mean time nearly a hundred and fifty negroes, all in a great state of alarm, had collected on board the different vessels, I determined to land them on the point, (and called in the United States steamer Penguin, which was cruising off the port,) and to leave Lieut. Commanding Budd in charge of the river, after my departure, until he could hear from you. Capt. Boutelle was kind enough to go out in the Vixen and pilot the Penguin into her anchorage off the fort, where she now is.

On the morning of the 19th I ran down to the South Edisto, and, leaving the Pawnee and Seneca at the bar, went in with the Vixen. I found the fortifications which are on Edisto Island entirely deserted and partially destroyed. They consisted of two redoubts, which mounted, so far as I could judge, four guns each, but the guns had been removed. The Dale being in sight across Otter Island, in the Ashpoo, I made signal, and Lieut.-Commanding Truxton pulled over with four boats. He reported that every thing was quiet in the neighborhood of his anchorage, and that the fort on Otter Island was rapidly being placed in a state of defence. Up to the present time, although they had been in sight of the South Edisto forts, where we were lying, they had not yet landed there.

Having finished my examination of the South Edisto, I returned to the Pawnee and stood north, with the intention of lying off Stoco for the night; but, as the weather looked threatening, and the Vixen was almost out of coal, I went into the North Edisto again for the night, in order to have an opportunity of supplying her with some. Lieut.-Commanding Budd reported every thing as when I left, but on the following morning negroes came in and stated that the troops who had left the encampment at Rockville, being largely reinforced, showed a disposition to reoccupy that place.

As the weather was too threatening to permit of my making a careful examination of the Stoco, as I intended, I determined now to return at once to this place and report to you the state of affairs at the North Edisto. This I have done, reaching my anchorage here at three o'clock to-day.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
P. DRAYTON,
Flag-officer S. F. DUPONT, Commanding.
Commanding South Atlantic Squadron.

A SECESSION ACCOUNT.

The following appeared in the Charleston Courier:

GARDNER'S CORNER, S. C., December 19, 1861.

About half-past one o'clock yesterday afternoon one of the enemy's gunboats passed by Port Royal ferry. Our batteries opened fire upon her, striking her three times. Upon meeting with this rather hot reception she steamed rapidly past, and ran aground about three miles the other side of the ferry. As soon as our troops became aware of the fix into which the Yankees had got themselves, Lieut. McElhenny, of Capt. Moore's field battery, (from Wilmington, N. C.,) was despatched, with a section of the battery, to a point just opposite to the shoal on which the gunboat was aground. In the mean time three flats, crowded with the enemy's troops, had moved from the opposite shore, under a sharp fire from one of their batteries directed against our troops on the main. At that point our force consisted of Captain West's company of Jones' regiment.

Lieut. McElhenny's battery arrived just as the flats had come out about midway in the stream. He immediately opened fire upon them with tremendous effect. One of the flats was soon sunk, and our fire created terrible havoc among the soldiers on the other two flats, which hastily put back. Night came on and ended the cannonade. The steamer moved off with the flood tide. The enemy's loss among the men on the flats must have been very heavy. Col. Jones' regiment was moved up promptly to the support of McElhenny's battery; but the enemy seem to have abandoned the attempt to cross, if such was ever their intention. Lieut. McElhenny's battery was exposed to an incessant fire from the guns of the steamer during the whole engagement.

ATTACK ON RIPLEY, VA.,

DECEMBER 19, 1861.

The following account is given in the Wheeling Press of December 27:

RIPLEY, JACKSON CO., VA., }
December 20, 1861. }

Colonel D. Front:

It is with pain and regret that I have to inform you that on last night about nine o'clock our town was visited by a band of Moccasin Rangers, and the town completely taken possession of. They numbered about twenty-five, all well armed. A gentleman of the name of Dr. O. G. Chase came here some eighteen or twenty days ago, for the purpose of forming or raising a company. He brought some fifty stand of arms, ammunition, clothing, &c., without any protection whatever. I think he had got his company made up to twenty or upward. He took all the arms from the citizens, rendering them entirely defenceless, and on yesterday morning Mr. Chase locked his arms up in the jail, and his clothing, &c., in a room in H. Proglor's upper house, gathered up his men and went off to Cottageville, saying that he would hold the citizens of Ripley responsible if the arms, &c., were taken out or molested, when at the same time he had rendered the citizens entirely defenceless. Mr. Chase did not even stop (as I understand) at Cottageville, but left his men there and went on himself to Mason County.

The Moccasins took all the arms, clothing, &c., rifled the post-office, robbed my store of considerable, and then put off, with their booty. It has caused great excitement. They did not injure the person of any one. They got about ten muskets, five rifles, twenty suits of clothing, shoes, &c.

The people condemn the action of Mr. Chase, and in fact there is something very mysterious about the matter. Chase had old John Stal-maker arrested a few days ago, who is known to be one of the hardest cases in Brown County. He took him along with him yesterday, saying that he would send him on to Wheeling; but instead of so doing he took him as far as Cottageville and there released him, which is by no means approved by the citizens.

Can there be no arrangement made by which we can get say two hundred troops stationed here during the winter? Provisions can be obtained here as cheap as at any other point. We will either have to have a sufficient force here to protect the place, or else have no force at all. I think the action of Mr. Chase should be examined into. Yours, in haste,

J. L. ARMSTRONG.

In corroboration of the above is the following from the postmaster of Ripley.

JACKSON C. H., Va., December 21, 1861.

Colonel D. Frost:

Sir: On the night of the 19th the Moccasin Rangers came into Ripley and took all the United States arms and ammunition that Dr. Chase had here recruiting for the Tenth regiment, (J. Bolieve's,) robbed the post-office of all its contents and all my clothing but what I had on my back, and a box of clothing for the soldiers, and took from J. L. Armstrong's store a considerable amount. I wish you would see if we could have a force to protect us here; if we can't we will have to let all go in this county, and all Union men will have to leave. The Rangers have all been driven in here from Calhoun, Gilmer, Wirt, and Roane, on to the head of the right-hand fork of Sandy Big Run and the left-hand fork of Mill Creek. When they came into town Dr. Chase took his men and went to Cottageville, and the arms he left he locked up in the jail. They took an axe and picked the lock and took them. Chase had gathered up all the arms in the country of different persons. There was but one or two guns in the place, and one of them I had with me. We are in a bad way here.

Yours, respectfully,

JOHN H. WETZEL.

ENGAGEMENT AT DRANESVILLE, VA.

INSTRUCTIONS TO GENERAL ORD.

HEAD-QUARTERS McCALL'S DIVISION, }
CAMP PIERPONT, VA., Dec. 19, 1861. }

GENERAL: You will please move in command of your brigade, at six A. M. to-morrow, on the Leesburg pike, in the direction of Dranesville. The First Rifles, Pennsylvania reserve, Lieutenant-Colonel Kane, have been ordered to form, right in front, on the pike near Commodore Jones's house, and await your arrival, when the commanding officer will report to you for further orders. Captain Euston's battery has been directed to form on the left of the Rifles. The captain will report to you for orders.

Two squadrons of cavalry will also be placed under your command. The senior officer will report to you this evening for orders. Sherman, the guide, will likewise report to you for duty. The object of this expedition is twofold. In the first place, to drive back the enemy's pickets, which have recently advanced within four or five miles of our lines, (leaving a force of about seventy cavalry at Henderson's,) and carried off two good Union men and threatened others; and secondly, to procure a supply of forage. It has to-day been reported to me that there is a force of about one hundred cavalry lying between Dranesville and the river. This force might be captured or routed by sending a regiment of infantry up the pike beyond their position, to strike their rear by a flank movement to the right, while your disposable cavalry (after picketing the cross-roads near Dickey's) might move near the river and attack them in front on the left. Should you not arrive at Dickey's in time to make this movement and leave the ground on your return before nightfall, it must not be undertaken, as I do not wish any part of your command to remain out overnight. The forage will be procured at Gunnell's, or at some other rank secessionist's in the neighborhood of Dickey's. Direct your quartermaster to confine the selection of forage to corn and hay. Captain Hall will have charge of the wagon train. The regiment intended to move forward from Dickey's (if you think proper, Jackson's) might ride in the wagons as far as Dickey's, and there be fresh for the forward movement.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. A. McCALL,

Brigadier-General, commanding Division.

Brigadier-General O. C. ORD,

Commanding Third Brigade.

GENERAL ORD'S REPORT.

CAMP PIERPONT, VA., December 21, 1861.

SIR: I have to report that, in obedience to the enclosed order I, at six A. M. yesterday, started toward Dickey's and Henderson's, about three miles this side of Dranesville, on the Leesburg pike, with my brigade, the First Rifles, Lieutenant-Colonel Kane, Easton's battery, and two squadrons of cavalry. I likewise heard that it was probable there was a respectable picket of cavalry in Dranesville, and that the pickets supposed by you to be near the river, behind Dickey's, had left. I then determined to send three companies of the Tenth and twenty cavalry with the foraging party to Gunnell's, between the pike and the river, and with the remainder of the force proceed to Dranesville, satisfied that, though I might be exceeding the letter of my instructions, should I find the enemy and pick up a few, you would not object. This I did, though Colonel McCalmont, hearing that there was a large force on our left, remained with his part of a regiment, and that detained the two regiments behind him, (I had sent for them;) but was obliged to enter Dranesville with my artillery and cavalry, and a small advanced guard only on the road, the First Rifles and Colonel Jackson's regiment flanking this column in the woods on the right and left. The cavalry picket in town fled, scattered, and remained in small squads, watching.

While waiting in Dranesville for the regiments in the rear to come up, I posted my artillery and cavalry and Jackson's regiment of infantry and a couple of companies of the First Rifles, so as to cover the approaches, and sent for Colonel Kane's regiment to occupy the road in our then rear, my front being toward Centreville. This I did because, from the occasional appearance of a few mounted men on a slope behind some woods in a hollow to my left and front, and a broad mass of smoke in that neighborhood, I felt pretty sure that there was a force there preparing some mischief. As soon as Colonel McCalmont came up with his regiment, the Tenth, followed by Lieutenant-Colonel Penrose, the Sixth, and Colonel Taggart with the Twelfth, and while preparing to resist any attack and to cover my foraging party, I learned that the enemy, in force, had approached on the south side of the Leesburg pike, with field-pieces and infantry, and had driven in my pickets, wounding two men. Thinking they would attack on both sides of the turnpike as I returned eastward, I ordered (to meet this expected attack) Colonel McCalmont's regiment on the left or river side of the road in the woods, left in front, and if the enemy showed himself on that side, to bring his regiment forward into line. Colonel Jackson's regiment, of which and its gallant colonel I cannot speak in too high terms, I ordered to flank the road in the same way on the right of the road in the woods, and do the same if the enemy showed on that side. Between these flanking regiments I ordered the Kane Rifles to meet the enemy (behind us) in the road, the cavalry to follow, and the artillery I took with me to post them and answer the enemy's artillery, which had opened fire on our (their) right, (the south;) directing the rear guard to cover the column of the Sixth and Twelfth regiments infantry in the road from cavalry. The artillery went at a run past the station I selected for them, capsizing one of their pieces. I brought them back, told the captain where to post his guns, and then went to remove the cavalry, then exposed in the road swept by the enemy, (whose attack was from a thickly wooded hill on our right flank, the south.) Their force, I saw, was a very bold one, very well posted, and the artillery was only about five hundred yards off, with a large force of infantry on both its flanks and in front, covered and surrounded by woods and thickets. Moving east with the cavalry, which was of no use here, I came to a place in the road, covered toward the enemy by a high bluff and dense thickets, which thickets I intended to occupy with infantry. Here I left the cavalry surrounded by dense forests, wherein they could neither fight nor be hurt. The accompanying sketch will show the ground.

As I had at first thought the enemy would attack on both sides of the road, and moved my infantry to meet such an attack, and as their attack was confined to the right, it became necessary to change my front. As neither McCalmont nor Jackson had had time to come into line under first orders, when I discovered this, and was moving by the flank, and as, before I placed the artillery and cavalry, I had seen the rifles closely engaging the enemy by a flank movement, covering themselves by some houses and fences, my right in meeting the attack thus became the village of Dranesville, my left the gorge and woods occupied by my cavalry on the Leesburg pike. After securing the cavalry, I found, by carefully observing the enemy's fire and battery, that their guns were in a road which could be enfiladed. I ordered Captain Easton to right the capsized gun and bring it to the spot from which this road could be raked; removed two other guns to this spot, gave the gunners the distance and elevation, observed the result, and finding, after a round or two, that the enemy's fire slackened and the gunners were raking the road beautifully, without being discomposed by the enemy's fire, I told them "to keep at that," and determined to push the infantry forward. I found them (except the Kane Rifles, the Ninth, Jackson's, and the Tenth, the McCalmont regiment, which were as above stated) in the ditches, under fences, and covering themselves as best they might. I started them forward, Kane at the head of his regiment leading. His and Jackson's regiments required no urging. McCalmont's regiment was kept in excellent order by its colonel, (than whom a better officer is not found in my brigade,) and acted as a reserve. I put them in the woods—pushed and exhorted them up the hill, having directed the battery to cease firing, and proceeding with my infantry with the bayonet. About this time, between three and four o'clock, (the action began at half-past two,) General

McCall, I was informed, arrived on the field. As I was very busy urging the men forward, and they required all my attention to keep them to their work, I did not at once report; but when we reached the ground occupied by the enemy's battery, I reported to him. He was so kind as to direct me to continue the pursuit in the same order, and to continue my dispositions, which I did. The enemy were pursued fully half a mile further, but they had left the neighborhood in great haste, leaving their arms, a portion of their dead and wounded, clothing, ten horses, and a quantity of artillery equipments, with two caissons and a limber, scattered along the road towards Centreville, and in the woods on both sides. I beg to mention the coolness and courage of my aids: Captain Painslee, assistant quartermaster; First Lieutenant S. B. Smith, Tenth Regiment Pennsylvania reserve corps; First Lieutenant S. S. Seward, New York Artillery, and Second Lieutenant A. B. Sharpe. They not only carried orders promptly, but in instances requiring it, exacted obedience. They deserve a more exalted rank than they now hold. The medical officers, especially the brigade surgeon, Dr. Lowman, were prompt and cool, leaving none unattended.

The enemy left twenty-one of their most desperately wounded on the field, who were taken up, carried to houses, and their wounds dressed by our surgeons, but they will nearly all die. Their dead left on the field is variously estimated from fifty to seventy-five. Our artillery did terrible havoc, exploding one ammunition wagon, and some of their men whom we brought in say the slaughter was terrible. Several dead lay around the exploded caisson, three of whose blackened corpses were headless. The prisoners further state that Colonel Taylor was doubtless killed; two of their officers were left on the ground, and how many were carried off it is difficult to say. After the affair, we built our bivouac fires in Dranesville. Thus, sir, we, on returning to camp, had marched twenty-four miles, beaten the enemy, loaded our wagons with forage, bringing in twelve mules, our killed, (seven) and wounded, (sixty) among whom are four captains. Some of our wounded had to be brought the whole distance on stretchers, while I am informed the Pennsylvania ambulances for this division are lying empty at Washington. Lists of killed and wounded, and reports of regimental commanders, are herewith enclosed. It is impossible to remember all who were conspicuous, especially as the fighting occurred in thickets, and was scattered over so much ground. Captain Easton was very efficient, and his battery well served. The wounded officers, Lieutenant-Colonel Kane, and Capt. Niles, of the Kane Rifles; Captain Bradbury, of the Sixth, and Captains Dick and Galway, of the Ninth Pennsylvania reserve volunteer corps, were conspicuous, leading their men when wounded. Others there were, as you can well imagine, equally brave, but it would be invidious to attempt to select them.

The prisoners report that the brigade engaged against us was composed of the Kentucky Rifles, an Alabama, a South Carolina, and a Virginia regiment, with a six-gun battery, all under the command of General Stuart.

I must not forget the prompt manner in which General Reynolds came up from Difficult Creek, some four miles off, as soon as he heard the cannonading. He arrived too late, it is true, to take part in the affair, but the certainty that he would come with his brigade, insured a victory, and stimulated our men to earn it.

With respect, sir, your obedient servant,
E. O. C. ORD,
Brigadier General Volunteers.

Col. H. J. BIDDLE,
Assistant Adjutant General, McCall's Division.

COL. JACKSON'S REPORT.

HEAD-QUARTERS NINTH REGIMENT P. R. C.

SIR: In accordance with your order of this date, to make out an official report of the conduct of my command in the engagement at Dranesville, I would respectfully state that, in obedience to orders, I marched my regiment into the wood or copse, formed in line of battle, and advanced as directed, with difficulty restraining the men from "double quick." As there was nothing to indicate the position of friend or foe, I advanced until we saw and heard the movement of troops in advance of the right of our line. I halted, and found my right within sixty or seventy paces of the left of the troops referred to; my men showed a great anxiety to fire. At this time, an officer of my regiment reported that the troops opposite were the "Bucktails;" determined to avoid falling into the fatal error of killing our own men, I at once used all my energy to prevent firing, nor did we fire until after we had received a volley from the enemy, as they proved to be. We received their first fire as Captain Galway was in the act of reporting that he had obtained a view of them, and assured me in the most emphatic manner they were rebels. The order to fire was then given and promptly obeyed; but I found there still existed a doubt on the part of the men as to the true character of the troops we were engaged with, which caused considerable confusion in the ranks, which was overcome, to a great extent, with some difficulty. I feel perfectly convinced, had the men been assured at the onset that the troops before us were rebels, we might have driven them from their position before they could have fired on us, as we could hear them distinctly load their pieces.

I afterwards learned that the impression that the "Bucktails" were forming in front was strengthened by the following occurrence: One of the enemy called out, "don't fire on us;" one of our men imprudently asked, "are you 'Bucktails'?"—the answer was, "yes, we are the 'Bucktails;' don't fire."

I enclose surgeon's report of killed and wounded.

Your obedient servant,
C. FEGER JACKSON,
Colonel Commanding Ninth Regiment P. R. C.
General E. O. C. ORD.

COL. KANE'S REPORT.

HEAD-QUARTERS KANE'S RIFLE REGIMENT, 1ST P. R. C., }
CAMP PIKEPOINT, December 21, 1861. }

GENERAL: Acknowledging the honor of your orders of December 21, I think I may limit my report to an explanation of my conduct at the commencement of the action, before your own welcome appearance upon the scene to push on the fight and inspire and direct the brave by your personal example and exertions.

We were not quite through with scouring the woods south of Creppins, under your first orders, when your aide-de-camp brought the order to return to Dranesville. A party who sought me privately in the absence of the guide, Mr. Harra, had informed me of suspicious circumstances which I desired to report to you. I, therefore, marched to Dranesville very rapidly. It was from the first high ground north of the turnpike forks that I first saw men in motion south and southeast of the village, where there seemed to be no reason to look for the presence of our own forces. Soon after a Confederate flag was displayed, and as we opened in sight a few shots were fired. Others of the enemy also, at the same time, appeared in view from the edge of the woods on our extreme left. Being, fortunately, familiar with the ground, I saw at once the importance of occupying the hill on which the brick house stands, which was occupied in October as the headquarters of General McCall, and reaching it before the enemy. My men obeying the double quick with spirit, were formed there in line of battle by the time the enemy's guns opened from the road. As soon as I conveniently could, I sent my adjutant to you and our brave commander. I believe, sir, you were both good enough to approve of my course in taking this position. The enemy's opinion of its value was shown by the effort to turn it afterward. You saw the rest. The Bucktails will not forget you.

Of my own officers and the men I love, I am too proud to say more than that they all, without an exception, did their duty. But it is my place to mention the courage of Captain Ent during the brief period when you were good enough to place the Sixth under my command. I cannot consider it out of place either for me to bear my own testimony to the admirable conduct of Captain Easton and the brave artillerymen with him, who served the guns of battery A from the regiment of the gallant Charles J. Campbell.

I enclose a copy of the report of Dr. S. D. Freeman, regimental surgeon, showing a list of three killed and twenty-seven wounded. I trust the life of Captain Niles will be spared to his friends and his country. He led the flankers on the left yesterday, and though his tall figure made him a conspicuous mark for the enemy's rifles, he did not cease exposing himself to cheer on his men until he fell. This was but a little before the enemy retired.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
THOMAS L. KANE.

COL. McCALMONT'S REPORT.

HEAD-QUARTERS TENTH REGIMENT PA. RESERVE, }
THIRD BRIGADE, McCALL'S DIVISION. }
CAMP PIERPONT, December 21, 1861. }

SIR: I have the honor to report the part that the Tenth took in the engagement of Dranesville yesterday.

Two of my companies were on outer picket, and ordered to remain; three were detailed to cover and furnish fatigue party for the division quartermaster, under the command of Lieut.-Col. Kirk. A platoon of skirmishers remained, by mistake, with the foraging party. With the remaining four companies I marched, in advance of the Sixth and Twelfth, to Dranesville, where we had been preceded by the advance of the brigade. At Dranesville, after a short halt, we received orders to return, as the object of the reconnoissance was accomplished. Immediately thereafter, the General of brigade informed us that the pickets of the Ninth had been driven in on our right. At the same time there was firing on the left of the line. The General, having moved the battery to the left, ordered me to flank the column and take position on the left of the battery under cover. In marching, we passed through the field directly in rear of our battery, which had commenced unlimbering, under a smart and direct fire from the enemy's guns. We took our position near the battery, in a growth of cedars, on its left.

Being so posted, under orders from the General, I detached Captain McConnell, with his platoon as skirmishers, to approach the cannoners of the enemy, and see if the enemy was endeavoring to turn our left. I believe this order was, in all respects, coolly, gallantly, and effectively obeyed. I enclose herewith the Captain's report. He soon sent me word that the enemy had broke, under the fire of artillery and musketry on the right, mostly in a southerly direction. The affair was soon over.

The General then gave me orders to flank and support the "Bucktails" and Twelfth, which were in pursuit. Whilst doing so, we observed some of the enemy's wounded, whom I directed the attendants to remove to the brick house close by. A number of the enemy's rifles, muskets, caps, overcoats, &c., were picked up by the hospital attendants and servants.

After this, we were ordered to take position south of Dranesville. It was reported to me by an officer of the Ninth, that they had observed from the hill where they were posted after their gallant conflict, a white flag south of us at a house. Major Allen led a small party to ascertain, but found none but female inmates, one of whom had appeared with a white head-dress, which occasioned the mistake.

Our skirmishers observed wagon, and horse, and foot tracks through the fields leading south of Dranesville, and all the by-roads, of which there are quite a number in that vicinity. They reported that one horse had leaped quite a high fence, but I did not inquire in which direction, as such incidents merely afford the men amusement after the fatigue of the day.

We were recalled to take our position in line preparatory to marching back to camp.

Under circumstances new to nearly if not quite all of this regiment it behaved well, and I believed obeyed with spirit every order.

I have occasion to be thankful that I have the honor to report none killed, wounded, or missing. The men doubtless wished to seal their devotion to the Union, and their confidence in their generals, with their wounds. If the rebellion continues, they will likely have other opportunities.

I have the honor to be, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN S. MCCALMONT,
Colonel, Commanding Regiment.

Lieut. S. B. SMITH,
Acting Asst. Adjutant-General,
Head-quarters Third Brigade McCall's Division.

COL. TAGGART'S REPORT.

HEAD-QUARTERS TWELFTH REGIMENT,
THIRD BRIGADE, MCCALL'S DIVISION, P. R. C. }
CAMP PIERPONT, December 21, 1861.

GENERAL: Pursuant to orders from brigade head-quarters, the regiment under my command, numbering five hundred and seventy-five officers and men, marched out upon the Dranesville pike yesterday morning between six and seven o'clock, took position on the left of the brigade, and advanced toward Dranesville.

Nothing of special importance occurred until about one mile west of Difficult Creek, when the scouting parties reported that a considerable force of the enemy, numbering about four regiments, were drawn up on a field about one mile to the left of our line, apparently watching our movements. I immediately halted my regiment upon receiving this information, and formed line of battle, facing the enemy; but as they showed no disposition to engage, after waiting some time, the regiment was again put in march toward Dranesville.

On approaching the village, our flanking parties were driven in by a large force of the enemy, who were posted in the woods, a dense thicket of pines on our left. Our scouts reported that they had been fired on by troops concealed in the woods. The fire was returned, when the enemy, in large numbers, showed themselves, and pursued our scouts for some distance toward the left of my regiment, which was instantly halted and formed into line, to receive the attack, on the turnpike road. My right rested on the hill leading into Dranesville, and the left opposite a brick house on the left of the pike, and behind which the enemy appeared to be in force. At this juncture Adjutant S. B. Smith was despatched to you on the right of the brigade, informing you of the state of affairs. Your immediate presence at the scene of attack, and the timely support of the other regiments of the brigade, the Kane rifle regiment, the cavalry force, and Easton's battery, are facts which came under your own notice, and therefore need no further mention from me. Before the regiments had got fairly into position, the enemy opened with a heavy fire of shot and shell, which fell thick and fast in the vicinity of the left of my regiment. The shells at first exploded in our rear, tearing up the ground, and splinter-ing the fences in every direction, but fortunately did no damage to the men under my command. After firing about fifteen minutes, the enemy succeeded in getting a better range, and the shells burst over our heads, but without injury, the men on the left, the most exposed portion of the regiment, being ordered to lie flat on the ground. Easton's battery now opened upon the enemy from our left with such effect that the firing from the enemy ceased for a time, and we were relieved from the most annoying situation in which a soldier can be placed—that of receiving a fire from the enemy without returning it, which we could not do, as the enemy were entirely hidden from view. The conduct of the men during the time they were under fire, nearly all of them for the first time, was most commendable. There was no flinching, and the line was preserved unbroken.

At this time, by your orders, I dismounted, leaving my horse in the road, and on foot conducted the charge of my regiment into the dense woods opposite the right wing, for the purpose of capturing the enemy's battery. We advanced into the woods as rapidly as the nature of the ground and the dense growth of timber would permit, without finding the enemy. We then advanced with a full battalion front to the left, where a heavy firing of musketry was going on. Before we emerged from the woods the firing ceased. We soon gained an open field, in the direction of the enemy, where we halted and awaited orders, which were received from you, to charge into a wood in our front and take the enemy's battery, which was believed to be only a short distance from us. This order was instantly obeyed, and the Twelfth regiment dashed into the woods. We scoured the thickets in every direction without finding the battery, but discovered dead bodies of the rebel troops lying in every direction, besides a number of wounded, who were properly taken care of, and sent to the rear.

We continued the pursuit for a considerable distance without meeting the enemy, but on every side there were evidences of a precipitate flight, arms, ammunition, clothing, and provisions being strewed around in every direction. By your orders we were recalled, and returned by way of a road we had crossed before charging into the woods. Here we discovered the location of the enemy's battery by the piles of cannon balls, shells, and munitions of war. Here was one gun-carriage destroyed by the pioneers of my regiment, which was found damaged from the effects of our shot and shell.

The conduct of the officers and men under the difficult circumstances in which they were placed, in searching a dense forest for a hidden foe, was eminently satisfactory. I desire to mention particularly the services rendered by Quartermaster E. D. Reed, who acted as my adjutant on the occasion. None of the field-officers were on duty except myself, and but three captains out of nine. Notwithstanding these disadvantages, the subaltern officers and the men conducted themselves with spirit and bravery, and obeyed with alacrity the orders given them.

I am gratified to have only one casualty to report. Private William R. Fox, of company K, was shot in the right thigh during the first part of our advance into the woods. The wound is not serious. He made a narrow escape. A portemonnaie in his pocket was bored through, and a $2 50 gold piece in it was bent nearly double.

I have the honor to be, general, your obedient servant,

JOHN H. TAGGART,
Col. Commanding Twelfth Reg't P. R. C.
Brigadier General E. O. C. Ord,
Comdg. Third Brigade McCall's Div. P. R. C.

LIEUT. PENROSE'S REPORT.

HEAD-QUARTERS SIXTH REG'T INFANTRY, PA. R. V. C., }
CAMP PIERPONT, Dec. 21, 1861. }

SIR: I herewith transmit you a list of the killed and wounded of my command at the battle of Dranesville yesterday, December 20.

The conduct of the troops under my command was all that could be desired, officers and men generally behaving with great coolness and bravery. I would particularly mention as deserving of much praise Lieutenant Bonnavitz, of Company K, and Adjutant McKean, for their gallant and soldierly bearing; also Surgeon Bowers, who was in the first fire of the enemy, and provided efficient means for bringing in the wounded not only of our men, but other regiments, and rendering them timely assistance.

Very respectfully,

W. M. PENROSE,
Lieutenant-Colonel.
Brigadier-General E. O. C. Ord.

CAPTAIN EASTON'S REPORT.

CAMP PIERPONT, December 21, 1861.

GENERAL: I have the honor to report that, in obedience to orders from Brigadier-General McCall, commanding this division, I reported to you on the morning of the 20th of this month, at six o'clock A. M., and from thence proceeded with my battery, Company A, First Pennsylvania Artillery, in connection with your brigade, to a point on the Leesburgh Turnpike, near Dranesville. No appearance of the enemy was visible until we reached Thornton's house, near the junction of the Alexandria and Leesburgh Turnpike, when a heavy fire of artillery and musketry was suddenly opened from a thick woods on our left, the enemy evidently lying in large force in ambush, while their artillery was posted on the Centreville road leading through the woods, and coming into the Alexandria turnpike between Thornton's and Coleman's houses. My guns were immediately put into battery and opened fire. Having nothing to indicate the position of the enemy but the smoke of their guns, I opened a brisk discharge of shells into the woods occupied by the enemy, which was kept up until your order to cease firing. The examination of the ground afterwards showed the successful and destructive effects of our artillery fire. The rebel battery, in my opinion, was unmanned by our third fire. They succeeded in drawing off their guns, but I captured one caisson and one limber, and one other was exploded, and the horses fatally injured. The woods in which the enemy were concealed was found thickly strewn with dead and wounded. The mangled bodies of the dead showed the terrible execution of our fire. Besides the ordnance captured, a large quantity of clothing, blankets, knapsacks, haversacks, &c., was found, which the enemy had cast off in their hasty and thorough rout.

I have the satisfaction to state that, although the injury and loss of the enemy was so severe, in my battery there was not a man or horse lost, and no injury done my guns. Our only casualty was the slight wounding of one of my men, Charles Osborn, who was struck on the knee by a spent ball, which slightly lamed him.

I have only to add that I was firmly supported by a detachment of the Tenth regiment, Colonel McCalmont, and that my whole company, officers, non-commissioned officers, and men, acted with skill, and energy, and courage worthy the highest praise.

Respectfully submitted.

H. EASTON,
Captain Commanding Battery A,
First Regiment Penn. Art.
Brigadier-General E. O. C. Ord,
Third Brigade P. R. C.

HEAD-QUARTERS FIRST PA. R. CAVALRY, }
CAMP PIERPONT, Dec. 21, 1861. }

SIR: I have the honor to report that the only loss sustained by the cavalry was one horse, which was struck by a shell immediately after passing the enemy's battery.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JACOB HIGGINS,
Lieut.-Col. Com. Detachment First Pa. R. C.
Brigadier-General Ord.

GEN. McCALL'S REPORT.

HEAD-QUARTERS McCALL'S DIVISION, }
CAMP PIERPONT, Dec. 22, 1861. }

GENERAL: I have the honor to present, for the information of the general-in-chief, a more detailed account of the affair at Dranesville on the 20th instant, together with reports of Brigadier-General E. O. C. Ord, commanding third brigade of my division, and the commanders of the Sixth infantry, Lieutenant-Colonel W. B. Penrose; of the Ninth infantry, Colonel C. F. Jackson; of the Tenth infantry, Colonel J. S. McCalmont; of the Twelfth infantry, Colonel J. H. Taggart; of the First rifles, Lieut. Colonel T. L. Kane; of two squadrons of the First cavalry, Lieut.-Colonel J. Higgins; and Easton's battery, Captain H. Easton, Pennsylvania Reserve.

On the evening of the 19th, having learned that the enemy's pickets had advanced to within four or five miles of our lines, and carried off two good Union men, and plundered and threatened others, and that their reserve was in the neighborhood, at Dranesville, I gave written instructions (a copy of which is marked A) to Brigadier-General Ord to move with his brigade at six A. M. on the 20th to surround and capture this party, and at the same time to collect a supply of forage from the farms of some of the rank secessionists in that vicinity. Brigadier-General J. F. Reynolds, with the First brigade, was directed to move on to Difficult Creek, to be ready to support Ord in the event of his meeting a force stronger than his own.

At half-past ten A. M. on the 20th I received a despatch from General Ord, written on the march, informing me that the guide had learned on the way that there was a full brigade, but without artillery, at Herndon's Station, five hundred infantry and cavalry at Hunter's Mill, and two hundred infantry between Dranesville and the Potomac. I immediately mounted my horse, and, with my staff and an escort of cavalry, moved rapidly forward to overtake, if possible, Ord's brigade. I stopped for a few moments with Brigadier-General Reynolds at Difficult Creek, and, having directed him to be in readiness to move forward rapidly in case he should be required to support Ord, I rode on.

When within about two miles of Dranesville I heard the first gun fired by the enemy. It was soon answered by Easton's battery, which imparted to me the fact that the enemy had artillery with them. A rapid ride soon brought me to the field, where Ord was hotly engaged. I found Easton's battery judiciously placed and in full blast upon the enemy's battery about five hundred yards in front, on the Centreville road. Here I stopped to observe the practice of our battery, while one of my staff rode off to ascertain where General Ord was.

While here, admiring the beautiful accuracy of the shot and shell thrown by this battery upon the battery of the enemy, a force of infantry and cavalry made their appearance from cover on the enemy's right, moving in a direction to turn our left. Col. McCalmont, whose regiment was on the left, was notified of this movement; but a few shells from our battery, skillfully thrown into their midst, checked their advance, and drove them back ignominiously to cover.

Not hearing any thing of General Ord I set out in search of him on our right, where brisk firing was at the time going on. Here was the Ninth infantry, Colonel Jackson, who had gallantly met the enemy at close quarters, and nobly sustained the credit of his State. By this time Captain Sheers, of my staff, reported that he had found General Ord near the centre front. Proceeding there, I found the rifles and a part of the Sixth Infantry Pennsylvania reserve engaged under a brisk fire with the enemy. Having met General Ord, we moved forward, and the position where the enemy's battery had been placed was soon gained, and here we had evidence of the fine artillery practice of Easton's battery. The road was strewn with men and horses; two caissons, one of them blown up; a limber, a gun-carriage wheel, a quantity of artillery ammunition, small-arms, and an immense quantity of heavy clothing, blankets, &c.

The battle was now over, and the victory won. With my consent General Ord made an advance of about one-half mile, but nothing further was to be done, as the enemy, in full flight, had passed beyond our reach. I then recalled Ord and prepared for the return of my command. I ordered the harness to be taken off the enemy's horses which lay dead in the road, and to be put upon horses of my escort, and brought away the perfect caisson and the limber.

Early in the day, not knowing what force might be thrown forward from Centreville to support the troops we had encountered, I had called forward Brigadier-General Reynolds, First brigade, and Brigadier-General Meade, Second brigade, from Camp Pierpont, to the support of the Third brigade. Both these distinguished officers promptly brought forward their commands, and I only regretted that the fine disposition of the regiments and battery of Ord's command, together with the gallantry of Colonels Jackson, McCalmont, and Taggart, and Lieutenant-Colonels Kane, Higgins, and Penrose, and Captain Easton, had left nothing for Reynolds and Meade to do. The rout of the enemy was complete. But as I did not consider it justifiable to bivouac at Dranesville when my ammunition was much exhausted, and the enemy might easily throw ten or twenty thousand men between me and my camp during the night, I ordered every arrangement to be promptly made for the return march. Some time was required to prepare our wounded, (sixty officers and men,) to be transported to camp, and it was very nearly dark before I got the column in motion. Our killed and wounded, as well as so many of the rebel wounded as could be moved, were brought away.

The troops we had engaged and defeated were the First Kentucky regiment, Col. Tom Taylor, about eight hundred strong on the field; the Tenth Alabama, Colonel Forney, nine hundred strong; a South Carolina regiment, whose colonel was not known to the prisoners in our possession, who informed me that no intercourse between different regiments was ever allowed, and a Virginia regiment. The Kentucky prisoners informed me they believed a fifth regiment was present, as two or three regiments had left Centreville at three A. M., and they, the Kentucky and Alabama regiments, together with Captain Cutts' Georgia battery, and Stuart's Virginia regiment of cavalry, left at five A. M. The whole were under command of Brigadier-General Stuart.

General Ord reports as worthy of notice his personal staff, and also Colonels McCalmont and Jackson, Lieut.-Colonel Kane, Captain Easton, First Pennsylvania artillery; Captain Niles,

First rifles; Captain Bradbury, Sixth infantry P. R.; Captains Dick and Galway, Ninth infantry, P. R.

The number of killed found in front of the position occupied by the Ninth infantry, Col. Jackson, is, in my estimation, proof enough of the gallantry and discipline of that fine regiment; but where all behaved nobly it is difficult to discriminate. I must, however, call your attention more particularly to Brigadier-General E. O. C. Ord, commanding Third brigade, for whose able disposition of his regiments and battery, and personal exertions to encourage and urge on his men, too much credit cannot be accorded him.

To Captain H. J. Biddle, assistant adjutant-general of my staff; Lieutenant H. A. Sheets, aide-de-camp; Captain Clow, brigade commissary, acting aide-de-camp, and Lieutenant E. Beatty, ordnance officer, acting aide-de-camp, my thanks are due for their gallantry in carrying orders under fire, and for encouraging and urging on the men; and also to Captain Chandler Hall, brigade-quartermaster, who was energetically employed in collecting forage.

It is proper to mention that, deeming it necessary to leave one of my staff at headquarters to superintend the telegraph, and to order forward the reserve, viz: the Second brigade and three squadrons of cavalry, if required, the lot fell upon my aide-de-camp, Lieutenant Elbridge Maconkey, who discharged the responsible duty entirely to my satisfaction.

Seven prisoners were taken, whose names, &c., are as follows: Corporal Ferris E. Long, and privates Wm. Nelson and Patrick Hughes, of the First Kentucky regiment, and privates Robert R. Moss, Ira Chauncey, William Morris, and J. Williamson, of the Tenth Alabama regiment.

The want of ambulances was felt on this occasion, and I would respectfully suggest that a few more be ordered to each regiment of my division, as I was unable, for want of transport, to bring from the field all the wounded prisoners taken in the affair. Those left I had placed in comfortable quarters in Dranesville, where they can be well attended to; but owing to this deficiency of transportation for the wounded, I was compelled to leave in the hands of the enemy some of my prisoners.

Last, not least, I brought in sixteen wagon loads of excellent hay, and twenty-two of corn.

The following list of killed and wounded on our side is, I regret, greater than I at first reported, viz: seven killed and sixty-one wounded, including one lieutenant-colonel and four captains, and three missing. From what I have gathered from various reliable sources, I am satisfied that the loss of the enemy was, at the very least, ninety killed left on the field, besides those carried off, amongst whom was, certainly, Colonel Tom Taylor, commanding the First Kentucky regiment, whom the Kentucky prisoners in my custody state they saw fall from his horse. Colonel Forney is also said to have been killed; this, however, is not so satisfactorily ascertained. General Stuart is reported by one of the prisoners to have been killed or wounded.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
your obedient servant,

GEO. A. MCCALL,
Brigadier-General Commanding Division.
Brigadier-General S. WILLIAMS,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

LIEUT. COL. KANE'S REPORT

Of meritorious officers and men engaged in the affair at Dranesville, December 20th inst.

HEAD-QUARTERS KANE RIFLES,
December 30, 1861.

GENERAL: But for your order of the 27th, I should not have made particular mention of the services of individual officers of this regiment, being proud, as I have before said, to know that all especially did their duty, though all were not equally fortunate in being assigned a conspicuous place. Major Roy Stone has been confined for a month by serious illness, at his father's residence. Captain Philip Holland, with his company, who formed the advance guard of the regiment, and Captain Hugh McDonald, whose brave fellows were selected to act as flankers on our right—officers whose courage had been well proven by me before—stood in another portion of the field through no fault of their own. On the morning of our departure from camp, I was constrained to refuse the gallant Captain Gifford, officer of the day in charge of the camp, leave to accompany the expedition. I had deeply to regret, too, the absence of Captain Charles F. Taylor, of the Wayne Rifles, sent home by me on sick leave, an officer ill-spared on such a day, although his spirited company was well commanded in his absence by Lieuts. Yerkes and Swayne. In my report to you of the 22d inst., I referred to Capt. Manson E. Niles, of the Tioga Rifles, in the following language:

"I enclose a report of regimental Surgeon S. D. Freeman, showing a list of three killed and twenty-seven wounded. I trust the valuable life of Captain Niles may be spared to his friends and his country. He led the left flankers during the day, and although his tall figure rendered him a conspicuous mark for the enemy's sharpshooters, he did not cease exposing himself to cheer on his men until he fell, which was a little before the close of the fight." I have no hesitation in presenting the name of Capt. Niles first as entitled to honorable reward. It is the interest of the country to encourage her sons to follow such an example. I find it embarrassing to name others and avoid seeming to arrange them in order of merit. During the brief period when you placed the Sixth under my command, and when I stepped to the right of the road, I placed my own regiment under Capt. Hugh McNeil, of my color company, the Raftsmen Guards, of Warren. This gives me occasion to name in terms of commendation first in order this gallant and accomplished officer. I knew well that he would not disappoint my expectations.

To the right of Captain McNeil was Captain Edward Irvin of the Raftmen Rangers, of Clearfield. Upon him I relied with unhesitating confidence to guide our ranks during the charge, knowing the staunchness and steadiness with which he and his bold followers would advance upon the enemy. Left of Captain McNeil was Captain Dennis McGee, than whom the army does not afford a better example of impetuous courage, and I know not whether his Irish, German, or American followers from Carbon were harder to restrain when the recall was sounded. On the extreme left was Captain Langhurn Wister, the scion of a true family, whose brave men from Perry were more exposed than any others to the enemy's fire there, but afterward were foremost to repulse the movement against our flank. By naming next in order Lieut. Jenkins, who, with a model soldier, First Sergeant Craven, defended in Captain Gifford's absence the name with the honor of the Rifles of Cameron, I postpone to the last my mention of Captain William T. Blanchard, and his McKean Rifles. There is not a more fearless spirit than Captain Blanchard in the service; his ringing voice was heard above the fire when it was hottest. It was from the McKean Rifles that I detailed Lieut. Rice to defend Thornton's house, when I perceived we held the key of the position against the enemy. Rice's defence of it in extremity would have been a desperate one. His command, firing from the windows, did execution among the enemy, which even in the excitement of the action it was fearful to contemplate.

Company E retreated upon our body in handsome style, after the action commenced; and, after Niles fell, were commanded most creditably by Second Lieutenant S. A. Mack. He was fired at, by order of a rebel officer, by an entire company of the enemy, at eighty paces.

My thanks should be particularly rendered to Lieutenant Lucius Truman, who rendered me valuable assistance in the absence of field-officers; also, to Lieutenant J. T. Jewett, adjutant.

The reports of captains, submitted with this, designate but a few of the brave men who were distinguished for energy and daring. It was intimated that the number to be reported to you should be limited. I can, of my own observation, cordially recommend all those named. Brigadier-General E. O. C. Ord.

GENERAL McCALL'S REPORT.

HEAD-QUARTERS McCALL'S DIVISION, }
CAMP PIERPONT, VA., January 20, 1862. }

GENERAL: I have the honor to enclose herewith the report of Brigadier-General E. O. C. Ord, commanding Third brigade of my division, giving the names of officers and men of his brigade who were distinguished for gallantry in the battle of Dranesville, December 20, 1861.

Having arrived on the battle-field during the heat of the conflict—whilst Easton's and the enemy's batteries were engaged, and before Colonel Jackson, of the Ninth regiment infantry, Pennsylvania reserve, had his fierce encounter with the Kentucky regiment, where a much greater number of the enemy were slain than on any other part of the field—I have it in my power, which I most cheerfully do, to bear witness, from my personal observation, of the gallantry and good conduct of many of the officers and men named in General Ord's report.

Among those who more particularly attracted my notice were, first, General Ord himself, whom I found (not until some time after I arrived) bravely urging on his men against the enemy's battery. I told him I approved his disposition, and made no change except to order forward one section of Easton's battery. Jackson's regiment was distinguished for the rapidity and accuracy of its fire.

The conduct of Colonel J. S. McCalmont, of the Tenth regiment infantry, Pennsylvania reserve; Lieutenant-Colonel T. L. Kane, First Rifles, Pennsylvania reserve; Captain Easton, artillery, Pennsylvania reserve; Lieutenant and adjutant Henry B. McKean, Sixth regiment infantry, Pennsylvania reserve, more particularly attracted my attention, and it affords me great pleasure to add my testimony to that of their brigade commander, as to gallantry and good conduct they exhibited on the field. No one of them, however, in my estimation, behaved more nobly than Colonel Jackson, who led his regiment at once into close quarters with the enemy.

I must now beg leave to recommend warmly to the notice of the general-in-chief the conduct of my personal staff, viz.: Captain Henry J. Biddle, assistant adjutant-general; First Lieut. Henry A. Scheetz, aide-de-camp; Capt. James B. Clow, brigade commissary and acting aide-de-camp; Second Lieut. E. Beatty, ordnance officer and acting aide-de-camp, all of whom were more or less under fire, and bore themselves with great gallantry. Captain Chandler Hall, brigade quartermaster, was actively engaged during the battle in loading his wagon train with forage. It is but justice also to state that the most efficient service was rendered by Acting Division Surgeon A. E. Stocker, who was very actively employed in the general direction and care of the wounded and the arrangement for their return to the division camp. My aide-de-camp, First Lieutenant Elbridge Maconkey, though not in the engagement, was meritoriously employed in the discharge of important duties connected therewith.

With a very few exceptions, to whom brevet commissions may be given, I would respectfully suggest that something in the style of a medal and ribbon would be a reward of gallantry and merit that would be highly appreciated by all.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. A. McCALL,

Brigadier-General, commanding Division.

Brigadier-General S. WILLIAMS.

SECRETARY CAMERON TO GEN. McCALL

The Secretary of War addressed the following letter to General McCall:

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 23, 1861.

Brigadier-General G. A. McCall, Commanding Division, Camp Pierpont, Virginia:

GENERAL: I have read your report of the battle of Dranesville, and although no reply is necessary on my part, yet as a citizen of the same Commonwealth as yourself and the troops engaged in that brilliant affair, I cannot refrain from expressing to you my admiration of the gallant conduct displayed, both by officers and men, in this their first contest with the enemy. Nearly all of your command upon that occasion are either my personal friends or sons of those with whom for long years I have been more or less intimately associated. I feel that I have just cause to be proud that, animated by no other motive than patriotism, they are among the first to revive the glory shed upon our country by the men of the Revolution and the soldiers of the War of 1812. It is one of the bright spots that give assurance of the success of coming events; and its effect must be to inspire confidence in the belief that hereafter, as heretofore, the cause of our country will triumph.

I am especially gratified that a Pennsylvania artillery corps, commanded by officers who have necessarily had but limited systematic instruction, have won not only the commendation of their friends, but an unwilling compliment from the enemy, for the wonderful rapidity and accuracy of their fire.

I wish I could designate all the men who, nobly discharging their duty to the country, have added to the glory of our great commonwealth. Other portions of the army will be stimulated by their brave deeds, and men will be proud to say that at Dranesville they served under McCall and Ord.

I am, General, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
SIMON CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

PHILADELPHIA "PRESS" ACCOUNT.

LANGLEY'S, VA., Dec. 21, 1861.

The Pennsylvania reserve division, under the command of General McCall, occupies an extensive and rather pretty piece of country beyond Langley's church and tavern, the encampments stretching toward Lewinsville. It is the right wing of the great Potomac Division, and in the advance. The position it holds was the last point abandoned by the enemy, and was taken by Gen. McClellan immediately after the occupation of Munson's Hill and Falls Church. Northeastwardly from Centreville, and some miles from the Fairfax road, it is not directly menaced by the rebel forces at Manassas. Its position is an important one, however, for it secures the Chain Bridge, protects the Potomac, prevents a flanking movement from Leesburg, and, with Banks at Edwards' Ferry, and on guard from Seneca Falls to Harper's Ferry, saves Maryland from an invasion. The inside picket lines of our army are some distance from Langley's, and join those from the centre of the division. Beyond this, there is an open country, not occupied by any military force, including a small village called Dranesville, and extending some three or four miles beyond, in the direction of Leesburg, to a position in the neighborhood of Hunter's Mills, where a rebel entrenchment has been erected, and extended lines of rifle pits and heavy artillery works are known to be in existence. These fortifications are held by a part of the rebel army in occupation of Leesburg, being garrisoned and supported by one or two divisions of the enemy, and in constant and easy communication with the forces in upper Virginia and at Centreville by a good military road, and the Loudon and Hampshire railway, which they command. Between the rebel fortification alluded to, and the outside of our lines at Lewinsville, there is a strip of country some twelve or fifteen miles in extent, which might be called, if you allow me a comparative phrase, disputed territory. Scouting parties of the enemy and scouting parties of the Federal army are constantly roaming through it—the enemy sometimes being adventurous enough to come near our lines, throw a shell in the direction of our encampments, and hastily retreat.

Occasionally, foraging and reconnoitring parties are organized for the purpose of searching the country, learning its resources and topography, and obtaining hay, forage, and provisions. You will remember the last, which took place some two weeks ago, under the command of Gen. Meade, of the Second Reserve brigade, and the successful results of which were so vividly told by one of my colleagues on your correspondence staff, on newspaper duty here at Langley's at the time. My own knowledge of the country was obtained when Gen. McCall was at Dranesville, in October, from a journey up the Potomac, in company with an officer attached to the Fourth Reserve regiment, I believe, and whose name I would give something to recall. It is like Virginia country generally, very romantic and picturesque. The farms were large, many of them well stocked, and in excellent condition. Gunnell's house I recollect as a Virginia mansion, on a style of old-fashioned magnificence, with a farm cultivated in a thorough and profitable manner, which would reflect credit upon your thrifty agriculturists in Connecticut and Pennsylvania. Gunnell himself had gone away, leaving the women and children, a number of fine pigs, now departed this life, and a few patriotic negroes, who spent their time in looking out for the Yankees, and giving water and food to the stragling soldiers of the division. The country was rather thinly settled; in many places a number of poor white families having clustered together into a village, and living in a style of ignorance, want, and devotion to the South. If the people here do not feel the ravages of this war, they certainly feel its inconveniences, embarrassments and privations. Between two fires, as it were—having no communication with the rebels, except with scouts and marauders; having no communication with the Union men, except when visited by the soldiers on a forage party or reconnoissance, they suffered sadly for the want of salt, coal, sugar, tea, coffee, and most of the delicacies and necessities of life. They were, as a general thing, sullen and civil, with all their sympathies pointing to Richmond, and acting as spies and hosts to the enemy. Dranesville is a Virginia town—which is to say, that it is a collection of houses around one large brick dwelling, where the lord of the vicinity resided, and, through the courtesy of the geographer and the Federal mail-route agent, has been admitted into the Post Office Directory and the Gazetteer. Most of the inhabitants have gone away, and it looks dull, desolate and gloomy, as if the plague had fallen upon it, and the Shadow of Death was over every hall and hearthstone.

It having been determined to send a foraging party to take possession of a quantity of hay, oats, and provender, known to be in the neighborhood of this famished Virginia town, the brigade of General E. O. C. Ord, lately commanded by Colonel McCalmont, was assigned to the duty. The force consisted of the Sixth regiment, Colonel W. W. Ricketts; Ninth regiment, Colonel C. F. Jackson; Tenth, Colonel

John S. McCalmont; Twelfth, Colonel John H. Taggart. The regiment of riflemen known as the Bucktails, and under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas L. Kane; a battery of Colonel Campbell's artillery regiment, consisting of two twenty-four-pounders and two twelve-pounders, commanded by Capt. Easton, and a detachment of cavalry from Colonel Bayard's regiment, also accompanied the expedition. Each regiment was strongly represented, and it is supposed that there were about four thousand men in the expedition. The order for march was received on Thursday evening, the men being directed to take with them one day's rations. At six o'clock the men were under arms and ready to march. The morning was clear, and rather cold, with a slight mist around the sun, and a thin layer of frost whitening the road and coating the lawn. The Bucktails were assigned the advance of the infantry column, the cavalry preceding as scouts, and the battery being in reserve. Col. Taggart's regiment brought up the rear. A number of teams were also in company. Before the teams had proceeded far on the march they were filled with the soldiers, who scrambled on top and clung to the sides. As the long row of wagons took their long, narrow, and devious route, up the road, with the squads of soldiers, in their gay and pretty uniforms, clustering around the white canvas tops, the early morning sun reflecting the sheen of their bayonets, and the hard, bleak, and wintry foliage giving a sombre background to the picture, it presented a beautiful and glorious spectacle. The march was slow and monotonous, with neither incident nor accident to vary the progress of the army. Each regiment had two companies of flankers thrown out, on either side of the column, to scour the woods, search the thickets, and prevent the column from falling into an ambuscade. The marching was excellent, the men keeping together in a solid body, and but few stragglers remaining on the road. They halted at Difficult Creek, as an alarm was communicated to the officers, but it proved to be unfounded, and the forces proceeded. Difficult Creek is a narrow stream, with a heavy stone bridge, which had been erected by the local authorities of Virginia. The position selected for the bridge is level and narrow, and, in many places, the stream is fordable, the average width being thirty feet.

The march continued. The day became warm, the sky soft and clear, and the road heavy and solid. Like Virginia turnpikes generally, the road is rough and rugged, in some places covered with masses of stone, and limbs of trees, and obstructions which accumulated in the course of time, or had been placed there by the rebels. Beyond the bridge our men partook of a hasty dinner. The soldiers approached Dranesville. About noon the flanking companies of the Twelfth regiment came in and reported that a large body of rebels could be seen from a neighboring hill. At another part of the line shots were exchanged between some hidden enemy and our flanking companies. Instantly a line of battle was formed, but no enemy appeared, and the sudden firing ceased. The Bucktail regiment had thrown its column as far as a brick house, known as Thornton's house, and as it was evident that there was an enemy somewhere in the neighborhood, a halt was ordered, and a messenger despatched to Langley's.

The delay was that of a few minutes. Our men were anxious, expectant, and enthusiastic. Suddenly a fire was opened upon our line from a wood or thicket nearly a mile distant. The enemy's battery contained six guns, and was placed in a road skirting the wood, and sheltered by it. Their guns were of large calibre, and they fired shells. At first they passed over the column and exploded beyond. The rebel artillerymen discovered this, altered their range, and their shells fell short. In the mean time, Easton's battery was brought into position on the side of an elevation in front of the Twelfth regiment, which was in line of battle. One of the twenty-four-pounders upset, horses, wheels, and even the riders turning over. A moment more and the accident was remedied and the battery ranged in position. Gen. Ord himself sighted the guns, and a sharp fire was instantly opened upon the enemy. It was what General Beauregard would have called an "artillery duel," for the engagement was confined altogether, for the first half hour, to the two batteries.

Our infantry laid down upon their arms, expecting the orders of their superior officers. The guns of the enemy were but poorly served, for their shots either fell short of the range or went beyond, and our men fortunately escaped. At length their fire began to be irregular and uncertain, showing that they either intended to retreat or change their position. At this time Colonel Kane, who was on the right of the column, discovered the infantry of the enemy passing through an open clearing near the wood, evidently intending a flank movement, or designing to occupy a brick house within a hundred yards of his regiment. He sent a detachment of twenty men, under command of Lieut. Rice, to take the house, which they did, and, under shelter of its walls, opened fire upon the advancing regiments. The house was inhabited by an old negro and two children, who were placed in the cellar for shelter. The small garrison demolished the windows and attacked the enemy, which was afterward discovered to be an Alabama regiment, under command of Colonel John H. Forney; a Kentucky regiment, commanded by Colonel Tom Taylor; and a South Carolina regiment. They took the shelter of underbrush, and, under the supposition that the house was filled by our troops, opened a heavy fire upon it, supported by two small guns, which threw shell and shot upon it. They advanced nearer and nearer every volley, our brave riflemen firing rapidly and with great effect. Colonel Kane was among them all the time, inspiring them with his brave example. They laid on the ground as they loaded their pieces, rising suddenly, taking deliberate aim, and lying down to load again. The burden of the enemy's fire was directed at the house, and it was shattered and pierced, the roof being broken, and some of the walls giving way.

The fire of our men was so terrific that the enemy fell back from the advanced position they had assumed, abandoned their flanking manœuvre, and retreated to the woods under cover of their battery, which still kept up an irregular and uncertain fire. The Bucktails advanced in pursuit. As they rose to advance, Colonel Kane, who was leading them, was shot in the cheek. He fell, but instantly arose, and, bandaging his wound with a white handkerchief, continued to advance. In the mean time General Ord ordered the line to advance and take the battery. The order was given to the Twelfth regiment, Col. John H. Taggart commanding. It was received with a cheer by our men, and they advanced in the direction of the unseen battery. They proceeded to the edge of the wood and entered, keeping the line as straight and precise as on dress parade. The wood was dense, and so impenetrable that our men found it difficult to proceed. Col. Taggart threw his scabbard away and preceded his men with his drawn sword in one hand and his pistol in the other. It was an exciting and awful time. In an unknown country, with the fear of an ambushade, an enemy in the immediate vicinity, whose numbers were unknown to us, a constant and steady, even if at random, fire of musketry, a battery in front, whose shells and shot were tearing the trees, and falling around them every moment burdened with death; veterans might have paused and hesitated to advance. Still they went on through the undergrowth and trees, over deep ravines and gullies, which had been the undisturbed habitation of the rabbit and squirrel, dismantling the shrubbery and fences, with loud, exultant, and defiant shouts.

They came into an open clearing about as large as Washington Square, only to find that the rebels had retreated in the most precipitate manner. While our brave boys were crowding through the woods, they had started along the Leesburg road, taking their cannon, but leaving their dead and wounded, and large quantities of arms and ammunition. A single caisson remained. The magazine had been struck by a shell from our battery, and exploded with appalling effect. Around it the dead and dying were heaped, as many as fifteen men and five horses being killed. Some had their heads shot away—others were wounded in the breast. One defiant rebel, even in the agonies of death, exclaimed, "We whipped you at Manassas, but you have the best of us to-day." Col. Taggart directed him to be carried to a house near by. He was placed on a mattress, and, asking for a cup of water, passed away. Our men were wild with the enthusiasm of victory, and, having placed the wounded in the houses near by, and chopped the gun-carriages to splinters, started in pursuit of the retreating foe.

This was about three o'clock. Gen. McCall, with his staff, had arrived on the ground only to learn of our victory. Knowing that an advance would be fatal, he ordered a recall, and with our wounded and dead, and the trophies of the war, our men came home, leaving the dead upon the field.

They came home an exultant and victorious band, arriving at Langley's about nine o'clock in the evening, where they were met by thousands of their shouting and brave comrades.

This has been a glorious day for Pennsylvania. We have met the enemy in equal numbers—we have utterly routed and destroyed them. This contest shows the spirit and the bravery of our men—their enthusiasm and discipline. Pennsylvania may be proud of her sons. There may be greater encounters, and battles more terribly and fearfully contested, but none there can be in which the victory is more decided and undeniable. J. R. Y.

REBEL ACCOUNT OF THE FIGHT.

CENTREVILLE, December 24, 1861.

Yesterday morning a heavy skirmish occurred at Dranesville, which resulted disastrously to us. A foraging party was sent out by Gen. Stuart, consisting of about two hundred wagons, escorted by the Eleventh Virginia, Col. Garland; the Sixth South Carolina, under Lieutenant-Colonel A. J. Secrest; the Tenth Alabama, Col. John H. Forney; the First Kentucky, Col. Tom Taylor; the Sumter Flying Artillery, Capt. Outts, and detachments from Ransom's and Radford's Cavalry. Our whole force amounted to nearly twenty-five hundred men. They started off early in the morning, and before day were some distance on the journey. Soon after leaving, a rocket was seen to shoot up in the direction of Dranesville, which, as was afterward ascertained, was a signal from the enemy, and indicated that our approach was known. It is about fifteen miles from here to Dranesville. When within a short distance of the place, two or three regiments of Yankees were seen deployed as skirmishers in the skirts of a pine thicket, which stretched out on either side of the road. Gen. Stuart drew up his force and prepared to make an attack. On either side the woods were very thick, and it was difficult to make through them, but our force was pushed forward in the following order: the Eleventh Virginia, being in the advance, was deployed on the right of the road with the Tenth Alabama, while the Sixth South Carolina and the First Kentucky were sent to the left. On account of the dense thicket on either side, the artillery was forced to advance down the road in order to gain a position to make the guns effective.

As we approached the Yankees, the Eleventh

Virginia charged them, with a yell, and drove them back to their line within sight of Dranesville. The enemy seemed somewhat confused, but soon formed again in line of battle. The advanced positions were held by the Eleventh and the Sixth South Carolina, the former on the right, and the latter on the left of the road. While waiting to get sight of the enemy, the Sixth South Carolina was drawn up, and the First Kentucky advanced on them, and mistaking them for the enemy, a portion of the regiment fired without orders, killing five of the South Carolinians. The error was soon discovered, and Colonel Taylor advanced cautiously to the left, and soon after came in sight of another regiment but a few yards away. To be sure there was no mistake, Colonel Taylor shouted to the colonel, and asked who he was.

"The Colonel of the Ninth," was the reply.

"Of what Ninth?"

"Don't shoot," said the Yankees, "we are friends—South Carolinians."

"On which side are you?" asked Colonel Taylor.

"For the Union," and immediately after the Colonel gave the command to fire, and a volley was poured into the Kentuckians from the Ninth Infantry, regulars, U. S. A. The engagement then became general, and our four regiments, with Capt. Cutts' four guns, were soon actively engaged. The Yankees had every advantage of position. There were several houses along the Leesburg turnpike, and back of it a hill upon which their battery was placed. Lower down, and opposite the Eleventh, was another battery, placed in position to enfilade the turnpike should we enter it. The main battery of six guns swept the road upon which we were advancing, and kept up an incessant fire of grape, canister, and spherical case. The accuracy of their aim was remarkable, considering the rapidity with which the guns were fired. Capt. Cutts got three of his pieces in position and returned the fire rapidly and successfully.

Meanwhile, the enemy advanced several regiments of infantry, and, protected by the nature of the ground, came within a hundred yards of us, and, forming in line, fired for some time, keeping the air full of Minié balls, and finally attempted to charge. Three times the officers gave the order, and tried to get their men forward, but failed. They could not be pushed into the thicket. Soon after this the firing on both sides ceased, but not before great damage was done to our force. For over an hour both sides had kept an incessant firing. The wounded and dead lay on every side, and the regiments were beginning to get scattered.

To give it a little more in detail: As our first advance were marching by the flank toward the Yankee skirmishers, two companies of the Eleventh Virginia were thrown out as skirmishers, and sent forward. Capt. Houston's company charged the Yankees with a shout and drove them in, and soon after the shout was taken up by others, and all advanced within sight of Dranesville. Company A of the Eleventh was deployed on the right, but by some means got lost, and was separated from the regiment until the fight was over.

When the enemy formed in line of battle, Col. Forney drew the Tenth Alabama up also, and prepared to advance upon them. The coolness and daring courage displayed by Col. Forney was observed by every body. He rode backward and forward in front of the line, encouraging his men, and in getting all prepared for the coming struggle. The same can be said of Col. Garland. Soon after the firing commenced, Col. Forney was shot through the right arm, Lieut.-Col. Martin was killed, and the command of the regiment devolved on Major Woodward, who commanded on one side of the road, and the senior captain on the other. This regiment lost more than any other. The Sumter Artillery was in the road, and had three guns in position. Only four pieces were out, and about sixty men. Capt. Cutts and his men fought bravely, and suffered severely.

The enemy's batteries played upon him for some time, and killed nearly all his horses, destroyed one limber, and exploded a caisson. Twenty-five horses were left dead upon the field. The guns still kept firing, and did good execution—every shot scattering the Yankees, and telling upon them seriously. He succeeded in breaking their line, and in driving their sharpshooters from the house behind which they were hidden. When ordered to fall back, the pieces were taken to the rear by hand, with the assistance of the infantry.

Seeing the wagons safely to the rear, Gen. Stuart gave orders to fall back to a better position. The regiment marched to the rear in good order, both sides having ceased firing. At this time Col. Tom Taylor rode to the right to see what disposition had been made of his neighbors, and on returning found his regiment gone, and himself nearly surrounded by Yankee cavalry. Throwing himself down, he eluded them, and afterward crept into a pine coppice, and remained there until dark, with Yankees on each side of him. At night he escaped and joined his regiment this morning, sustaining no injury beyond a slight scratch on the hand by a musket ball.

Taking his force to the rear, where the ground offered better positions, Gen. Stuart once more drew up his force and awaited the enemy, but he had enough of it, and was not disposed to give battle again. Thus ended the battle of Dranesville, which, although disastrous to us, was more so to the enemy, if recent reports are true. It is believed there were seven regiments of infantry, one of cavalry, and eight pieces of light artillery against us.

ANOTHER REBEL ACCOUNT.

CAMP NEAR CENTREVILLE, }
FAIRFAX COUNTY, VA., December 24. }

About nine o'clock last Friday night, an order was received calling out our regiment (the Eighteenth Virginia) to repair as hurriedly as possible to Dranesville, the scene of conflict of the previous day. We marched as fast as we could without going at the double-quick. We arrived at or near a church, known as the Fry-pan Church, about two o'clock of the same night. We had no blankets with us at all—simply our overcoats—to protect us from the rigor of the cold. We procured fence rails, which we kindled with ease; after which we laid down on the naked earth. Some of our regiment, however, remained up the remainder of the night. At early dawn the next morning the drum beat the signal for the formation of our regiment. We marched briskly along, it being quite cold, and we therefore felt the more inclined to exert ourselves to give warmth to our bodies. We had no idea of going so far when we started, but were willing to follow Gen. Stuart anywhere, even to the banks of the Potomac. Onward, still onward we went, winding our way up and down circuitous and zigzag roads, which, though wearisome, were in excellent condition, being entirely free from the stifling influence of dust. Still we went, and it is a singular fact that the nearer you approach a given place, the further off are you from it; since the uniform reply to an interrogatory as to how far we were off from Dranesville had it more remote than the answer of the man previously met a mile or two back. This provoked us to such a pitch of desperation that we could scarcely refrain from insulting the author of the answer we had so much solicited.

We reached Dranesville about eleven o'clock A. M., and went just beyond it to a house on the hill, near which was the fiercest portion of the fight. Our regiment was halted here, and broken, when an opportunity was afforded the curious of visiting the battle ground. My attention was directed to the house immediately on the Leesburg turnpike, at the front of which stood several charming-looking ladies, who very soon became the paramount attraction. I eyed them awhile with interest, then sided toward them, when I got into quite an interesting conversation. They narrated many incidents connected with the battle. They were in the town of Dranesville when it occurred. They say it was a most fiercely contested fight, and that the enemy had four or five to our one. They were kindly attending our wounded, of which there were eight in this confiscated house. They say the Yankees were very kind to our wounded, in bringing them to the house; they also left with them a good many bandages, to be used in dressing their wounds. They said the Potomac was not more than three and a half or four miles distant, and Washington twenty-two. I was speaking with two ladies, one of whose names was Miss Day. She was very sprightly; said that her father had been taken the day before—both her father, Dr. Day, and a Mr. Day. They were charged, she said, with fighting against them on a certain occasion on the Potomac. Gen. Stuart meanwhile proceeded to have his wounded placed aboard the ambulances and wagons. Our men cheerfully assisted in bearing them out of the house and putting them in the conveyances.

These ladies, with their mothers, had come up from their comfortable homes, bringing with them beds and bedclothes. They also prepared soups and such like delicacies, suited to the conditions of the wounded. As they were being placed on the ambulances, one of the ladies remarked that that was her patient. I told her I prophesied for him a speedy recovery, having been nursed under such favorable auspices.

These things over, I, in company with several of our company, took our rifles and went to the battle ground. Spectacles of horror met our eyes there. The detail of men, who had been sent for the purpose, had collected our dead alongside the road. I was horror-struck by the ghastly appearance of the dead, as they lay all besmeared with their own blood, which in the agonies of death they had gotten all over their faces, having, as soon as shot, clapped their hands to the part affected and drawn them across their faces; shots of a more deadly character, I never saw. The bullets and grape took effect in the most vital parts, indicating with what unvarying precision and accuracy the enemy shot. Corporal B—, who was one of the number who accompanied me to the field, put himself to some trouble to ascertain the number of the dead, which he says was thirty-four. Passing on further down, we saw a caisson which had been set on fire by a bomb from the enemy, causing immediate explosion, which, I am told, caused the instant death of two men of the Sumter Artillery, of Georgia. The head of one of them was entirely severed from the body, that of the other cut off just above the nose. I never saw such a sight before. Our killed was thirty-four, and as many wounded. The enemy are supposed to have sustained but a small loss—three killed and thirty or forty wounded. The Federal victory is owing, of course, to the superiority of their position; we could not get our battery in position for action, at least but one or two pieces. Some sixteen of our artillery horses were killed. The enemy had seven large pieces, which played upon our men and artillery from three different points, all playing upon one focus. Having put all our dead in wagons, we set out about four o'clock for Centreville, distant, the way we went, not less than twenty miles. In twenty-four hours we travelled over more than forty miles, with not half enough to eat. The suffering from cold, too, was intense. Our men were in high glee when they started, at the prospect of an engagement with the enemy—in fact, the whole of the time we were up there, we were in momentary expectation of an attack, but the cowards would not show themselves.

It is proper to state that there were but two regiments, our own and a Georgia regiment, where the day before, four regiments and a battery had received a defeat. Albeit, we did not engage the enemy, yet our following General Stuart goes to demonstrate our willingness to hazard our lives. It was reported that fifteen regiments were sent in the direction of Dranesville, subsequent to our setting out for that place—I have since learned that such was not the case. About night, on our way back, our colonel halted us, and put the vote to the regiment, whether or not we were willing to go the entire distance to Centreville; the reply was "yes!" with emphasis. So on we went; poor fellows! some of our men complained bitterly of sore feet, made so by travelling so much on this hard frozen ground. Some one or two were so lucky as to get a ride on horseback. Others were obliged to remain over night, and come in the following (Sunday) morning. No order as to regularity of marching could be maintained, each getting along as best he could. My captain, myself, and several others were amongst the first to get to camp—how glad were we to get there. We found hot coffee and warm fires. So, drinking the coffee and toasting our feet, we retired for the night. We got to camp about eleven P. M.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT.

CAMP CENTREVILLE, December 27, 1861.

EDITORS DISPATCH: Several communications have been published in your columns recently, describing the battle at Dranesville, but none of these contributors have been explicit enough to describe the positions and conduct of the South Carolinians in that engagement. We do not wish to claim for the Sixth South Carolina regiment any unmerited honor, but desire simply to place her position and conduct fairly before the public, and to correct some erroneous statements previously made with reference to the loss she sustained in the engagement. A writer who professes to have been with the Kentucky regiment during the engagement, states that our entire loss was fully one hundred, and that the killed and wounded in that regiment was half that amount. The same writer afterward states the loss of the Sixth South Carolina regiment to be fifteen. Whence he obtained this information we are at a loss to know, but refer the readers of the Dispatch to the report of the killed and wounded of the different regiments published in the Richmond papers, and at once they will ascertain the loss of the Sixth South Carolina to be sixty-five, which, from the small number of men in the regiment—three hundred and fifteen—was much heavier than that of any other regiment.

The positions of the regiments when drawn up in the line of battle have been definitely and correctly stated.

But the most heart-rending scene that presented itself, resulted on the part of Kentuckians, who, mistaking the brave Carolinians for the enemy, poured a murderous fire into their ranks, at a distance of not more than forty yards.

This was enough to disconcert and discourage the bravest men, and throw into confusion the best disciplined regiment in the world. But the shock, though very severe, was not sufficient to disperse the Carolinians, while, in five minutes after the reception of this deadly fire, they were again in line of battle proper, and bravely advanced on the enemy.

The Yankees were lying in ambush, and when the advancing column had proceeded within one hundred yards of their line, they opened a terrific fire upon it, which was returned in a manner creditable and honorable to the regiment and the brave soldiers of the Palmetto State. Never were soldiers exposed to a more deadly volley, and never did men stand more nobly to their posts.

When completely overpowered by numbers, and well-nigh outflanked on our left, we were ordered to fall back to a more advantageous position. The regiment fell back in good order and re-formed, and was shortly afterward withdrawn from the field. The Kentuckians fought well on the left, the Virginians and Alabamians bravely on the right, but the heavy loss sustained by South Carolinians, in the centre, shows conclusively that she was in the heat of the fight, and that her suffering was as severe as any other regiment engaged.

REBELS KILLED AND WOUNDED.

The Norfolk Day Book, in its account of the fight, makes out the following losses:

Regiments.	Killed.	Wounded.	Missing.	Total.
Eleventh Virginia.....	5	16	1	22
Tenth Alabama.....	15	45	30	90
Sixth South Carolina..	18	44	5	67
S. Carolina Artillery..	4	13	—	17
First Kentucky.....	1	25	8	34
Total.....	43	143	44	230

These figures are more likely to be below the real number than up to it. Gen. Ord's men found sixty-nine dead rebels on the battle-field, and as the proportion of wounded is generally about four to one of the killed, the total loss of the rebels was probably not less than three hundred and fifty, out of a total force of about four thousand.

OPERATIONS OF THE STONE FLEET.

A CORRESPONDENT of the New York Tribune gives the following minute account of the fleet:

OFF PORT ROYAL ENTRANCE, }
STEARSHIP CAHAWBA, Dec. 17, 1861. }

To Charleston!—that is our destination; or, more accurately, to the bar at the entrance of the harbor of that doomed city. The terrible stone fleet, on a mission as pitiless as the granite that freights it, sailed this morning from the harbor of Port Royal, and before two days are past will have made Charleston an inland city. This western bride of the sea is to be a widow; the decree of divorce is entered in a court without appeals; and the fleet which executes it, storm-tossed, shattered, and unworthy of the sea, is a fit counterpart to the gorgeous galleys with whose stately procession the Doge yearly wedded Venice to the Adriatic. Against these crumbling hulks the batteries which silenced Sumter point their guns in vain. They have taken counsel of the Romans, who declared that he is the most dangerous enemy who values not his own life, and has insured success by resolving on suicide.

Sixteen vessels will be sunk on the bar at the river entrance. Here is the list:

Amazon.....	Capt. Swift...	New Bedford.
America.....	Capt. Chase...	New Bedford.
American.....	Capt. Beard...	New Bedford.
Archer.....	Capt. Worth...	New Bedford.
Courier.....	Capt. Brayton.	New Bedford.
Fortune.....	Capt. Rice....	New London.
Herald.....	Capt. Gifford..	New Bedford.
Kensington.....	Capt. Tilton...	New Bedford.
Leonidas.....	Capt. Howland	New Bedford.
Maria Theresa.....	Capt. Bailey....	New Bedford.
Potomac.....	Capt. Brown....	New Bedford.
Rebecca Simms.....	Capt. Willis....	New Bedford.
L. C. Richmond.....	Capt. Maloy....	New Bedford.
Robin Hood.....	Capt. Skinner..	New London.
Tenedos.....	Capt. Sisson....	New London.
William Lee.....	Capt. Lake.....	New Bedford.

They range from two hundred and seventy-five to five hundred tons, are all old whalers, heavily loaded with large blocks of granite, and cost the Government from two thousand five hundred dollars to five thousand dollars each. Some of them were once famous ships; the Archer, for instance, the Kensington, the Rebecca Simms, and the Robin Hood, once owned by Girard. The Tenedos is one of the oldest, if I may trust the mate of the Cahawba, who confidentially informed me that her keel was laid when Adam was an oakum-boy; and if this be correct, one or two must date still further back to the period of mastodon and saurian.

With this fleet go the Cahawba, Philadelphia, and Ericsson, to help them along and assist at the sinking. The Molican, Capt. Godon; Ottawa, Capt. Stevens, and Pocahontas, Capt. Balch, are convoy to the whole, and if Mr. Commodore Tatnall should be too curious about our operations, their eleven-inch shells will give him an intelligible hint to keep at a respectful distance. The business over, the Philadelphia and Ericsson go North with the crews of the sunken ships; the Cahawba returns to Port Royal. She is a good steamer, and at this moment carries her nose uncommonly high, for she is flagship of the squadron, by virtue of having the fleet-captain on board, Chas. H. Davis, U. S. N., who has temporarily quitted the Wabash to superintend operations. I am indebted to his kind invitation for the pleasure of accompanying the expedition. The Cahawba was steaming out to sea when I reached the wharf, and my boat's crew had a hard pull trying to intercept her, but just as it became evident we must give up the chase she changed her mind, ran back to the Wabash, and anchored. Some of the whalers being very slow to start, we spent a couple of hours in getting them off. The steam-tug Mercury did justice to her name, carrying orders to sleepy captains of reluctant vessels, and keeping her sandals—that is, paddles—steadily moving. By two o'clock the last vessel had got her anchor, and begun to drift lazily down with a light breeze that hardly filled her sails. The Cahawba took the Potomac in tow, the Mercury picked up the Robin Hood, which had been run into by the Alabama and partly disabled, and both stood out of the harbor.

Some of the fleet have crawled well away already, under canvas, and the Philadelphia has towed one over the bar, and is returning to do the same office for another. At three, we pass a small schooner bound in, apparently a captured rebel with a prize crew aboard. The men-of-war, most of whom dislike unprofessional service, have been set to work towing, for we want to get the whole fleet outside tonight in readiness for the first breath of air that may come to help them along. As yet there is very little wind, all of it now the wrong way, and the best clipper in port might be puzzled to beat out against the strong flood-tide. The Potomac, our tow, is enjoying herself greatly. There is swell enough from the steamer's wheels to make her roll a little, and her bluff bows nod to us rather gracefully as she lifts herself on the wave, and yaws with the surge of the hawser. Poor old ship; it is her last voyage, and she does well to make the most of it. We drop her pretty soon, and return for another, passing through the fleet on our way, close enough to many of them to read the names painted in white on their square sterns, which are of such abrupt angularity as to recall the familiar legend concerning the Maine shipyards: that they built vessels by the mile, and sawed them off to order. The Marion is coming out with the Ocean Express in tow, bound for Tybee—two very smart-looking vessels. Presently the propeller Parkersburg comes within hail, and is asked to go back with us to tow. The captain is understood to say he will, but doesn't. He is not of our party, and may have other business. Next, the Ericsson shears alongside, and we confidently count on her help, because she belongs to the expedition. Being ordered to return, her captain remonstrates that he draws too much water, seeming to be under the impression that he is expected to take a whaler on board instead of in tow. One of our officers says the Ericsson is a beast, which I find, on inquiry, to mean that she is a fine ship, but has very poor engines and worse boilers, with a name for ill-luck, which is, of course, fatal among sailors. However, she is allowed to go, though we don't quite see how she would draw any more water with a tow than without. We are presently consoled by the report that the Pocahontas is coming, and shortly afterward the Mercury, also, which is constantly turning up in the most unexpected way just as she is wanted.

By this time we are well in the midst of the whole fleet, part of which is anchored outside the bar, part waiting for our return, while the gunboats and steamers and tugs are moving busily in all directions. More than thirty vessels are in plain sight, most of them on the same errand to a hostile port. The scene is extraordinary; the number of vessels, their purpose, the poetic and religious justice of the fate they carry with them, and the rare beauty of the day by whose fading light the scene is visible, make it singularly impressive. Far away in the harbor, rides a phantom fleet, its spars dimly outlined against the sky. Nearer, a ship, whose seams are yawing, like the ancient mariner's skeleton bark, crosses the disk of fire in the west, with a motion spectrally slow. The sun, just touching the sea, dyes its surface with crimson splendor, and passes into purple twilight. It has hardly sunk when another rises in the east, so exactly the same in color and size that you cannot at once believe it the moon. For the rest of the night she is regnant queen.

We hail two whalers, the Courier and Amazon, fast anchored, and apparently asleep, and get their hawsers aboard, with such clumsiness on the part of the Courier's boat that she is nearly caught and tossed in the bight of the line. Then the Amazon hails to say she has thirty fathoms of chain out and cannot get her anchor, but being ordered to look alive and make no further trouble, the anchor is speedily up. We have the fleet-captain aboard, and shall stand no nonsense. The Courier meantime has swung round till her cabin windows are staring into ours, but as she is about as sharp one end as the other, tows stern first very well indeed. Only one ship is left; we can't very well take her, but we are determined to leave nothing behind. A steamer is coming out, bound for New York. We know her to be the Daniel Webster, Capt. Johnson. It is rather dark, and she is evidently indisposed to see us, but we all go up on the paddle-box and wave hats and handkerchiefs till she can no longer pretend to be blind, but puts her wheel to larboard and waits for our hail. "Daniel Webster, ahoy! Will you tow that ship out over the bar?" sings out our Master. "I'll see you damned first," answers Daniel Webster; and with that polite and obliging response, resumes her interrupted journey. Somehow, the Mercury at this moment reappears and of course carries off the lingering whaler. When we arrive outside we find the squadron anchored. There is no chance of getting to Charleston to-night with any thing but a fraction of the fleet. Capt. Davis is well satisfied to have got all the whalers out of port and under his eye, ready to start with the breeze. The Cahawba lets go the tow-ropes and drops her anchor.

OFF CHARLESTON, STEAMSHIP CAHAWBA, }
December 20, 1861. }

The fleet got under weigh next morning, Wednesday, about an hour before sunrise, part of the ships in tow of the steamers, the rest trusting to canvas. There is the same delicious weather, only not quite enough wind for sailing vessels. A butterfly floats for an hour about our quarter-deck. Charleston light is in sight at half-past three, and soon after the blockading squadron—the Florida, Augusta, and Roebuck. The Florida runs down to take a look at us and make sure that the rebels have not contrived to steal a fleet and get to sea. At five we are fairly off the entrance of Charleston harbor, and there, lifting its walls high out of the sea, is Fort Sumter! No loyal American can look on it without grateful remembrance of the service it has done. I have nothing to say of what is called its defence, nor of its final surrender, but I salute the fort with silent respect.

None of the ships under canvas arrived that night. The Philadelphia came about seven o'clock. The Ericsson, whose zeal had outrun her discretion in the attempt to tow three vessels, was seen sometimes during the night. Both were expected to remain till operations were finished, but the Philadelphia suddenly sent to say she had only three days' coal, and must go to New York at once. Five minutes allowed for letters. The only business of the evening was a channel reconnoissance, which resulted in the discovery that the channel buoy had been moved in order to mislead us, and that further soundings would be necessary the next day to determine its true position. Ships enough had arrived no doubt to persuade the anxiously-watchful Carolinians that all the men-of-war had come, and were ready to repeat the Port Royal lesson. Two or three of the whalers on their way down passed within sight of the harbor, and caused some excitement on shore, signals being raised and guns fired in evident expectation of attack. The Charleston Mercury, it is thought, would be pleasant reading on the morrow, but unhappily the newsboys neglected to bring it.

The first news on Thursday morning was that the rebels had blown up the light house during the night. It is evident they supposed the fleet to be men-of-war, and an attack intended. They could have no other object than to obstruct its entrance, for the destruction of the lighthouse was an advantage to the real purpose of the expedition, and had been contemplated as a part of its work. Less agreeable information followed, that the Ericsson had gone North without waiting for orders, or any way communicating with the flag-ship—an unmanly desertion which interferes with the plan of operations, and compels the crews of the sunken vessels to return to Port Royal, instead of going direct to New York. A rebel steamer comes half way over the harbor about ten o'clock to take a look at our fleet, but keeps well out of range. The work of the day goes rapidly on. All the whalers which have not arrived are in sight, and coming up well. Mr. Godfrey is sounding to determine the points at which the outside vessels are to be sunk, while the Cahawba is busily moving about, bringing some of the ships further in, and hailing each one that she passes. The Robin Hood, whose name appears economically on her quarter as the R. Hood, has been rather a favorite, and is chosen for the longest life and the most tragic fate of all the fleet. Each ship is ordered to unbend her sails. Mr. Bradbury hails the R. II.: "Robin Hood, ahoy! We shall send all the sails aboard you for the present. When you have them all, we shall take them on the Cahawba, and you will then sink your ship!" A remark which has a startling emphasis, one would think, on board the Robin Hood.

Guns are now heard from time to time during the day. Moultrie is said to be now a school of practice. Sumter is hidden from sight. The weather, which has favored us hitherto, is still every thing that could be wished; and the haze on the land side has dropped a veil between us and Charleston, so that they are left wholly to conjecture our movements. A few people can be seen at Morris Island, some of them negroes, at the water's edge, and even wading in, as if trying to come off to the ships. The Susquehanna, Mr. Bradbury tells us, has nine who escaped before the fight while she was blockading off Charleston. Six of them are sailors and fishermen, worth two thousand dollars a piece, and earning fifteen dollars a month for their masters. They readily went to work with the rest of the crew, were stationed at different guns during the bombardment at Port Royal, and fought throughout the action with perfect steadiness and unflinching courage.

Capt. Goldsborough of the Florida, one of the blockading squadron, came aboard during the morning with the news of the great fire in Charleston, of which some rumors had reached us at Port Royal. He was at anchor close in shore, and had the bearings of the city. The fire commenced on the night of the 11th and burned all night, the next day, and the night following. It was on the further side of the city, not near the water, the church steeples being plainly seen against the light. The wind was blowing fresh from the north-east, and the fire seemed to spread from the north-east to the south-west side of the city, and was awful in appearance and extent. Capt. Goldsborough also gave an account of a Swede, escaped from the Nashville at Bermuda, who described the condition of the city as one of great consternation and destitution. The people were constantly expecting an attack, were out of many kinds of provisions, and greatly dispirited. A rumor, current at Port Royal, says that a meeting was held in Charleston not long since, at which the question of abandoning the Confederacy was discussed, and several votes given in favor of that policy, among them that of the Mayor of the city.

Most of the day was spent in preparation. The Ottawa went in and anchored half a mile beyond the bay, while the Mohican took a position about a mile east of the channel and commanding its approaches from the city. Neither vessel is in reach of guns from the shore, unless possibly a shot from Morris Island might find them in range. But there are no guns on that island at present. Many are known to have been carried from the forts and batteries commanding the channel to defend the city on the land side. Three heavy batteries still remain on Sullivan Island, though the blockading vessels have seen some of the guns removed even from Sumter. In the course of the afternoon all the whalers arrived and were towed up toward the bar in a convenient position to be taken over. About five o'clock the Ottawa came out, and towed first the Tenedos and then the Leonidas to their positions on the extreme right and left of the line. In a few minutes after anchoring, the crew of the Tenedos left her side in two boats, and we knew the ship was sinking. The process was much slower than had been expected. When the plug was removed, the water rushed in a stream from one side of the vessel to the other, but there was only a single hole, and when that was reached inside, it entered from the outside with greatly diminished force. The Tenedos presently heeled over a little, and being on the bottom, lay there for the night. It was low water, and the sides still visible. The Leonidas not swinging into the right position, her plug was not drawn till the next morning. After the moon and tide had risen, six more vessels were towed in, four by the Ottawa and two by the Pocahontas. By half past eleven the tide had fallen too far to proceed with the work. These old ships draw from thirteen to seventeen feet, and can only get on the bar near the top of the tide.

The sinking of the fleet was intrusted to Capt. Charles H. Davis, formerly, from 1842 to 1849, chief of a hydrographic party on the Coast Survey, and ever since more or less intimately connected with it. It is remarkable that when, in 1851, an appropriation was made by the Federal Government for the improvement of Charleston harbor, and, at the request of South Carolina, a commission of navy and army officers was appointed to superintend the work, Capt. Davis was one of the commission, and for three or four years was engaged in these operations. The present attempt was of somewhat different character. The plan adopted by him may be easily understood by reference to a chart of the harbor, or by the following description: The entrance by the main ship channel runs from the bar to Fort Sumter, six miles, nearly south and north. The city is three miles beyond, bearing about N. W. The other channels are Sanford's, Swash, the North, and Maffit's, or Sullivan's Island, which need not to be particularly described. Only the latter is practicable for vessels of any draught, but all serve more or less to empty the waters discharged by the Ashley and Cooper Rivers. Over the bar, at the entrance of the main ship channel, is a narrow passage, through which vessels may carry eleven feet at low water; about seventeen at high water. The plan of Capt. Davis for closing the harbor proceeded on the following principles:

First.—The obstructions are to be placed on both sides of the crest of the bar, so that the same forces which have created the bar may be relied on to keep them in their places.

Secondly.—The bar is not to be obstructed entirely; for natural forces would soon open a new passage, since the rivers must discharge themselves by some outlet; but to be only partially obstructed, so that, while this channel is ruined, no old one, like Swash or Sanford, shall be improved, or a new one formed.

Thirdly.—The vessels are to be so placed that on the channel course it shall be difficult to draw a line through any part of it that will not be intercepted by one of them. A ship, therefore, endeavoring to make her way out or in, cannot do it by taking the bearings of any point of departure, as she cannot sail on any straight line.

Fourthly.—The vessels are to be placed checkerwise, and at some distance from each other, so as to create an artificial unevenness of the bottom, remotely resembling Hell Gate and Holmes's Hole, which unevenness will give rise to eddies, countercurrents, and whirlpools, adding so seriously to the difficulties of navigation that it can only be practicable by steamers, or with a very commanding breeze.

With reference to the second, it may be added, that no other channel now existing will be closed, at least for the present, for if such a plan were carried too far, the formation of a new channel would be inevitable. Moreover, for the purposes of the blockade, the obstruction of the main channel is entirely sufficient. Maffit's Channel is so difficult that the Nashville failed in an attempt to escape by it, although made by daylight and with two pilots on board, and if it should be rendered more easily navigable in any way, it can be effectually blockaded by a force which is unable to watch that and another exit at the same time. And as to sinking vessels in the narrowest portion of that channel, it could only be done by first silencing the batteries on Sullivan's Island, if not Sumter itself.

The execution of the foregoing plan was begun by buoying out the channel and circumscribing within four points the space where the vessels were all to be sunk, as follows:

S. W. † THE BAR. † N. E.
*

The distance between the points from S. W. to N. E. is about an eighth of a mile; the breadth perhaps half as much. It will be understood that it was no part of the plan to build a wall of ships across, but to drop them at a little distance from each other, on the principles above stated, closing the channel to navigation, but leaving it open to the water.

Work was resumed on Friday morning, the 20th, the Ottawa and Pocahontas bringing the ships to their stations. The placing of them was an operation of considerable nicety, especially as some of the vessels were so deep as to be with difficulty dragged on the bar, except at high water. A graver hindrance to their exact location was found in the imperfection of the arrangement for sinking, several of the ships remaining afloat so long after the plug was knocked out, that they swung out of position. They were, nevertheless, finally placed very nearly according to the plan. Great credit is due to Mr. Bradbury and Mr. Godfrey for the successful execution of so difficult an undertaking. The last ship, the Archer, closed the only remaining gap, and the manner in which Mr. Bradbury took her in with the Pocahontas and then extricated the latter from her perilous position, filled the fleet with admiration for his skillful seamanship and cool daring. The difficulty with which this light vessel, in broad daylight, with such a pilot, got through, is sufficient evidence of the thoroughness of the work and the total impracticability of the channel for ordinary navigation. By half past ten the last plug was drawn, and every ship of the sixteen was either sunk or sinking. Our expectations had been to some extent disappointed in the character of the expedition while it was in progress. None of the vessels wholly disappeared from sight, and those which heeled over farthest and were most under water, had subsided in a very deliberate manner. Still, it had been rather melancholy to see the old craft that had survived so many storms, stripped of their sails and towed in, one by one, to be sunk; and when the whole fleet was in position the scene was sufficiently novel and striking to satisfy any hopes. From the position in which the Cahawba lay, there was hardly an opening between the ships. An impassable line of wrecks was drawn for an eighth of a mile between the points above indicated. All but two or three were careened. Some were on their beam ends, some down by the head, others by the stern, and masts, spars, and rigging of the thickly-crowded ships were mingled and tangled in the greatest confusion. They did not long remain so. The boats which had been swarming about the wrecks picking up stores, sails, and whatever was to be got, returning heavily laden, were ordered back to cut away the masts. It was meant to leave nothing behind of use to the rebels. The Cahawba was not more than half a mile from the bar, and every thing was in full view from her deck. In half an hour from the time the boats left her side the mizzenmast of the Rebecca Simms went over the side, and was speedily followed by the main and fore. The next was the Richmond, whose three masts went by the board together, with three almost simultaneous reports, followed by the snapping of stays and shrouds, like irregular volleys of musketry, and the cheers of all the crews in the boats. As they fell, the sound of heavy cannon echoed down the bay, and for the next two hours the crash of falling masts was accompanied by the same salute. The guns of Sumter were the requiem of the fleet. Some staunch old ships died very hard, settling very slowly, and still upright when they had felt the bottom. It was hard to believe they were not afloat, and might yet sail away from their dreary fate, but the stately masts which one moment were standing in strength, the next are helplessly floating on the water, and had left only a hulk behind them. I think no one ever saw before the masts of fifteen ships cut away in a morning. When they were gone the desolation was almost complete; the picture more utterly ruinous and forlorn than can be conceived. One ship out of the sixteen, the Robin Hood, with upright masts, stood solitary sentinel over the wrecks. As evening came on she was set on fire, and gave us as the crown of our novel experiment, the rare sight of a ship on fire at sea. She was still burning when the Cahawba left for Port Royal at one in the morning.

The work of the expedition is a complete success. If it seemed sometimes a sad one even to us, with what feelings must the people of Charleston have looked on its progress? All the operations of the fleet were in full sight of Moultrie, Morris, and Sullivan Islands, and Sumter, but not a man could lift a finger to imperil or arrest them. The fire which swept the streets of half the city was a trivial misfortune compared with this final disaster. Its distant results it is impossible to foretell with certainty, for it is necessarily an experiment. An effort to blockade a tidal harbor like this, presented a wholly new problem, which was worked out by Capt. Davis with great ingenuity and scientific skill; and for his present success it is enough to know that all access by the main ship channel is effectually closed. The bar is paved with granite, and the harbor a thing of the past.

OPERATIONS ON THE UPPER POTOMAC.

A CORRESPONDENT of the New York Herald gives the subjoined account of the rebel operations on the Upper Potomac:

WILLIAMSPORT, Dec. 22, 1861.

From personal observation, your correspondent is convinced that the rebel troops which have been threatening this point were not, at the utmost extent, over seven thousand in number, and not over four pieces of artillery have been seen here within the past week. The militia, which might have numbered one thousand five hundred, refused from the first to cross the river, and on two occasions would not approach nearer than a mile.

The mill owned by the Colstons, at the south end of Dam No. 5, was set on fire on Thursday night by Captain Hampton, of the Pittsburg Light Battery, attached to the First Virginia regiment, and six men, volunteers, who went over in three skiffs. They found in the mill, besides the articles above mentioned, several shells, which were probably to have been sent over the next day.

On Friday the elegant brick residence of the Colstons, situated a hundred yards from the mill, was seen to be on fire, but a party of the First Virginia went over and extinguished it, after which they ransacked the outbuildings and brought off a considerable amount of plunder, such as overcoats, picket ropes, leggings, axes, besides a supply of poultry.

The enemy, excepting a few solitary sentinels posted on the distant hills, were not seen at this point until half-past three p. m., when they brought in sight their twelve-pound Parrott gun and threw a few shells toward the camp of the First Maryland, which had succeeded the Fifth Connecticut, then en route for Hancock. A ten-pound Parrott gun of Matthews' Pennsylvania battery, soon drove them out of sight. There was no loss on our side, and probably but slight loss on the other side, owing to the safe distance at which their gun was stationed.

While these things were in progress, a troop of rebel cavalry made their appearance opposite Williamsport, about one mile from the river. They remained in full view for several hours, going through a drill for the benefit of the spectators.

About noon a regiment of cavalry and another of infantry made their appearance near the ford at the Four Locks, two miles above Dam No. 5; but not liking the appearance of Colonel Kenly's preparations, they subsequently withdrew, without making any demonstrations.

In the afternoon information reached Colonel Leonard that the main body of the enemy were, with their wagons and boats, concentrating near Falling Waters, five miles from Dam No. 5, on the Virginia side, but, owing to the curves in the river, fifteen miles between those points on our side. Colonel Leonard immediately reinforced his pickets at the former point, keeping a section of a battery and the Twenty-ninth Pennsylvania as a reserve. A few shells were exchanged, and the enemy retreated, encamping out of sight, beyond the range of our Parrott guns.

Intelligence yesterday from the other side, goes to show that the rebel commander, having failed in all his attempts, withdrew his forces that morning toward Martinsburg, leaving only three or four companies as pickets, but not taking away his wagons and boats. All was comparatively quiet during the day.

HANCOCK, Dec. 20, 1861.

The Thirty-ninth Illinois, having received their arms, are now here, posted in a strong position, anxiously awaiting an opportunity to repel the enemy or cooperate with Gen. Kelly's advance guard, which now extends here, besides guarding the railroad all the way from Cumberland. The Fifth Connecticut and Knapp's battery are expected here in a day or two.

WILLIAMSPORT, December 21, 1861.

This morning a man named J. B. Wharton, residing at Clear Spring, approached one of the river pickets and offered him twenty-five dollars to carry a despatch to the other side. The soldier made the fact known to Colonel Leonard, who had him arrested, but not till he had destroyed the despatch. He is connected by marriage with ex-Senator Mason, now in Fort Warren. Colonel Leonard holds him as a spy.

This town has been under martial law for several months. Lieutenant John G. Hovey, of Company B, Massachusetts Thirteenth, is the provost marshal. Among his political prisoners are R. D. Shepperd, of Shepherdstown, son-in-law of Alexander Boteler; Abraham Shepard, a captain in the rebel army, and a considerable number of civil officers of Morgan County who undertook to execute the rebel laws.

Telegraphic communications are now received from Romney in four hours, including twenty miles of horse transportation. In a few days the wires will connect.

Lamon's brigade (the First Virginia regiment) consists of three companies of cavalry, now with General Kelly; four companies of infantry, and two companies of artillery, under Colonel Leonard. The latter have volunteered to act as riflemen until their batteries are received.

A specimen of forced marching occurred on Wednesday night. Colonel Kenly's First Maryland regiment left their camp near Frederick at twelve o'clock and arrived here at ten o'clock on Thursday morning—a distance of nearly twenty-eight miles. They stopped four times only on the route, resting fifteen minutes on each occasion.

DAM NO. 4, Dec. 22, 1861.

James Greenwood, a staunch Unionist, reports that there is but one guerilla company left to keep guard on the neck opposite, between this place and Falling Waters, four miles above. The remainder left for Martinsburg Saturday morning, excepting the wagons containing the boats. Mr. Greenwood's residence is a mile back of the dam in Virginia, where his family still reside. To his vigilance and patriotism are attributed the successful repulses of the enemy at this point. He is untiring in his exertions to give timely notice to our authorities of any movements of the enemy in this direction. He states that this guerilla company are always on the go, showing themselves at point after point, to convey the impression that the enemy have a large force there.

Your correspondent is indebted to Mr. Greenwood for much valuable information regarding localities and also for his services as a guide. From him I learn that during their attack here last Tuesday, two privates of the Hamtraucht Guard, of Shepherdstown, were killed, and probably several others. Tillotson Dugan, formerly jailer at Martinsburg, had his leg broke, and was otherwise slightly injured, at the same time. The latter is particularly obnoxious to the Unionists in this section.

A finely-finished coffin was seen en route from Martinsburg to Dam No. Five, on Thursday, leading to the impression that some officer of rank had been killed there.

Sylvester Stonebreaker, a resident of this precinct, but who was arrested and made to take the oath of allegiance by Gen. Negley last summer, made his escape into Virginia near this point last night. It is stated that this man gave the enemy intelligence that a large force under General Banks was preparing to cross at Williamsport and march upon Winchester, and probably inducing General Jackson to make the recent demonstration upon Williamsport.

Reports from Union men on the other side state that during the gallant repulse of last Tuesday by two companies of the Indiana Twelfth at this place, eight rebels were killed outright and twelve wounded. It will be recalled that the enemy had two small guns, and made an attack on our pickets there, who with their rifles compelled the former to beat a hasty retreat. This occurred at the time of the capture of Captain Williams and seven men, of the Twelfth Indiana. The attacking forces comprised detachments from Col. Ashby's command, under Captains Henderson, Mason, and Baylor.

Your correspondent was kindly furnished with recent copies of the Virginia Republican, published at Martinsburg, and a Richmond Dispatch of the 18th inst., by private Peter Messner of the Indiana Twelfth, a Hungarian patriot and refugee. This man is always on the alert in watching the enemy's movements, and is spoken of by his superiors as possessing untiring vigilance.

MERCERSVILLE, (on the river four miles below Dam No. 6,) Dec. 22, 1861.

This little hamlet is inhabited by persons engaged in the canal trade, but being, without an exception, strong Unionists, threats have been made by the enemy to destroy their habitations, causing considerable anxiety. This place is closely watched by the Indiana boys.

Last night the large barn occupied by John E. Conode, but owned by Samuel Stonebreaker, of Baltimore, was fired by an incendiary, and consumed, with nearly all its contents, including six horses, five cows, several tons of hay, five hundred bushels of wheat, hogs, agricultural implements, wagons, harness, &c. Loss twelve to fifteen thousand dollars. Mr. Conode is a Unionist, and was absent from home at the time.

SHARPSBURG, Dec. 22, 1861.

Captain Howes battery of the Fourth regular artillery arrived here to-night, en route from Romney to Washington. The men are perfect war dogs in appearance, having performed the most arduous duties under General Kelly, in Western Virginia.

AFFAIR AT NEWMARKET BRIDGE, VA.,

DECEMBER 22, 1861.

—THE following account of this affair was written by a correspondent at Fortress Monroe, under date of Dec. 23d:

The monotony of camp life here and at Camp Hamilton was broken yesterday by the intelligence that an action of some magnitude had taken place between a detachment of one hundred and fifty men of the Twentieth Regiment New York Volunteers, in command of Major Engelbert Schnoepl, and about seven hundred rebel soldiers. The particulars of the affair are as follows: Major Schnoepl having lost a man from his command the day before, left Newport News on Sunday morning, at eleven o'clock, at the head of one hundred and fifty men, and wended his way toward Newmarket Bridge in search of him. Arriving near the bridge, the Major detailed some of his men to cross the creek, and charged them to search closely in the woods; as the man might have hidden himself from the enemy, who was seen about the place for several days previous. The reserve was placed behind the Newmarket Bridge, (that is, where the crossing formerly was,) and another detachment at Sinclair's farm. The position of our men had scarcely been taken up, when the skirmishers of the Twentieth regiment discovered the enemy, consisting of three companies of infantry, among them one company of negroes, who appeared in the front, and made an attack. The left flank was attacked at the same time by two squadrons of cavalry, who came dashing along at a terrible gait, and with deafening yells. Our men stood their ground manfully, and, as soon as the proper moment came to fire, the cavalry being near enough, (about one hundred and fifty yards,) the order to fire was given, and obeyed with alacrity. The reserve drove the cavalry back, killing several of them while retreating. The skirmishers on the other side of the bridge were recalled by the Major, and owing to the bridge having been destroyed, they were compelled to swim across, hotly pursued by the enemy. The pursuit of the rebels was so determined that a hand-to-hand engagement occurred. The pursuing party was joined by the negro soldiers, and Captain Stumpf, of the Twentieth regiment, was struck upon the back with the butt end of a musket, but not severely hurt.

Major Schnoepl hereupon took a position, deploying his entire force along the river banks as skirmishers, and a terrible fight ensued. The enemy fired by companies, whereas the fire of our men on the pursuers was by files, and so rapid that one rebel officer and a private that stood on the opposite shore were killed, and tumbled into the river on their faces. The enemy hereupon withdrew as fast as possible, firing as they ran, leaving their dead and wounded behind. Six men of the Twentieth regiment were slightly wounded. The enemy's loss, as far as ascertained, was ten killed (three were picked up yesterday and seven to-day) and probably twenty or more wounded. One of the latter was brought off the field and treated by Assistant Surgeon Heiland, of the Twentieth regiment. Several horses of the cavalry were also killed. The corpses of the two men who fell into the creek floated off with the tide, and Acting Brigadier-General Weber sent a detachment off to pick them up, if possible, in order to have them decently interred.

One of the bodies only was found, and in the centre of the forehead was a hole from a bullet, which evidently was the cause of the death of this poor man. In his pockets were found a number of letters, and by these we ascertained that his name was John Hawkins, Adjutant of the Alabama Minute Men. On his coat the buttons bore the letters A. M. M. About thirty dollars in shinplasters were also found on his body, and a small bag, slung about his neck, contained nineteen dollars in gold. The bills were on the banks of North Carolina and Virginia, and as low as ten cents in value. The enemy had retreated about three hundred paces, and having again taken up a position, commenced to pour a terrible fire upon Major Schnoepl's command, without, however, doing any execution. The shower of bullets was so terrible that the houses, trees, and fences in the vicinity were completely riddled. The Turners, however, being greatly inferior in strength, kept a safe distance, and did not reply to this fire.

Immediately after the fight commenced, Major Schnoepl, seeing that he had to cope with a force three to one, sent off an orderly to Newport News, and also a messenger to Acting Brigadier-General Max Weber, for reinforcements. General Weber instantly despatched the six companies of the Twentieth regiment, in command of Lieutenant-Colonel Francis Weiss, stationed at Camp Hamilton, and, in company with Captain H. M. Burleigh, provost marshal of the camp, proceeded to the scene of action. Brigadier-General Joseph R. T. Mansfield also hastened to the battle-field, heading the remainder of the Twentieth regiment battalion at Newport News, and the Second regiment New York Volunteers.

The Union Coast Guard, in command of Colonel D. W. Wardrop, being anxious to participate in the affair, were in marching order in the shortest possible time, and marched to Hampton Bridge, where they were kept in reserve. Such was the anxiety of the Coast Guard to be in the fight that a number of them smuggled themselves into the ranks of the Twentieth regiment, and were only discovered after having crossed the bridge. The other regiments of General Weber's brigade were very much disappointed in not being able to march forward and mingle in the impending battle, as they thought.

When General Weber arrived at the scene of action the fight was over, and the enemy was still visible in the distance, on the retreat. General Weber, however, received information that several of the men belonging to Major Schnoepl's battalion were missing. He thereupon sent Lieutenant-Colonel Weiss in command of one company across Newmarket Bridge to follow the enemy in quest of the missing Turners. Colonel Weiss found three men who had been sent ahead as skirmishers before the action, and had the enemy, during the entire action, between them and the Twentieth regiment, but had remained undiscovered by the rebels, lying in the woods.

Shortly after the arrival of the reinforcement headed by General Weber, from Camp Hamilton, Brigadier-General Mansfield and staff, accompanied by the Second regiment N. Y. S. V., Colonel J. B. Carr, came to the scene of action. The enemy, however, had by this time probably reached a distance of five miles; and the bridges being taken up our men could not march in pursuit. Numerous trophies were captured by the gallant Twentieth. One beautiful saddle, belonging evidently to the horse of an officer that had been shot, was brought back to Newport News, as also numerous muskets, sabres, and pistols.

The engagement commenced about one o'clock, and lasted until after three. Acting Brigadier-General Weber and General Mansfield complimented General Schnoepl highly on his bravery and the steadiness of his men. The Twentieth regiment acted with the precision of regulars, and not the first man was found to waver or fall back. Dr. Heiland, Assistant Surgeon of the Twentieth regiment, accompanied the battalion, and proved himself not only a very efficient surgeon, but also a brave and courageous soldier. His ambulances and instruments were in readiness as soon as the first volley was fired; and to his care and skill it is owing that the few men wounded are in such good condition. None of our men who were hit by the enemy's shots are fatally injured. Julius Kumerle, of Company G, was shot in the arm; Christian Teubner, Company K, shot in the elbow and above the wrist; Orderly-Sergeant Rohr, of Company K, of Williamsburg, was wounded in the neck, but not fatally. The names of the other three I could not ascertain, they being at Newport News.

The rebels, although retreating before the steady fire of our men, behaved bravely; but their smooth-bore muskets, notwithstanding well handled, were no match against the sharp and deadly rifle, handled with murderous aim by the gallant Twentieth regiment.

The main fight began at Sinclair's farm; but the enemy's line extending to Newmarket Bridge, and the Twentieth regiment men being in a body there, the rebels concentrated their entire force at that point.

FLOYD'S ADDRESS TO HIS ARMY.

CAMP NEAR DUBLIN DEPOT, Dec. 26, 1861.

Soldiers of the Army of the Kanawha: The campaign in the western portion of this State is now, as far as you are concerned, ended. At its close you can review it with pride and satisfaction. You first encountered the enemy, five months since, on his unobstructed march into the interior of the State. From that time until recalled from the field, you were engaged in perpetual warfare with him. Hard contested battles and skirmishes were matters of almost daily occurrence. Nor is it to be forgotten that laborious and arduous marches, by day and by night, were necessary, not only as furnishing you the opportunity of fighting there, but of baffling the foe at different points upon the march of invasion. And it is a fact which entitles you to the warm congratulations of your General, and to the thanks and gratitude of your country, that in the midst of the trying scenes through which you have passed, you have proved yourselves men and patriots, who, undaunted by superior numbers, have engaged the foe, beaten him in the field, and baffled and frustrated him in his plans to surprise you.

On all occasions, under all circumstances, your patriotism and courage have never faltered nor forsaken you. With inadequate transportation, often illy clad, and with less than a full allowance of provisions, no private has ever uttered a complaint to his General. This fact was grateful to his feelings; and if your hardships have not been removed or alleviated by him, it has been because of his inability to do so. But your exemplary and patriotic conduct has not passed unobserved nor unappreciated by the Government in whose cause we are all enlisted. It is an acknowledged fact that you have made fewer claims, and imposed less trouble upon it, than any army in the field, content to dare and do, as becomes true soldiers and patriots.

Now, at the close of your laborious and eventful campaign, when you may have looked forward to a season of rest, your country has bestowed upon you the distinguished compliment of calling you to another field of action. That you will freely respond to this call your past services, so cheerfully rendered, furnish the amplest assurance. Kentucky, in her hour of peril, appeals to Virginia, her mother, and to her sisters for succor. This appeal is not unheeded by their gallant sons. The foot of the oppressor is upon her. Trusting in the cause of justice, we go to her relief, and, with the help of Him who is its author, we will do our part in hurling back and chastising the oppressor who is desecrating her soil.

Soldiers! your country, your friends whom you leave behind you, will expect you, in your new field of labor, to do your duty.

Remember that the eyes of the country are upon you, and that upon your action, in part, depends the result of the greatest struggle the world ever saw, involving not only your freedom, your property, and your lives, but the fate of political liberty everywhere.

Remember this, and, relying on Him who controls the destinies of nations, as of individuals, you need not fear the result. By order,

Brig.-Gen. JOHN B. FLOYD.

H. B. DAVIDSON,
Major and Asst. Adj.-Gen.

EXPERIENCE OF ALFRED ELY, M. C.,

WHILE IN PRISON AT RICHMOND, VA.

THE particulars of Mr. Ely's capture and a portion of his experience at Richmond are as follows: He was captured by a South Carolina company of infantry, about five o'clock p. m. of the day of the battle of Bull Run. He had stopped at a blacksmith's shop to have his carriage mended, and after that waited a while for Senator Foster, of Connecticut, who had gone out with him. While waiting he walked down toward a ravine, in which he saw a company of National troops skulking or in ambush, but, as he approached them, they receded, and just as Mr. Ely paused, to return to his carriage, a spent musket-ball struck the earth near him. He stepped behind a large tree near by to be out of danger, and continued his observations. In a moment a cannon-ball went crashing through the branches of the tree, and seemed to be felling the whole top upon him. By the time he recovered from this surprise, a company of soldiers, accompanied by two well-dressed officers, emerged from the woods near by.

On perceiving Mr. Ely, the two officers advanced and demanded his name. He answered, "Mr. Ely, of New York." The question followed, "Do you hold any civil office in the Government?" For the first time Mr. Ely said he felt he was in trouble. He replied that he was a member of Congress, and thereupon one of the officers clapped his hand upon him and declared him a prisoner, but assured him he should be treated with every consideration. They took him to their Colonel, and introduced him formally as "Hon. Mr. Ely, Member of Congress from New York." Instantly the Colonel drew a pistol, cocked it and levelled it at Mr. Ely's head, not two paces distant, and said, "You d—d rascal, I'll blow your brains out." The two officers who had arrested Mr. Ely instantly threw themselves upon the Colonel, forced his pistol back, and persuaded him away. They then apologized to Mr. Ely, saying they were ashamed of their Colonel, who was excited by drinking. This officer was Colonel Cash, and the officer who arrested Mr. Ely was Captain Mullins.

Mr. Ely was put with a large herd of prisoners, and all were started to Manassas. It was a march of seven weary miles, and the prisoners suffered tortures from the dust, heat, and thirst. At Manassas, which they reached at nine o'clock p. m., they were driven into an open space, surrounded thickly by guards, and all began to fall on the ground, then wet with a fast-falling rain, to seek rest and sleep. While Mr. Ely was preparing for a similar movement an officer rode into the yard and called aloud to know if "Mr. Ely, of New York, was present." Mr. Ely thought his time had come now to be shot. Nevertheless he answered the call, and was told that General Beauregard required him to come to his head-quarters. He followed the officer and reached the log house surrounded by a verandah, on the porch of which, with a single candle burning on it, was a table, and around the table sat Jeff. Davis, Beauregard, Extra Billy Smith, Porcher Miles, and other rebel officers, apparently reckoning up the result of the day's battle. Porcher Miles approached Mr. Ely, and expressed regret at his situation, but in a moment changed his tone, remarking that he had no opinion of Congressmen who would come to aid an army in invading a State. Mr. Ely was sent off to sleep in a barn, where he found the captured National officers.

The next day they were all started to Richmond. The morning after their arrival there Messrs. Bocock and Pryor, of Virginia, and Keitt and Boyce, of South Carolina, called upon Mr. Ely and stated that they should use their influence to secure his release. They made an application for this purpose to Jeff. Davis, who called a meeting of his Cabinet and the result was a consultation of several hours. The Cabinet generally favored Mr. Ely's release, but Davis, Benjamin, and Hunter were opposed to it, on grounds of public policy, and Walker, the Secretary of War, sent an elaborate communication stating that the Cabinet had come to the conclusion to deny the application.

Mr. Ely's arrival was announced by the Richmond papers and the whole press of the South, by which he soon became notorious. Visitors came to see him by hundreds, and it was not unfrequently the case that he had forty in his room at a time. Among them were Breckinridge, Humphrey Marshall, and ex-Minister Preston, who expressed the opinion that his being held in custody was an outrage. The Governors and Episcopal Bishops of most of the rebel States, were also visitors. In fact, they came to him from all parts of Jeff. Davis' dominions. Bouquets were sent him almost daily, and sometimes not less than a dozen a day. His meals too, nicely prepared, were sent him by the families of citizens. In his conversations politics were rarely alluded to, except he himself introduced the subject, when there was a free interchange of opinion.

The position of our hostages at Richmond is painful. Seven of them are confined in a room about twelve by fifteen feet in the Richmond jail, having two small windows, which admit but little light. They are permitted to see no person but the jailer and the negro who waits upon them, and are only permitted to leave their cells thirty minutes in the morning, and the same time in the afternoon, to walk in the narrow promenade between the jail building and the interwall. Their food consists of jail fair, sobby corn bread and boiled beef, and they are not permitted to have any thing better, even though they purchased it. When Mr. Ely was released he went, in company with Mr.

Faulkner, to the jail, and the two were granted the favor of an interview with the unfortunate officers. Mr. Faulkner expressed his surprise at this rigor, and he stated that such was not the treatment that the privateers received in New York and Philadelphia—that, although they were held for capital crimes, they were allowed to receive visitors, and to have all the comforts compatible with their safe custody. Mr. Ely thinks that, based upon this last statement by Mr. Faulkner, the rebel authorities will lessen the severity of their treatment.

Of the reckless and outrageous conduct of the rebel guards Mr. Ely speaks in terms of the utmost censure. He states that the prisoners had not been in the tobacco warehouse fifteen minutes before a bullet was fired into the window of one of our prisoners, who had ventured to put his head outside, and that in this way seven men had been wantonly killed. This conduct met with severe censure from all who were aware of the facts, but he was not apprised that any action had been taken to punish the offenders by the rebel authorities.

A few days before his release, Mr. Ely was again visited by Messrs. Bocock and Boyce, who stated that they intended to use their efforts to get him exchanged for Mr. Faulkner. The following day he saw announced in a Richmond paper that Mr. Faulkner had been released on his parole for thirty days, on condition that he should proceed to Richmond and procure in exchange for himself Mr. Ely, or, in the event of failing, to return to Fort Warren. He could hardly credit this, as he thought, had it been a fact, Bocock and Boyce would have been aware of it; but as each additional day's intelligence announced the progress of Mr. Faulkner, he became convinced that his release was near at hand.

Mr. Faulkner was received in Richmond with a perfect ovation, thirty thousand people being out. The following day Mr. Faulkner called upon Mr. Ely, and they had a pleasant interview, and, having both been prisoners, they could well appreciate their mutual position in the past. He announced that he had an interview with Jeff. Davis and his Cabinet, and he was happy to state that they had decided upon his release. The following day Gen. Winder came to the prison, and with much formality and dignity entered the room, and in the presence of Mr. Ely's fellow-prisoners presented him his release, and announced to him that he was a free man, and that he should be happy to see him at his own house. After the interchange of a few pleasant words Gen. Winder left.

A meeting of the Prison Association, of which Mr. Ely was the president, was at once convened, and Mr. Ely made a farewell address of nearly an hour in length. In it he rehearsed many of the incidents of the history in which they had borne a part, and that, notwithstanding their confinement, they had succeeded in making their hours pass cheerfully by, and he was gratified to announce that, though there was so much in the separation from their families and friends, in the want of common comforts and the annoyances they suffered to irritate them, there had never yet been the slightest difficulty during their whole five months' imprisonment. The deepest emotions were visible on the countenances of all of the members present, and nearly all were affected to tears. They parted with their president with mingled feelings of joy at his deliverance and regret at his departure.

At five o'clock in the afternoon, Mr. Faulkner again called at the prison with Gov. Letcher's carriage, and they proceeded to the Governor's mansion, where they dined together, and parted with a mutual expression of personal good feeling. Mr. Ely proceeded to Norfolk by railroad, being everywhere regarded with great interest, and thence reached Fortress Monroe and Baltimore.

FIGHT AT MOUNT ZION, MO.

GENERAL PRENTISS' OFFICIAL REPORT.

HEAD-QUARTERS ARMY OF NORTH MISSOURI, }
PALMYRA, Mo., Jan. 4, 1862. }

Capt. John C. Kelton, Assistant Adjutant-General Department of Missouri:

In pursuance of a special order, received on the evening of Dec. 23, 1861, I proceeded from Palmyra for Sturgeon on the morning of the 24th day of December, with five companies of the Third Missouri Cavalry, Col. John Glover commanding. I arrived at Sturgeon on the evening of the 26th. During the following day, having learned that there was a concentration of rebels near the village of Hallsville, in Boone County, I sent forward one company of cavalry, commanded by Captain Howland, to reconnoitre in that vicinity. Capt. Howland proceeded to Hallsville, but found no rebels. After proceeding about two miles beyond, his advance guard encountered the rebels in force, commanded by Col. Dorsey. Capt. Howland endeavored to draw off his company, having taken nine prisoners, but was overpowered. Being wounded, and having lost his horse, he was taken prisoner, with one private of his company. The remainder of his men made good their retreat, arriving at Sturgeon at nine o'clock P. M. Having learned the position of the enemy, I immediately ordered five companies of cavalry, Col. John Glover commanding, and five companies of sharpshooters, Col. Birge commanding, numbering in all four hundred and seventy, to march at two o'clock A. M., at which hour I started, and after marching a distance of sixteen miles, at eight o'clock A. M. of the 28th inst., I found one company of rebels, commanded by Capt. Johnson, in position, to the left of the road leading from Hallsville to Mount Zion. I ordered two companies of sharpshooters to pass to the rear of the enemy, and one of cavalry to dismount and engage them in the front, it being difficult for the sharpshooters to attain their position unperceived, the enemy manifesting a disposition to retire.

Col. Glover opened fire, and succeeded in killing five and capturing seven prisoners, from whom I learned the number and position of the main force. The enemy being posted at a church, known as Mount Zion, in Boone County, and one mile and a half in advance, numbering near nine hundred men, I ordered the cavalry under Col. Glover forward, accompanied by two companies of Birge's sharpshooters. Col. Birge, with them, arriving near the encampment, one troop of cavalry were ordered to dismount and engage the enemy. The sharpshooters were afterward ordered through a field on our right to skirmish with the enemy's left, and if possible drive them from the woods.

The firing being heavy, these three companies not being able to drive the enemy from his cover, Col. Glover, with his available force, moved in double-quick to the aid of the three companies engaged, and for half an hour longer the battle raged and became a hand-to-hand fight. Capt. Boyd's company of sharpshooters were in the midst of the rebel camp. Also, Major Carrick, with Company C, Third Illinois Cavalry. When Col. Glover arrived, the rebels could not stand the fire of our rifles, and retreated, leaving in our hands ninety (90) horses and one hundred and five (105) stand of arms. The battle was brought to a close about eleven A. M.

The reserve of two companies coming into action at the moment the enemy gave way, our victory was complete. After collecting our wounded, we proceeded to collect those of the enemy, placed them in the church, and sent for farmers and friends in the vicinity to render assistance. I collected wagons, made our wounded as comfortable as possible, and at four P. M. started for Sturgeon, where we arrived at nine P. M. Our loss in the battle of Mount Zion, and in the engagement of the evening previous, is as follows: Killed, three; slightly wounded, forty-six; severely wounded, seventeen. Rebel loss.—Killed, twenty-five; wounded, one hundred and fifty.

I have not been able to get a correct report of the rebel missing; but having taken thirty prisoners from the barn, their punishment is a severe one. Sixty of the rebels, with Captain Howland and four of our men as prisoners, arrived at the camp at night, twenty miles distant from the field of battle.

Permit me to mention that our entire force behaved gallantly. I make special mention of the following officers: Colonel John M. Glover, Major Carrick, Lieutenants Yates and Kirkpatrick, of the Third Missouri Cavalry; Colonel Birge, Captain Boyd, and Adjutant Temple, of Birge's Sharpshooters, and Lieutenant Edwin Moore, my aide. I also assure you that the men behaved with coolness and daring during the engagement.

Annexed please find list of names of our killed and wounded, and list of rebel wounded, and left by us at Mount Zion. I have the honor to be, Captain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. M. PRENTISS,
Brigadier-General.

MISSOURI "DEMOCRAT" ACCOUNT.

CAMP McCLELLAN, NORTH MISSOURI, }
STURGEON, Saturday, Dec. 28. }

One of the sharpest battles of the war was fought about eighteen miles from this place today. Colonel Birge, commanding his regiment of sharpshooters, had learned through his spies that a rebel camp was located at a place called Mount Zion Meeting House, in Boone County. General Prentiss having come to this place yesterday with about three hundred cavalry, under command of Colonel Glover, he accordingly organized a command of five companies of sharpshooters, under Colonel Birge, and two hundred cavalry, under Colonel Glover, and moved toward the rebel camp. Arriving within about a mile, General Prentiss ordered Colonel Glover to attack a detachment of about one hundred, which had taken position in a lane. He did so with great gallantry, killing a number, and taking several prisoners. The others fled to camp.

The order of battle was now assumed. Colonel Birge, with three companies of his command, advanced through the field, taking the left, joined the force of Colonel Glover, while General Prentiss held a position with a reserve of sharpshooters and a portion of cavalry. The attack was commenced in full force. The fire from the whole rebel line was terrific upon the right wing. For a moment our column wavered and fell back. Colonel Birge, observing this, rode into the most perfect storm of leaden hail that was ever met on battle-field, calling upon the men to rally. Colonel Glover, coming up with Major Temple, and uniting with Colonel Birge, soon rallied the whole line, and the fight became terrible. Captain Boyd, advancing from the right wing, poured in from the rifles, at every fire, messengers of death. Colonel Birge, with a daring that could not be excelled, led on the left wing. He soon saw the enemy on the right giving way, and, sounding the cry of victory, the whole line rushed forward, and the rebels fled in every direction. Colonel Birge pursued them, with Captain Boyd, for two miles, killing four, and taking five prisoners.

The rebel battle-ground—what a sight! After they had taken away, before they fled, seven wagon loads, it was then completely covered with dead and wounded. The rebels had taken chosen ground in the woods, where cavalry could not operate. Colonel Glover, however, dismounted his cavalry, and led them forward with his usual bravery. The coolness and daring of Colonel Birge, in rallying his men in the midst of a perfect tornado of bullets, is deserving of all the praise due to a gallant soldier; and what is more for him, during the three hours the battle raged, he never left his position in advance of the line, cheering his men on.

The rebels lost, in killed, wounded, and missing, not less than one hundred and fifty. Ninety horses were taken, and a load of arms, saddles, and all their camp equipage. Our loss, eight or nine killed, and about twenty-five wounded.

ACCOUNT OF THE BATTLE BY ONE WHO WAS ENGAGED IN IT.

On Monday, December 23d, six companies of Colonel Glover's cavalry received marching orders for the next day, with instructions to take their camp equipage and four days' rations. On the 25th they started, accompanied by Brig.-Gen. Prentiss and part of his staff, Col. Glover, Major Carrick, and Adjutant White being in command. They arrived at Sturgeon, on the North Missouri Railroad, at seven o'clock of the 26th, and half frozen—having made a forced march, in the face of a bitter cold wind, of twenty-eight miles, twelve of which being unbroken prairie, in less than ten hours. On his arrival, General Prentiss received information of the existence of a camp of rebels near a meeting house known as Mount Zion, about sixteen miles from Sturgeon.

On the morning of the 27th, he despatched Captain Howland, of Company A, with forty-six men of his command, under the direction of the man who gave the information, to find the whereabouts of the rebel encampment. This guide, by the way, had said that there were but sixty or eighty rebels at the place spoken of. Captain H., after having satisfied himself of the location of the rebel camp, began his march back to Sturgeon, when just at sunset he came upon the rear guard of the enemy, who appeared to have prepared themselves to cut him off on his return. Captain Howland immediately attacked and dispersed the rebels, taking seven prisoners, six horses, and nine guns. While he was engaged in securing his prisoners and horses, the main body of the enemy, some four hundred and fifty strong, who had heard the firing, made an attack on his handful of men, and after half an hour of desperate fighting, succeeded in dispersing them, wounding four—among them the gallant captain, and taking three privates and himself prisoners.

Immediately on the receipt of the news of the fight, brought by those who had escaped, General Prentiss gave orders for the six companies of cavalry, and three of Colonel Birge's sharpshooters, to be ready to march for the rebel camp at two o'clock on the morning of the 28th. Long before the hour arrived, the men were in the saddle, and eager for the march. We started at the hour, and arrived near the scene of the last night's fight just after daylight. Proceeding cautiously over the ground, we saw just beyond, in a lane, the advance guard of the enemy, about one hundred strong, who were disposed to dispute our further advance.

Lieut. Yates, of Company B, who led our advance guard, dismounted his men, and gave the rebels a taste of his Sharp's rifles. He had not opened fire but a few moments, when Captain Bradway was ordered to charge on the enemy with his company. This he did, and the rebels, who before this had broken, fled in all directions. Colonel Glover, who, with two companies of infantry and three of cavalry, had gone across an adjoining field, came up in time to assist in the pursuit, and captured some twenty of the rebels. The enemy lost in this encounter four killed and seven wounded. None of our men were killed or wounded.

As soon as we had secured the prisoners and attended to the wounded, Col. Glover ordered Major Carrick to take one of the prisoners, and a company of cavalry, and go and find the exact location of the enemy's camp; while the balance of the men were ordered to take position a half mile in advance of where we had met the rebel advance guard. The major took the prisoner, and thirty men, and soon found the stronghold of the enemy. Ordering the men to dismount, Major Carrick, with a bravery and daring worthy of a better fate, attacked the enemy six hundred strong. The men fought well and never flinched under the terrible fire of the enemy; until they were ordered to retreat by the Major. In this attack we lost three killed and several wounded, together with ten prisoners.

In the mean time Gen. Prentiss had ordered the infantry, under the command of Col. Birge, to advance under the cover of a cornfield, deploying as skirmishers, and attack the enemy on the north or rear, while Col. Glover, with the entire force of cavalry, made an attack on the east and south, thus almost completely surrounding the enemy and rendering his capture certain. But for reasons unknown to the writer, the sharpshooters failed to attack from the cornfield and woods, instead of which they passed through the field and came out into the lane immediately in front of Col. Glover. This deranged the order of battle; and the consequence was, that the sharpshooters and cavalry became mingled in the final charge. Col. Glover pressed forward with his men, until a shower of bullets warned him that it was time to dismount, as bushwhacking was the order of the day. The men dismounted, and the battle soon became general. From the woods, where the enemy was hidden from view, came a perfect hail-storm of bullets. From Mount Zion, where the main body of the enemy was posted, came a continuous roar of fire-arms. From the lane, the open field, and the cornfield, the sharp crack of Sharp's rifles blended with the louder report of the Enfield and Dimmick. Our men fought like heroes, and never a man of them flinched. There was not a moment, from the beginning of the battle to the end, when the fate of the day was undecided.

After the firing had lasted about half an hour, Col. Glover gave the order to charge on the enemy. "Come on, men," said he, "let us fight them in their own way—let us bushwhack them." With a wild cheer the men followed the lead of their intrepid commander. Springing over the fence, they were soon face to face with the enemy. Our foes largely outnumbered us, and had the advantage of position; they were brave men, and fought well. But their bravery and numbers availed but little against the daring and impetuosity of our men. As soon as we got into the woods where we could see the rebels, our rifles began to tell with terrible effect on their ranks. Men fell in all directions, until the ground was fairly covered with dead and wounded. For ten minutes after we entered the woods, the enemy held their ground, and then broke and fled in every direction. We followed them for three-quarters of a mile beyond the church and then gave up the chase. From first to last, the battle lasted about two hours.

Thus ended one of the most severely contested and bloody battles that has been fought in Missouri, in proportion to the numbers engaged. Our force consisted of six companies of cavalry, numbering about three hundred, and parts of three companies of Col. Birge's Sharpshooters—say one hundred and fifty men. Thus our whole force did not exceed four hundred and fifty, men and officers. To this the rebels opposed seven hundred or seven hundred and fifty men, nearly all of whom were armed with double-barrelled shot guns, making their numbers equal to fifteen hundred men. If they had fired low, with this immense superiority, they would have annihilated us. But, fortunately for us, they fired too high, and most of their shots passed over our heads.

Our loss was three killed, three mortally and about fifteen slightly wounded. The loss of the enemy, as far as I could ascertain, was twenty-one killed and over one hundred wounded. Forty of the wounded were left on the field and in the church. Eight of these have since died, and I was told by Dr. Brown, who was called to attend the wounded, that there would but very few of the forty recover, their wounds being nearly all mortal. Among the wounded was Major Breckinridge and Adjutant Henderson. An hour after the battle Adjutant Henderson came in with a flag of truce, and asked the privilege of burying their dead and attending to their wounded. This was granted by Gen. Prentiss.

The enemy were commended by Col. Dorsey, Lieut.-Col. Kent, and Major Breckinridge. We took twenty-seven prisoners, one hundred and five guns, and a large number of horses, blankets, powder-horns and shot-bags. After attending to our wounded, we began to return to Sturgeon, which we reached at nine o'clock the same night.

THE FIGHT AT SACRAMENTO, KY.

A SECESSION ACCOUNT.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Nashville Banner gives a spirited account of the fight at Sacramento, Ky., between a number of Confederate cavalry, headed by Colonel Forrest, of Mississippi, and three hundred Hessian cavalry, under Major Murray. The writer, after detailing a few preliminaries, says:

Our men immediately put off in pursuit toward Calhoun, and in a short time came up with the enemy and opened fire upon his rear. The enemy wheeled and fired, but in a few moments fled in the wildest confusion, with our gallant band in hot pursuit. Never were men more terribly in earnest than was this Lincoln cavalry in their efforts to get away, and never were men more terribly in earnest than were our men in the pursuit. "Over the hills and far away" they flew, the capes of their large blue overcoats flying in the breeze, and reminding the pursuers of a flock of buzzards suddenly scared up from their feast. At first, their horses being fresh, they gained on us, but pretty soon it became evident that we were nearing them. Pistols loaded, sabres, and overcoats were strewn along the road. Ichabod Crane on his redoubtable steed Gunpowder, or Tam O'Shanter on his old gray mare when the witches got after him, never came so near flying as did these valorous Kentucky Yankees. Here they went, helter-skelter, our men after them, and here and there passing in the road men whom the unerring aim of our gallant boys had caused to bite the dust. The race through Sacramento was beautiful. As we went through that village in hot pursuit, the men of the village threw up their hats and shouted, "Go it, boys—catch 'em and give 'em hell." The women, God bless them, waved their handkerchiefs, and shouted our gallant boys on to the charge. Lieut.-Col. Love, who had gone out as a guide to the expedition, it is said had to run through Sacramento, and bets of two to one were freely offered that he would be the first to Calhoun. What became of the gallant Major Murray, who commanded the expedition, we couldn't tell, but it is supposed that he was outdistanced in the race, and must have made fine time. The gallant and dashing Starnes was in front of the charge, and Capt. Bacon fell from his well-directed pistol shot. Bacon shot at Starnes several times and made a pass at him with his sabre, leaving a mark on Starnes' hat; but, leveling a pistol at him, Starnes soon brought him to the ground. Bacon died like a man, and, to his credit be it spoken, used every effort to rally his flying men. He is the only man of the enemy who behaved with any gallantry in the fight. On our return, having chased the Kentucky Hessians within four miles of their camp, Bacon was lying on the road side, not yet dead, but it was evident that he must soon breathe his last. He asked for some water, which was given, and he was kindly removed to a neighboring house, when he exclaimed, "Well, could I have expected such kindness under the circumstances?" He was a gallant man, and deserved a better fate than to have fallen in the vain attempt to rally such a crowd of cowards. In the charge, Col. Starnes was several times in the very midst of the retreating enemy, heedless of danger and insensible to fear. Col. Forrest fought with reckless intrepidity and daring, laying several of the enemy low with his own arm. He and Starnes in the very front of the charge, dealt their blows right and left with telling effect. The enemy lost some twenty killed, and about the same number wounded and taken prisoners—among the latter Capt. Davis, of Louisville, Kentucky, formerly of Robertson County, Tennessee. We lost only two killed—Capt. Merriweather, while gallantly leading the charge at the head of his company, and W. H. Terry, a private in Capt. McLemore's company from Williamson County, who fell by a sabre thrust while fighting gallantly. We had three wounded. Altogether, it was a brilliant affair. Our men behaved with great gallantry. The enemy's force consisted of about three hundred picked men who had volunteered on the expedition to capture Starnes. To cover their shameful and disgraceful and cowardly retreat, I have no doubt they reported when they got back to camp that they were pursued by at least a thousand men. I have no doubt they thought so, for they were certainly too much alarmed to compute numbers calmly, and evidently thought the very devil was after them, from the way they ran.

AFFAIR IN HAMPTON ROADS, VA.,

DECEMBER 29, 1861.

A REBEL ACCOUNT.

We have the satisfaction of spreading before our readers to-day some of the particulars of a spirited and dashing achievement on the part of Commodore Lynch, of the Confederate Navy, on board of his flagship, the Sea Bird, which gallant little steamer mounts a 32-pounder forward, and a 12-pounder aft.

Commodore Lynch went down to Sewall's Point on Saturday night, and took a position under the guns of our battery at that place, where she remained all night until Sunday morning, when she espied the Federal steamer Express making out from Newport News, with a transport schooner in tow. She got round the point of Newport News with her charge, when our gallant commodore put chase after them, and ran them toward Old Point.

The Sea Bird opened fire on the Express, and after one or two discharges the latter cut aloose from her tow and left her. The position of the schooner where the Express left her was well over in the enemy's lines, but even that consideration did not deter the victor from securing his prize. He dashed into her and tackled on, and in making his way back eight gunboats and an armed transport put out for him from Old Point and Newport News, with the purpose of cutting him off. But it appears they were just five or six minutes too late, and in chasing her she kept up a continual fire upon them, turning around every time to give them the best she had, the forward rifled 32-pounder. The sport became so intensely interesting to the Yankees that they waded in a little beyond their depth, and woke up the boys on Sewall's Point, who opened fire on them. They finding further pursuit of the commodore vain, turned their attention on the batteries that were peppering them so unmercifully. And now the matter began to wear somewhat the appearance of earnestness, as though the boys were going to work, even allowing it was Sunday morning, and going on to church time. The batteries continued to fire at the Federal vessels, which did their best toward silencing them; but the job was somewhat too extensive for them, and withal so warm, that they speedily determined to give Sewall's Point a very wide berth. They got well out of range of our shot as soon as they could, but not until three of them had got a dose which took the starch out of them.

The gunboats fairly rained the shot and shell at the Sewall's Point battery while they did have the courage to continue the engagement, which, altogether, including the chase after the Sea Bird, lasted two and a half or three hours. Several hundred shot and shell were fired at our battery, and not a single person received even a scratch.

An old rooster, however, which happened to get in the way was made into a roaster for his pains, as we are informed by a communication from a friend who was on the ground. We annex his communication:

SEWALL'S POINT, Sunday, December 29, 1861.

MR. EDITOR: Eight gunboats and an armed transport attacked a little Confederate gunboat this morning, and engaged this battery about two hours. We answered with some of the guns from our battery. Nobody hurt but one fine rooster, which was killed. The men were very cool. The rooster was duly prepared, roasted, and eaten by some of the boys. A rare treat for Christmas times.

What glorification for Yankeeedom—one rooster killed; none wounded or missing. This brilliant affair will be heralded in capitals in the New York Herald and other truthful prints. S.

The Sea Bird proceeded on her way up to the city with her prize in tow, and we learn it is the schooner Sherwood, which formerly belonged to George Booker, Esq., on Back River, and was stolen from him sometime since by the Federals, and has been since used as a water transport between Newport News and Old Point. She was then carrying a supply of water to the Hessians at Old Point. It was thus a water haul; but that detracts nothing from the honor of the achievement, which may justly be classed as one of the most brilliant that has taken place in the two armies since the war began.

During the engagement between the gunboats and the Sewall's Point battery, the Sawyer gun at the Rip Raps opened fire and threw shell at the battery on Sewall's Point.

We learn that the gunboats threw several shell or shot at the battery on Craney Island, and received a prompt reply from that direction.

We are pleased to record the fact, that the boys at our batteries took deliberate aim with each gun they fired, and handled their irons with a masterly skill, taking their time in each case.

It has been reported, though with what truth we are unable to say, that the Sea Bird struck the Express and set her on fire, and that she was afterward put out without injury.

COMMODORE LYNCH'S REPORT.

The following is an extract from the report of Capt. Lynch to the Navy Department:

The water being too low in the Chesapeake and Albemarle Canal for this vessel (the Sea Bird) to proceed to Roanoke Island, we last evening steamed down and anchored in the bight of Craney Island. This morning, a little before daylight, we weighed anchor and stood across to Newport News. About half past seven A. M. an enemy's steamer passed out of James River, with a schooner in tow, and steered for Fortress Monroe. We immediately gave chase, when she cut the schooner adrift, and carried a heavy head of steam, in order to get under the cover of numerous men-of-war lying off the fortress. We were fast closing in with her, however, when the explosion of our second shell set her on fire. Believing her destruction was certain, knowing that her crew could be rescued by boats from the vessels not far distant from her, and it being useless for this vessel to approach her, we steered for and took the abandoned schooner in tow. In the mean time one large steamer from Newport News, and ten others from Hampton Roads and the fortress, were making their way toward us, when an exciting scene took place; we endeavoring to carry the prize into port, and they making every effort to intercept, and, by constant firing, disable us. Many shells from the ships and the fortress exploded quite near us, and four or five passed immediately over the deck. We succeeded in fighting our way through, with the prize in tow, without the slightest injury to either, and gratefully attribute our escape to something more than chance or human agency. We know that a large steamer was struck once and a smaller one twice, by our shot; the former was reported to be seriously injured. The prize is a large schooner, her hold coated with zinc, and filled with water for Fortress Monroe.

NEW YORK "HERALD" ACCOUNT.

FORTRESS MONROE, December 29, 1861.

The usual monotony of camp life at this point was broken to-day by a discharge of considerable gunpowder on the part of the navy rendezvousing at Hampton Roads. The steamboat Express, from Newport News, which place she left at seven A. M., had in tow the schooner Sherwood, belonging to the quartermaster's department, for the purpose of hauling water, and when about half way between the fort and her starting place the captain saw a steamboat shoot out from Sewall's Point. Having a flag hoisted from the stern, it was thought that the hostile craft bore a flag of truce, and the Express, instead of lying-to, proceeded somewhat out of her course toward the shore of Sewall's Point. Before the passengers were aware of the danger threatening them, a shot came whizzing in uncomfortable proximity to the smoke-stack, while another went over the hurricane deck. The captain of the Express understanding the state of affairs, at once gave orders to cut loose from the schooner, and the engineer put on an extra pressure of steam, and paddled as fast as possible to this place. The Express at once proceeded to the flagship Minnesota, to inform Commodore Goldsborough of the facts, when the flag-officer immediately signalized several gunboats to get under way.

The schooner, in the mean time, having been left to its fate, was taken in tow by the Northampton, (the name of the rebel gunboat,) and made off with toward Craney Island. The crew of the schooner, on finding themselves in such close proximity to gunpowder, lowered the lifeboat, and in that rowed back to Newport News for dear life. The United States gunboats Morse, Delaware, Louisiana, Captain Murray; Lockwood, Captain E. W. Graves; Whitehall, Captain Balsier; Narraganset, and Young America, Captain Hamilton, were sent in pursuit of the rebel marauder.

The rebel gunboat Wm. Selden now came to assist the Northampton, and both of them made a stand for a few minutes. The schooner, however, was still kept in tow, and in that position our boats opened fire on the rebels. The shots were returned, but the daring rebel crafts darted off and were soon after under the guns of the batteries at Sewall's Point. Our gunboats then opened fire on the last-named batteries, having taken position to within about three miles of the shore, and about twenty shells were landed inside of the rebel intrenchments, with what effect, however, we are unable to determine.

The "duel at long range" lasted about two hours. The firing caused the most intense excitement. The docks and water-fronts facing the scene of action were thronged with spectators, and the ramparts of the fort were lined with officers and men anxiously watching the bombardment. After powder, balls, and shells enough had been expended, the order "to cease firing" was signalized, and the six gunboats returned to their stations. The official report I have not been able to obtain as yet.

This little episode, short and bloodless as it turned out, on our part at least, should not fail to be a lesson to all concerned. Here, in broad daylight, the regular boat plying between two points occupied by our forces is attacked by the rebels, who daringly approached to within almost point-blank range of the guns of the war vessels and captured a schooner worth about two thousand five hundred dollars, and is allowed to escape. We have at the present moment quite a flotilla of gunboats in this harbor, but they are all huddled together. If only one of them had been stationed a little nearer Newport News, in a hollow termed "Holmes' Hole" the rebels would not have dared to venture on such an expedition. None of our gunboats were within six miles of the firing on the Express, and before this vessel could run that distance, inform the Commodore of the facts, and this official order the boats under way, at least one hour elapsed, and the intrepid rebels accomplished all they desired.

Besides several thousand gallons of good water on board of the Sherwood, a new pump, worth three hundred dollars, fell into the enemy's hands. It is to be hoped that the Navy Department at Hampton Roads will be more on the qui vive, and that our efficient Commodore will allow those vessels having guns of heavy calibre on board to plant an occasional shell into the enemy's stronghold on the opposite shore.

What the Department at Washington say to this affair is beyond my comprehension; but I do know that the same is viewed as disgraceful in the extreme by all parties on this point. The passengers, and, in fact, all hands on board of the Express, behaved in a shameful manner, with the exception of a midshipman of the United States frigate Congress, and a sick Zouave coming to the General Hospital, both of whom behaved in a gallant manner, and were the only ones on board who had presence of mind to hoist the American ensign, which had not been flying at the time she left Newport News. It is to be hoped that the squadron will do something now to avenge the outrage committed so wantonly on an unarmed vessel.

THE DESTRUCTION OF A LIGHTSHIP
ON THE NORTH CAROLINA COAST.

COMMANDER GLISSON'S REPORT.

UNITED STATES STEAMER MOUNT VERNON,
OFF WILMINGTON, N. C., Dec. 31, 1861.

SIR: I have to report to you that, having observed that the rebels made use of a lightship, which was formerly on the Frying-Pan Shoals, as a beacon for guiding vessels in and out of the harbor, and for the purpose of annoying us by hoisting lights at night, I determined to take advantage of a hazy night, with the wind off shore, to effect her destruction. I therefore sent the cutter and gig last night, at midnight, to destroy her, if possible. The cutter I placed in command of Acting-Master Alick Allen, with Mr. John P. Foote, coast-pilot, and a crew of five men, who were all well armed. This boat was also well supplied with combustible materials for the purpose of firing the vessel. The gig was under the command of Acting-Master Henry L. Sturges, and had a crew of six men, who were also well armed. In going in this boat took the lead, and while the cutter was alongside the light vessel she laid off on her oars, ready to support her in the event of an attack being made. From the officers in command of the boats I gather the following particulars:

The boats pulled in together until they got within a short distance of the light vessel, on the off side of her from Fort Caswell. The cutter then pulled under the starboard quarter of the vessel, and by the assistance of a rope found hanging there, two officers, a boatswain's mate and a quartermaster, climbed on board. They found that she was quite deserted, and that carpenters had recently been at work on her, putting up additional berths, and cutting gunports. She was pierced for eight guns, six broadside, and two after guns, and had the fighting bolts in the deck, and every thing nearly ready for mounting the guns. It was evidently intended to arm her for harbor defence. Combustibles were collected, saturated with turpentine, and set on fire. The fire was discovered from the fort, which was so near that voices could be heard giving the alarm, but no effort was made to molest the boats until they were out of sight. The fort then opened fire from her great guns in the direction of the boats, but they were far removed from harm's way, and we had the pleasure of seeing the vessel burn to the water's edge, and at this time not a vestige of her is to be seen.

It gives me pleasure to state that every officer and man in this ship was a volunteer for this expedition. Much credit is due to the officers and men of this expedition, for the able manner in which they discharged this hazardous duty.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. S. GLISSON,
Commanding U. S. N.

To Flag-officer L. M. GOLDSBOROUGH,
Commanding the Atlantic blockading squadron.

PROCLAMATION OF ZOLLICOFFER.

BRIGADE HEAD-QUARTERS,
BEACH GROVE, KY., Dec. 16, 1861. }

To the People of Southeastern Kentucky:

The brigade I have the honor to command is here for no purpose of war upon Kentuckians, but to repel those Northern hordes who, with arms in their hands, are attempting the subjugation of a sister Southern State. They have closed your rivers, embargoed your railroads, cut off your natural and proper markets, left your stock and produce on hand almost valueless, and thereby almost destroyed the value of your lands and labor. We have come to open again your rivers, to restore the ancient markets for your produce, and thereby to return to you the accustomed value of your lands and labor. They have represented us as murderers and outlaws. We have come to convince you that we truly respect the laws, revere justice, and mean to give security to your personal and property rights. They have forced many of you to take up arms against us. We come to take you by the hand as heretofore—as friends and brothers. Their Government has laid heavy taxes on you to carry on this unnatural war—one object of which is openly avowed to be to set at liberty your slaves, and the ensuing steps in which will be to put arms in their hands, and give them political and social equality with yourselves. We saw these things in the beginning, and are offering our hearts' blood to avert those dreadful evils which we saw the abolition leaders had deliberately planned for the South. "All men must have the ballot or none—all men must have the bullet or none," said Mr. Seward, the present Federal Secretary of State. How long will Kentuckians close their eyes to the contemplated ruin of their present structure of society? How long will they continue to raise their arms against brothers of the South struggling for those rights, and for that independence common to us all, and which was guaranteed to all by the Constitution of 1787? For many long years we remonstrated against the encroachments on the rights, and the insecurity to that property thus guaranteed, which these Northern hordes so remorselessly inflicted upon us. They became deaf to our remonstrances, because they believe they had the power, and felt in every fibre the will to "whip us in." We have disappointed them. We have broken their columns in almost every conflict. We have early acquired a prestige of success which has stricken terror into the Northern heart. Their "grand armies" have been held in check by comparatively few but stern-hearted men; and now they would invoke Kentucky valor to aid them in beating down the true sons of the South who have stood the shock, and in bringing common ruin upon Kentucky and her kindred people. Will you play this unnatural part, Kentuckians? Heaven forbid! The memories of the past forbid! The honor of your wives and daughters, your past renown, and the fair name of your posterity, forbid that you should strike for Lincoln and the abolition of slavery, against those struggling for the rights and independence of your kindred race! Strike with us for independence and the preservation of your property, and those Northern invaders of your soil will soon be driven across the Ohio.

F. K. ZOLLICOFFER,
Brigadier-General.

THE CAPTURE OF BILOXI, MISS.

BOSTON "JOURNAL" ACCOUNT.

SHIP ISLAND, Thursday, Jan. 2, 1862.

THE expedition to Biloxi was eminently successful, resulting in the surrender of the place to the Federal forces, the reduction of the fortification, and the capture of a schooner laden with lumber, and all without firing a gun.

The expedition consisted of the United States gunboats Water Witch, Lieut. Aaron K. Hughes, commanding; New London, Lieut. Abner Reed, commanding; and the Lewis, Lieut. Thomas McKean Buchanan, commanding. In addition to the regular officers and crews of the several steamers, detachments of forty-five marines from the guards of the flagship Niagara and the steamer Massachusetts, and commanded by Lieut. George Butler, of the Niagara, and two boats' crews from the Massachusetts, accompanied the expedition, which was a purely naval enterprise, the whole being under command of Commander Melancton Smith, of the Massachusetts.

The Lewis was formerly employed as a freight and passenger boat between New Orleans and Mobile, and, since her capture by the New London, has been fitted up as a gunboat. She carries a crew of one hundred men, and her armament consists of one twenty-pound Parrott gun, rifled, two twelve-pound rifled guns for James' projectiles, one twenty-four-pound Dahlgren howitzer, and two twelve-pound howitzers. She is a lofty steamer, and offers altogether too prominent a mark for the enemy. Being of light draught, however, she can approach nearer the track usually taken by the gunboats and steamers of the enemy.

The expedition got under way at seven o'clock on the morning of the 31st ult., and steamed across the Mississippi Sound toward Biloxi. The weather was fine, and every thing bid fair for a brush with the enemy, inasmuch as previous reconnoissances had discovered a battery of apparent strength near the lighthouse, and a few weeks previous armed men had been seen there.

As the steamers approached the place, which like all the towns of any note along the Georgia coast, is incorporated, the inhabitants were seen hurrying to and fro in evident alarm at the demonstration.

The Lewis steamed up to within about a mile of the "city," while the New London and Water Witch, owing to their heavy draft, were compelled to anchor outside, but within range to cover the movements of the advance force. Not succeeding in drawing the fire of the battery, Commander Smith decided to anchor the fleet, and proceeded with a flag of truce to the shore.

Commander Smith, accompanied by Acting-Master Ryder, of the Massachusetts, landed at the wharf, near the light, and were met by two or three men, of whom they requested to see the Mayor of the city. A crowd soon collected, one of whom was armed with a double-barrelled gun, an old cavalry sword, and a silver-mounted Colt's revolver, both of which he persisted in wearing on the same side of his belt, and appeared to be the commander of the battery. While some of the citizens went off in quest of the chief magistrate, some twenty-five or thirty men, armed with shot guns, were seen lurking around the battery and parade-ground in the rear. The sailors entered into conversation with the citizens, some of whom pretended to be loyal, and said they were afraid to express their Union sentiments for fear of being lynched. While the husbands and children were on the wharf, awaiting the result of the demonstration, a few frightened wives and mothers were seen peering from behind buildings, out of windows, and from the cover of the shrubbery, with their hoods drawn over their faces, looking with intense anxiety upon the group at the pier. The citizens, male and female, gathered in knots on the principal street, and discussed the subject of the invasion.

They were shy at first, and kept aloof from the Federal officers; but seeing no harm offered them, they gradually became communicative, and when asked the news, said that telegraphic messages had been received announcing that England had declared war against the United States. Finding this intelligence did not surprise the officers, they acknowledged that the reports which they received were very contradictory, and in evidence, said they had heard that there were six thousand troops on Ship Island, and again that there were forty thousand.

After a short time the Mayor, an old man about sixty, made his appearance, armed with a shot gun, which he left at the head of the pier, seeing that his visitors wore only their side-arms. He inquired the object of the visit, to which Commander Smith replied: "I have come to demand the surrender of the town, with all the fortifications, battery, and vessels in the waters, and all military and warlike stores." His honor inquired what length of time would be allowed them to remove the women and children. Capt. Smith replied that there was no necessity for the women and children retiring unless they intended to offer resistance, and he would give him one hour in which to consult the citizens on the subject. The Mayor wanted an armistice of twenty-four hours, but finding Capt. Smith inflexible, he went off to confer with his constituents, returning at the expiration of the hour.

The Mayor, on his return, was accompanied by Judge Holley, Dr. Frazer, a French physician, and several citizens. The Mayor, addressing Commander Smith, said: "Sir, I surrender you the town of Biloxi and the battery, owing to the utter impossibility of defending it; but I cannot guarantee you any safety outside the limits of the town." Commander Smith assured the Mayor and the citizens that we came for the purpose of removing the guns from the battery, and at the same time to protect them in their lawful occupation. He had no desire or orders to interfere with their institutions or to land troops. He told them that he intended to make good Union men of their citizens in spite of themselves, but the Mayor replied: "Don't flatter yourself;" and a rabid secessionist—the cavalry officer—added: "Old Abe Lincoln will never make a Union man of me; I'll pack myself and wife in a buggy and be off for New Orleans." Some of the other citizens manifested a similar spirit, but, on being shown the folly of their course, concluded to remain.

After examining the battery, Commander Smith returned to the Lewis and ordered away two large boats, the same which were brought out on the Constitution, and they proceeded, under command of Acting-Master Ryder, accompanied by Acting-Master Merriam and Midshipman Woodward, of the Lewis, to the wharf, for the purpose of bringing off the guns. The crews dismounted two guns—one light and one heavy six-pounder—and carried them to the boats, and returning took off the carriages—both pivots of "home manufacture"—and platforms. While thus engaged, the Union sailors were watching a crowd of about twenty boys and men, mostly foreigners, who sat around; and as the guns were being removed inquired sarcastically: "We expect a thousand men here; will you come and take 'um then as easy? Do you think you can take the guns at New Orleans as easy?" As the work of dismantling the fort progressed, the rebels grew generous, and exclaimed, seeing the carriages and platforms going, "You'd better take these planks and the coffee-bags—we've got a plenty of them."

The battery was constructed of bricks, flanked and faced with sand-bags. It was capable of mounting six or eight heavy guns, but unless more skill is displayed in mounting the batteries in other places than was evinced here, they will not prove very effective in a cross-fire. The guns in this battery were placed upon stationary beds, which received the recoil only in a direct line of fire, any deviation from which would dismount the piece.

That the fears of the people of the South have been worked upon by the rebel leaders, is evident from the intense alarm occasioned by the landing of the Federal force at Biloxi. The deepest anxiety was depicted on every countenance, and the people betrayed by their looks and conversation their fears that all the horrors of a sacked and pillaged town awaited them. The women especially were in the highest state of frenzy, and clung to the skirts of the Mayor for protection and advice as he was going to consult the citizens. They had been told that the Northern soldiers were a set of barbarians, and given to pillage and rapine. But not even a pin's value was taken by the sailors from any private dwelling, not an indecent word spoken, and no intrusion or insult offered to any of the citizens, whose astonishment at the behavior of our men was only equalled by their previous fright.

The people appeared to be in a very destitute condition, some wanting shoes, some clothing, and others bread. One smart-looking lad said to his mother, in the hearing of the officers, "I don't care if I do get taken prisoner," to which the other replied, "Nor I either, for then I shall be sure to get enough to eat." Another chap of rebellious tendencies said: "I've heard some talk of starving us into submission, but they'll have to put a blockade on the mullet (a kind of fish) before they can do this." A little boy approached Mid. Woodward, and with a wishful air and beseeching tone said: "Oh, Mister, if you'll only bring me one handful of coffee, I'll give you any thing—'lasses, sugar or any thing!" An old man made a similar proposal to Mr. Freeman, who asked him if they were short of any thing, to which he made answer: "My God, we are short of every thing. I haven't tasted coffee or tea these four months." He added: "If you like I'll show you some of the stuff we use for tea," and going off soon returned with a bunch of dry herbage—large leaves on the stalk, which grows near the ground and resembles oak leaves.

Though the town possessed many natural beauties of redeeming qualities, still every thing bore a neglected appearance. The place seemed deserted, and no signs of thrift or business were observed. The male population capable of bearing arms had gone to the war, while old men and boys were enrolled as Home Guards. There were not more than fifty men in the place, and about five hundred women and children. If the towns and hamlets in the North were to make this sacrifice, how long would the rebels defy the power of the Federal Government?

While all this was transpiring on shore, a schooner was discovered working her way back of Deer Island into Biloxi Bay. Acting-Master Freeman, executive officer of the Lewis, manned a boat and went in pursuit. After rowing about nine miles, he succeeded in overhauling the vessel, which proved to be the schooner Capt. Speeden, Capt. Francisco Marteniz, who was the sole owner. She was loaded with thirty thousand feet of hard pine flooring boards, (right handy for the tent floors,) and was on her way to New Orleans from Honsboro', where there are several saw-mills employing a large number of negroes in sawing lumber. The cargo belonged to a secessionist in Biloxi, and was therefore a lawful prize. The Spanish captain and two creoles surrendered without resistance. The captain has a wife and child in New Orleans, from which place he has kept aloof through fear of being impressed into the rebel army. He is a strong Union man, and refuses to fight against the "Stars and Stripes," although sailing under a Confederate States register to support his family. He plead hard to have his vessel given up to him, as it was all he had in the world, and offered, if released, to return with a cargo of sweet potatoes. All feel that the latter would go far to relieve the severity of camp regimen, but the usages of war rather interfere with the gratification of the appetite, and Signor P'Capitano, his mate and cook, will be retained here for the present.

While in pursuit of the schooner, Mr. Freeman discovered seven boats filled with men, women, and children, who were making their escape from Biloxi to Ocean Springs and Pascagoula. It not being the design of Commander Smith to hold Biloxi, the expedition returned to Ship Island the same evening, and at the earliest convenience further demonstrations will be made against such movable property of the rebels as is required at this point.

The Water Witch and New London did not participate in the affair, the credit of which belongs to the Lewis. It being the first exploit of the steamer since her conversion to the Union cause, her officers are receiving congratulations on all sides.

THE MUSTER OF THE NORTH.

A BALLAD OF '61.

BY JOHN SAVAGE.

I.

"Oh, mother, have you heard the news?"
"Oh, father, is it true?"
"Oh, brother, were I but a man"—
"Oh, husband, they shall rue!"
Thus, passionately, asked the boy,
And thus the sister spoke,
And thus the dear wife to her mate,
The words they could not choke.
"The news! what news?" "Oh, bitter news—they've fired upon the Flag—
The Flag no foreign foe could blast, the traitors down would drag."

II.

"The truest flag of liberty
The world has ever seen—
The Stars that shone o'er Washington,
And guided gallant Greene!
The white and crimson Stripes which bode
Success in peace and war,
Are draggled, shorn, disgraced, and torn—
Insulted Star by Star.
That Flag, whose symbol'd virtues are the pining nation's codes,
The Flag of Jones at Whitehaven, of Reid at Fayal Roads.

III.

"Eh, neighbor, canst believe this thing?"
The neighbor's eyes grew wild;
Then o'er them crept a haze of shame,
As o'er a sad, proud child;
His face grew pale, he bit his lip,
Until the hardy skin,
By passion tightened, could not hold
The boiling blood within;
He quivered for a moment, the indignant stupor broke,
And the duties of the soldier in the citizen awoke.

IV.

On every side the crimson tide
Ebbs quickly to and fro;
VOL. III.—POETRY 42

On maiden cheeks the horror speaks
With fitful gloom and glow;
In matrons' eyes their feelings rise,
As when a danger, near,
Awakes the soul to full control
Of all that causes fear;
The subtle sense, the faith intense, of woman's heart
and brain,
Give her a prophet's power to see, to suffer and maintain.

V.

Through city streets the fever beats—
O'er highways, byways, borne;
The boys grow men with madness,
And the old grow young in scorn;
The forest boughs record the vows
Of men heart-sore, though strong;
Th' electric wire, with words of fire,
The passion speeds along,
Of traitor hordes and traitor swords from Natchez to Manassas,
And like a mighty harp flings out the war-chant to the masses.

VI.

And into caverned mining pits,
The insult bellows down;
And up through the hoary gorges,
Till it shouts on the mountain's crown;
Then foaming o'er the table-lands,
Like a widening rapid, heads;
And rolling along the prairies,
Like a quenchless fire it spreads;
From workman's shop to mountain top there's mingled wrath and wonder;
It appals them like the lightning, and awakes them like the thunder.

VII.

The woodman flings his axe aside;
The farmer leaves his plough;
The merchant slams his ledger lids
For other business now;
The artisan puts up his tools,
The artist drops his brush,
And joining hands for Liberty,
To Freedom's standard rush;
The doctor folds his suit of black, to fight as best he may,
And e'en the flirting exquisite is "eager for the fray."

VIII.

The students leave their college rooms
Full deep in Greece and Rome,
To make a rival glory
For a better cause near home ;
The lawyer quits his suit and writs,
The laborer his hire,
And in the thrilling rivalry
The rich and poor aspire !
And party lines are lost amid the patriot commotion,
As wanton streams grow strong and pure within the heart of ocean.

IX.

The city marts are echoless ;
The city parks are thronged ;
In country stores there roars and pours
The means to right the wronged ;
The town-halls ring with mustering,—
From holy pulpits, too,
Good priests and preachers volunteer
To show what men should do—
To show that they who preach the truth and God above revere,
Can die to save for man the blessings God has sent down here.

X.

And gentle fingers everywhere
The busy needles ply,
To deck the manly sinews
That go out to do or die ;
And maids and mothers, sisters dear,
And dearer wives, outvie
Each other in the duty sad,
That makes all say " Good-by "—
The while in every throbbing heart that's pressed in farewell kiss,
Arises pangs of hate on those who brought them all to this.

XI.

The mustering men are entering
For near and distant tramps ;
The clustering crowds are centering
In barrack-rooms and camps ;
There is riveting and pivoting,
And furbishing of arms ;
And the willing marching, drilling,
With their quick exciting charms,
Half dispel the subtle sorrow that the women needs must feel,
When e'en for Right their dear ones fight the Wrong with steel to steel.

XII.

With hammerings and clamorings
The armories are loud ;
Toilsome, clangor, joy and anger,
Like a cloud enwrap each crowd ;
Belting, buckling, cursing, chuckling,
Sorting out their " traps " in throngs ;
Some are packing, some knapsacking,
Singing snatches of old songs ;
Fifers' finger, lovers linger to adjust a badge or feather,
And groups of drummers vainly strive to reveille together.

XIII.

And into many a haversack
The prayer-book's mutely borne—
Its well-thumbed leaves in faithfulness
By wives and mothers worn ;
And round full many a pillared neck,
O'er many a stalwart breast,
The sweetheart wife's—the maiden love's
Dear effigy's caressed.
God knows by what far camp-fire may these tokens courage give,
To fearless die for Truth and Home, if not for them to live.

XIV.

And men who've passed their threescore years,
Press on the ranks in flocks ;
Their eyes, like fire from Hecla's brow,
Burn through their snowy locks ;
And maim'd ones, with stout hearts, persist
To mount the belt and gun,
And crave with tears—while forced away—
To march to Washington.
" Why should we not ? We love that Flag ! Great God ! "—they choking cry—
" We're strong enough ! We're not too old for our country's cause to die ! "

XV.

And in the mighty mustering,
No petty hate intrudes,
No rival discords mar the strength
Of rising multitudes ;
The jealousies of faith and clime
Which fester in success,
Give place to sturdy friendships
Based on mutual distress ;
For every thinking citizen who draws the sword,
knows well
The battle's for Humanity—for Freedom's citadel !

XVI.

Oh, Heaven ! how the trodden hearts
In Europe's tyrant world
Leapt up with new-born energy
When that Flag was unfurled !
How those who suffered, fought, and died,
In fields, or dungeon-chained,
Prayed that the Flag of Washington
Might float while earth remained !
And weary eyes in foreign skies still flash with fire anew,
When some good blast by peak and mast unfolds that Flag to view.

XVII.

And they who, guided by its stars,
Sought here the hopes they gave,
Are all aglow with pilgrim fire
Their happy shrines to save.
Here—Scots and Poles, Italians, Gauls,
With native emblems tricked ;
There—Teuton corps, who fought before
Für Freiheit und für Licht ;*
While round the Flag the Irish like a human rampart go !
They found Cead mille failthe† here—they'll give it to the foe.

* " Ich sterbe gern für Freiheit und für Licht," Getreu der Fahne der ich zugeschworen."
—German Song.

† " A hundred thousand welcomes."

XVIII.

From the vine-land, from the Rhine-land,
 From the Shannon, from the Scheldt,
 From the ancient homes of genius,
 From the sainted home of Celt,
 From Italy, from Hungary,
 All as brothers join and come,
 To the sinew-bracing bugle,
 And the foot-propelling drum :
 Too proud beneath the Starry Flag to die, and keep secure
 The Liberty they dreamed of by the Danube, Elbe, and Suir.

XIX.

From every hearth bounds up a heart,
 As spring from hill-side leaps,
 To give itself to those proud streams
 That make resistless deeps !
 No book-rapt sage, for age on age,
 Can point to such a sight
 As this deep throb, which woke from rest
 A people armed for fight.
 Peal out, ye bells, the tocsin peal, for never since the day
 When Peter roused the Christian world has Earth seen such array.

XX.

Which way we turn, the eye-balls burn
 With joy upon the throng ;
 'Mid cheers, and prayers, and martial airs,
 The soldiers press along ;
 The masses swell and wildly yell,
 On pavement, tree, and roof,
 And sun-bright showers of smiles and flowers
 Of woman's love give proof.
 Peal out, ye bells, from church and dome, in rivalrous communion,
 With the wild, upheaving masses, for the Army of the Union !

XXI.

Onward trending, crowds attending,
 Still the army moves—and still ;
 Arms are clashing, wagons crashing
 In the roads and streets they fill ;
 O'er them banners wave in thousands,
 Round them human surges roar,
 Like the restless-bosomed ocean,
 Heaving on an iron shore ;
 Cannons thunder, people wonder whence the endless river comes,
 With its foam of bristling bay'nets, and its cataracts of drums.

XXII.

" God bless the Union army ! "
 That holy thought appears
 To symbolize the trustful eyes
 That speak more loud than cheers.
 " God bless the Union army,
 And the flag by which it stands ;
 May it preserve with Freeman's nerve,
 What Freedom's God demands ! "
 Peal out, ye bells—ye women, pray—for never yet went forth
 So grand a band, for law and land, as the Muster of the North.

THE ROMAN TWINS.

BY A. J. H. DUGANNE.

'Twas told by Roman soothsayers,
 What time they read the stars,
 That Romulus and Remus
 Sprang from the loins of Mars :
 That Romulus and Remus
 Were twin-born on the earth,
 And in the lap of a she-wolf
 Were suckled from their birth.
 By Heaven ! I think this legend—
 This ancient Roman myth—
 For mine own time, and mine own clime,
 Is full of pregnant pith.

Romulus stood with Remus,
 And plowed the Latian loam,
 And traced, by yellow Tiber,
 The nascent walls of Rome ;
 Then laughed the dark twin, Remus,
 And scoffed his brother's toil,
 And over the bounds of Romulus
 He leaped upon his soil.
 By Heaven ! I think that Remus
 And Romulus at bay,
 Of Slavery's strife and Liberty's life
 Were antetypes that day !

The sucklings of the she-wolf
 Stood face to face in wrath,
 And Romulus swept Remus
 Like stubble from his path ;
 Then crested he with temples
 The Seven Hills of his home,
 And builded there, by Tiber,
 The eternal walls of Rome !
 By Heaven ! I think this legend
 Hath store of pregnant pith ;
 For mine own time, and mine own clime,
 'Tis more than Roman myth !

Like Romulus and Remus,
 Out of the loins of Mars,
 Our Slavery and our Liberty
 Were born from cruel wars.
 To both the Albic she-wolf
 Her bloody suck did give,
 And one must slay the other,
 Ere one in peace can live.
 By Heaven ! this brave old legend
 Straight to our hearts comes home—
 When Slavery dies, shall grandly rise
 Freedom's Eternal Rome !

HALF-MAST.

In Memory of Gen. Nathaniel Lyon, killed at the Battle of Wilson's Creek, August 10, 1861.

BY " F. G. C. "

Unfurl our flag half-mast to-day,
 In sorrow, 'mid the clang of war ;
 Each crimson stripe is turned to gray,
 To black each azure star.

The drooping breeze scarce stirs a fold ;
 The birds complain with fettered breath ;
 The clouds hang sullenly and cold,
 For lo ! a hero's death.

From far Missouri's prairie plain
The echo of his battle-cry
Sounds and recedes, and sounds again,
His life-earned victory.

Oh, Lyon! on thy martial bier
The tears of grateful millions flow,
And Treason well may shrink, and fear
Its fated overthrow.

For wheresoe'er thy comrades stand
To face the traitors, as of yore,
Thy prescient spirit shall command
And lead the charge once more.

Then fling our flag mast-high to-day,
Triumphant 'mid the clang of war;
And death to him who shall betray
One single stripe or star!

SONG OF THE NEW HAMPSHIRE VOLUNTEERS.

BY MARIAN DOUGLAS.

Respectfully Dedicated to the Seventh New Hampshire Regiment.

From hill-top and mountain
We press to the fight;
Up, up with our Banner,
For God and the Right!
We dare not stay weakly
And trembling at home;
The moment for action,
For conflict, has come!

CHORUS.

The fire sweeps the prairie,
The tempest the sea,
But nothing can conquer
The hearts of the free!

'Tis ours to keep burning,
On hill-top and glade,
The fire on the altars
Our fathers have made.
Our hearts beat together,
And shall to the last;
Who fears for the future,
That thinks of the past?

CHORUS.

The fire sweeps the prairie,
The tempest the sea,
But nothing can conquer
The hearts of the free!

Then up with our Banner!
'Mid sunlight or shade,
Before we would suffer
Its brightness to fade,
Amid the wild tumult
Upon the red plain,
Our hearts, with their life-blood,
Would dye it again!

CHORUS.

The fire sweeps the prairie,
The tempest the sea,
But nothing can conquer
The hearts of the free!

THE SOCKS THAT I KNIT.

BY "A. L."

'Tis a clear twilight time in November,
With the day passing on into night;
In the west fades the glow of the evening,
In the east shines the moon, cold and white;
The trees, like the nation, have parted
With summer's soft riches at length;
But now, see the wonderful structure,
So glorious in beauty and strength!

The fire-light flashes and flickers
On low white-washed ceiling and wall,
And plays on my poor tired fingers,
At work with their gray woollen ball.
It glimmers and shines on my needles,
And lights up the stocking I knit;
It's a sock for some volunteer soldier,—
I hope that the stocking will fit!

I suppose it will suit in dimensions,
For feet of all sizes have marched
To go to the help of the nation,—
Long, short, and flat-footed, and arched.
And the yarn is from old Massachusetts,
And the shape is an excellent hit;
So I think it may do good to some one,
This gray woollen sock that I knit.

I hope it will comfort no traitor,
But one that is loyal and true,—
Some brave boy who's left home and fortunes,
To fight for the Red, White, and Blue.
To his foot, O sock, be thy softest!
And never wear out, nor give way;
There's none to do darning and mending
Down there in the midst of the fray.

Protect him from cold and from dampness,
And soften the hard leather shoe;
And on the long march or night watches,
Do all that a stocking can do.
But, stocking, I charge thee! return not,
Except with thy duty performed;
Till the season is turned into summer,
And the last rebel stronghold is stormed.

Let no knitting of mine be surrendered
On a soldier afraid of the fight,
Or be dropped by the way, or borne homeward,
In some needless and panic-struck flight.
The swift-rolling ball in my basket,
Like destiny seems to unwind;
One vision comes up as I widen,
And one as I narrow and bind.

Shall my sock be sent off to Missouri,
For some of our brave Western boys?
Or down to Port Royal and Beaufort,
Where Sherman is making a noise?
Or off to the old sea-girt Fortress,—
Or where, on Potomac's bright shore,
There are regiments drilling and waiting
For the word to go forward once more.

Perchance this soft fabric, when finished,
May cherish an invalid's foot;
Or, in some wild scamp of horsemen,
Lie hid in a cavalry boot.

Perchance it may be taken prisoner,
And down into Rebeldom borne;
Peradventure—alas! the poor stocking—
It may by some rebel be worn!

It may be cut through with a sabre;
Its white top—woe 's me!—be dyed red,
And on the cold field of a battle
May cover the foot of the dead.
How weirdly the needles are working—
Click, click—as they knit up the toe:
O stocking, you look to me ghostly,
In this question of where you shall go.

I see them flash down like a whirlwind,
Their long sabres gleaming on high;
The Stars and Stripes waving among them,
"For the Nation!" their fierce battle-cry;
I see them all pallid and drooping,
In sickness, in wounds, or in death;
And yet the faint pulses are loyal,
And yet Freedom nerves every breath.

The firelight wavers and trembles
With its shadowy, fitful glance,
Till the very coals and the ashes
Seem to look at me half askance;
And I in the chimney corner
In silence and solitude sit,
And work up an army of fancies,
In the volunteer sock that I knit.

It is all full of prayers and good wishes;
Stitch by stitch, as I knit, they're wrought in;
In my heart burns the love of the Union—
On my breast is a Stars-and-Stripes pin;
So if ever a sock could be loyal,
And for a brave volunteer fit,
As well as soft, warm, and elastic,
It must be this sock that I knit.

Ah, if I could only make blankets!
They should be of the warmest and best;
No night-wind should trouble the soldier,
While my blankets lay light on his breast.
And I wish that my hands could work faster,
And for every gray sock could knit two,—
You men who go forth to the battle
Don't know what the women would do.

And perchance—who can tell?—the young soldier
May turn out a hero, and fight
His way to the heart of the Nation,
As well as to glory's grand height;
And then, when his camp-chest is treasured,
And his uniform hung up with care,
Like Washington's, guarded and cherished,
My gray woollen sock may be there!

November, 1861.

THE SWELL'S SOLILOQUY ON THE WAR.

I don't approve this hawid waw;
Those dweadful bannahs hawt my eyes;
And guns and dwums are such a baw,—
Why don't the pawties compwamise?

Of cawce, the twoielt has its chawms;
But why must all the vulgah cwowd
Pawst in spawting unifawms
In cullaws so extwemely loud?

And then the ladies—pweicious deahs!—
I mawk the change on ev'wy bwow;
Bai Jove! I weally have my feahs
They wathah like the hawid wow!

To heah the chawming cweatures talk,
Like patwons of the bloody wing,
Of waw and all its dawty wawk,—
It doesn't seem a pwappah thing!

I called at Mrs. Gweene's last night,
To see her niece, Miss Mawy Hertz,
And found her making—cwushing sight!—
The weddest kind of flannel shirts!

Of cawce I wose and sought the daw,
With fewy flashing from my eyes!
I can't approve this hawid waw;—
Why don't the pawties compwamise?

GRANDPA NATHAN.

Respectfully Inscribed to Gen. Leslie Combs.

BY WILLIAM D. GALLAGHER.

I.

By the beach and hickory fire
Grandpa Nathan sat at night,
With details of marching armies,
And the news of many a fight,
When he laid aside the paper,
Though its contents he had told,
He was plied with many questions
By the young and by the old.
It's a war the most infernal,
(Grandpa Nathan made reply)
But the legions of the Union
Soon will crush it out, or die!
If I only had the vigor
Of just twenty years ago,
How I'd leap into my saddle!
How I'd fly to meet the foe!

II.

Nannie Hardin, dearest daughter,
There's a spirit now abroad
That's akin to whatsoever
Is at enmity with God.
It has wrought upon a portion
Of the people of the land,
Till they almost think they're honest
In the treason they have plann'd.
It has struck the sea with rapine,
It has tinged its shores with blood,
And it rolls and surges inland
Like a desolating flood.
It has rent the nearest kindred—
E'en the mother and the son;
But, as God's a God of Justice,
Its career will soon be run.

III.

There's a camp in Wickliffe's meadow,
Less than eighteen miles away—
John, at your age I could make it
Twice 'twixt now and break of day;
Fill your buggy up with baskets,
Fill each basket to the brim,

Sweep the pantry of its choicest,
Till the shelves are lean and slim;
Take a jug or two of apple,
For these chill November damps
Of benumb the weary sentries
As they guard the sleeping camps.
Drive the pet of old Sarpedon—
For the glory of his sires
He will make the camp at Wickliffe
Ere they stir the morning fires.

IV.

Tell the soldier of Kentucky,
And the soldier from abroad
Who has come to fight the battle
Of his country and his God—
Tell them one who on the Wabash
Fought with Daviess when he fell,
And who bled at Meigs, where Dudley
Met the painted hosts of hell—
One who fought with Hart at Raisin,
And with Johnson on the Thames,
And with Jackson at New Orleans,
Where we won immortal names,
Sends them from his chimney corner
Such fair greeting as he may,
With a few small creature-comforts
For this drear November day.

V.

Tell them he has watched this quarrel
From its outbreak until now,
And, with hand upon his heart-beat,
And God's light upon his brow,
He invokes their truest manhood,
The full prowess of their youth,
In this battle of the Nation
For the right and for the truth.
Tell them one whose years are sinking
To the quiet of the grave,
Thus enjoins each valiant spirit
That would scorn to be a slave—
"By the toil and blood your fathers
In the cause of Freedom spent,
By the memory of your mothers,
And the noble aid they lent—"

VI.

By the blessings God has showered
On this birthright of the free,
Give to Heaven a reverent spirit,
Bend to Heaven a willing kneec,
And in silence, 'mid the pauses
Of the hymn and of the prayer,
To the God of Hosts appealing,
By the God of Battles swear—
Swear to rally round the standard
With our nation that was born,
With its Stars of world-wide glory,
And its Stripes that none may scorn!
Swear to fight the fight forced on us,
While an armed foe stirs abroad;
Swear to fight the fight of Freedom,
Of the Union, and of God!"

VII.

Ah! he drives the young Sarpedon—
Drives the son of glorious sires,
And he'll make the camp at Wickliffe's
Ere they build the morning fires.

Do you know, child, I am prouder
Of the spirit of your boy,
Than of any other grandson
That e'er brought his mother joy?
And so now, good Nannie Hardin,
For the night you'd best retire;
As for me, my child, I'm wakeful,
And I'll still sit by the fire.
Oh, my soul is in the battles
Of the Wabash and the Thames,
Where the prowess of Kentucky
Won imperishable names!

VIII.

I must see the camp at Wickliffe's
Nannie, you as well can go;
I must mingle with the soldiers
Who have come to meet our foe;
I must talk to them of battles
By the ranks of Freedom won,
And of acts of valor ventured,
And of deeds of daring done.
Ah, I'll take them to the ramparts
Where their fathers fought of old,—
For my spirit now surveys them,
As a chart that is unrolled,—
And I'll show them in the mirror
Of the clouds and of the skies,
Where the hosts of glory marshal,
And the flag of glory flies

IX.

Take a blanket, dear, from Effie,
And a comfort here and there,
And from my good bed and wardrobe
Strip whatever I can spare.
Hunt the house from top to bottom,
And let the neighbors know
What they need, the men who shield them
From the fury of the foe.
Be up early in the morning;
Ask of all what they will send
To the camp in Wickliffe's meadow,
Where each soldier is a friend.
'Twere a sin, whilst there is plenty,
(Let us never feel the taunt.)
That the legions of the Union,
Braving danger, were in want.

X.

Write at once to Hatty Shelby,
And—for both of them are there—
Send a line to Alice Dudley,
And a word for Ruth Adair;
Then to-morrow write to Dorcas,
And anon to Mollie Todd,—
Say they've work now for their country,
For their freedom, and their God;
And if only half the spirit
That their mother had is theirs,
There'll be rapid work with needles,
And sharp rummaging up stairs.
Oh, it stirs the blood of seventy,
Wherever it survives,
Just to touch the chain of memory
Of the old Kentucky wives!

XI.

In a day or two—at farthest
When the present rain is done—

You and I will take the carriage,
 With the rising of the sun,
 And we'll spend a day, or longer,
 With the soldiers in their camps,
 Taking stores that best may shield them
 From the chill November damps.
 Oh, I'll cheer them on to battle—
 And I'll stir each lofty soul,
 As I paint the fields of honor
 Where the drums of glory roll!
 And I'll bid them never falter,
 While there's treason still abroad,
 In this battle of the Nation,
 For our Union, and for God.

XII.

One who fought upon the Wabash
 By Joe Daviess when he fell,
 And who bled at Meigs with Dudley,
 Where we met the hosts of hell;
 One who fought with Hart at Raisin,
 And with Johnson on the Thames,
 And with Jackson at New Orleans,
 Where we won immortal names,
 Will be listened to with patience
 By the heroes now at hand,
 Who have rushed on to our rescue,
 In this peril of the land.
 By the memory of our fathers,
 By the brave, and by the just,
 This rebellion shall be vanquished,
 Though each traitor bite the dust!

SONGS OF THE REBELS.

A CALL TO KENTUCKIANS.

BY A "SOUTHERN RIGHTS" WOMAN.

sons of Kentucky, arise from your dreaming!
 Awake, and to arms! for the foe draweth nigh;
 Just ye wait till our land with their legions are teeming,
 Ere ye rise in your might to battle or die?
 list to the wail from Missouri's heart coming,
 As trampled and bleeding she shrinks from the foe;
 such is our fate if thus ye lie sleeping;
 Then wake from your slumbers, and shield us from woe.
 e spirits of those who in battle have fallen,
 Are weeping in shame at your cowardly fear;
 e watchword of fiends hath already been given
 To crush and destroy all your loved ones so dear.
 s the day gone fore'er, when 'twere nobler to be
 A son of Kentucky than diadems wear?
 ye cowards and slaves? Are ye no longer free,
 That thus with your traitorous tyrants ye bear!

en rise in your might, and repel each invader,
 Nor let our loved land be disgraced by their tread;
 the watchword be, "Freedom and States' Rights forever!"
 Nor cease till each foe shall lie low with the dead.
 LOUISVILLE, KY., June 24, 1861.

THE DEAD.

BY AYMER.

On the field of battle lying,
 Was a youthful hero dying,
 On the cold, damp ground;
 And his twin companions stood,
 Wiping off the oozing blood
 From the deathly wound.

"Alfred, bid my father joy,
 When you tell him of his boy,
 At Manassas gory;
 Tell him how his darling child
 Won in death"—and here he smiled—
 "A soldier's proudest glory.

"Tell him how I learned to stifle,
 With my bright, unerring rifle,
 The base invader's cheer;
 Tell my sister and my mother
 Not to weep, but learn to smother
 Each sigh and loving tear."

Here he whispered still more lowly,
 For his life was ebbing slowly,
 "Remember me to her."
 He ceased—his friend, with anxious start,
 Placed his hand upon his heart,
 But all was quiet there.

In a peaceful, lonely dell,
 Where the moonlight loving fell
 With its silver beams,
 There they laid him;—all were weeping
 O'er the one who there was sleeping,
 Wrapt in angel dreams.

SOUTHERN WAR-SONG.

BY "N. P. W."

To horse! to horse! our standard flies,
 The bugles sound the call;
 An alien navy stems our seas—
 The voice of battle's on the breeze;
 Arouse ye, one and all!

From beauteous Southern homes we come,
 A band of brothers true,
 Resolved to fight for liberty,
 And live or perish with our flag—
 The noble red and blue.

Though tamely crouch to Northern frown,
 Kentucky's tardy train;
 Though invaded soil, Maryland mourns,
 Though brave Missouri vainly spurns,
 And foaming gnaws the chain.

Oh! had they marked the avenging call
 Their brethren's insults gave,
 Disunion ne'er their ranks had mown,
 Nor patriot valor, desperate grown,
 Sought freedom in the grave.

Shall we, too, bend the stubborn head,
 In Freedom's temple born?—

Dress our pale cheek in timid smiles,
To hail a master in our house,
Or brook a victor's scorn?

No! though destruction o'er the land
Come pouring as a flood;
The sun that sees our falling day,
Shall mark our sabre's deadly sway,
And set that night in blood!

For gold let Northern legions fight,
Or plunder's bloody gain;
Unbribed, unbought, our swords we draw,
To guard our homes, to fence our law,
Nor shall their edge be vain.

And now that breath of Northern gale
Has fanned the stars and bars,
And footstep of invader rude,
With rapine foul, and red with blood,
Us rights and liberty debars.

Then farewell home, and farewell friends;
Adieu each tender tie;
Resolved, we mingle in the tide,
Where charging squadrons furious ride,
To conquer or to die.

To horse! to horse! the sabres gleam;
High sounds our bugle call;
Combined by honor's sacred tie,
Our word is, Rights and Liberty!
March forward, one and all!

SONG ON GEN. SCOTT.

BY N. B. J****.

TUNE—"Poor Old Horse, Let Him Die."

Virginia had a son,
Who gathered up some fame;
He many battles won,
And thereby won a name;
But now he's growing old,
And nature doth decay,
Virginia she does scold,
And all can hear her say,
Poor old Scott, let him die.

He is old, and very mean, sir;
He is dull, and very slow;
And it can now be seen, sir,
He still does meaner grow;
He is not fit to fight,
Nor will he ever pray;
Then kick him out of sight,
And let Virginia say,
Poor old Scott, let him die.

The sound of his war-whoop
No one again will hear;
In dread laps lie his hasty soup,
With hell-fire in his rear;
I had rather be a hog,
And wallow in the mud,
Than be old Lincoln's dog,
Or be his warrior stud.
Poor old Scott, let him die.

I had rather be a dog,
And bay the stars and moon;
I had sooner be a frog,
With a dungeon for my doom,
Than to be poor old Scott,
To fill a traitor's grave,
And there in silence rot,
Without a soul to save.
Poor old Scott, let him die.

ANOTHER YANKEE DOODLE.

Yankee Doodle had a mind
To whip the Southern traitors,
Because they didn't choose to live
On codfish and potatoes.
Yankee Doodle, doodle-doo,
Yankee Doodle dandy;—
And so, to keep his courage up,
He took a drink of brandy.

Yankee Doodle said he found,
By all the census figures,
That he could starve the rebels out,
If he could steal their niggers.
Yankee Doodle, doodle-doo,
Yankee Doodle dandy;—
And then he took another drink
Of gunpowder and brandy.

Yankee Doodle made a speech;
'Twas very full of feeling:
"I fear," says he, "I cannot fight,
But I am good at stealing."
Yankee Doodle, doodle-doo,
Yankee Doodle dandy;—
Hurrah for Lincoln—he's the boy
To take a drop of brandy.

Yankee Doodle drew his sword,
And practised all the passes;
"Come, boys, we'll take another drink
When we get to Manassas."
Yankee Doodle, doodle-doo,
Yankee Doodle dandy;—
They never reached Manassas' plain,
And never got the brandy.

Yankee Doodle soon found out
That Bull Run was no trifle;
For if the North knew how to steal,
The South knew how to rife.
Yankee Doodle, doodle-doo,
Yankee Doodle dandy;—
" 'Tis very clear, I took too much
Of that infernal brandy."

Yankee Doodle wheeled about,
And scampered off at full run;
And such a race was never seen,
As that he made at Bull Run.
Yankee Doodle, doodle-doo,
Yankee Doodle dandy;—
"I haven't time to stop just now
To take a drop of brandy."

Yankee Doodle, oh! for shame;
You're always intermeddling;

Let guns alone, they're dangerous things;
You'd better stick to peddling.
Yankee Doodle, doodle-doo,
Yankee Doodle dandy;—
"When next I go to Bully Run,
I'll throw away the brandy."

Yankee Doodle, you had ought
To be a little smarter;
Instead of catching woolly heads,
I vow you've caught a tartar.
Yankee Doodle, doodle-doo,
Yankee Doodle dandy;—
Go to hum—you've had enough
Of rebels and of brandy.

RETRIBUTION.—There was an instance of just retribution for treason at Rich Mountain. The Hon. John Hughes, of Beverley, a member of the Virginia Secession Convention at Richmond, heard by some means that our troops were endeavoring to turn the flank of the rebels. He mounted a horse and sped up the hill rapidly, to carry the information to Col. Pegram. When near the summit he was hailed by pickets. Supposing they were Federal pickets, he cried out, "Hold, I am a Northern man." The next instant he fell into the road a corpse, riddled by thirty balls. He had lied, and his own friends, the rebels, whom he was striving to save, believing they were his enemy, put an end to his career.—Louisville Journal, Aug. 1.

THE SLAVES WHO RUN AWAY FROM THEIR MASTERS IN VIRGINIA, are set to work at once by Gen. Butler, and made to keep at it, much to their annoyance. One of them having been put to it rather strong, said, "Golly, Massa Butler, dis nigger never had to work so hard before; guess dis chile will secede once moah."—Ohio Statesman, Aug. 2.

FEMALE CAVALRY COMPANY.—A cavalry company, composed of young ladies, has recently been formed at Pittsfield, Mass., under the name of "Di Vernon Phalanx." Miss Pinkie Pomeroy is the Captain, and Miss Anna Kipp is the Lieutenant.—Providence Journal, Aug. 2.

A GENEROUS OFFER.—The following notice, signed by a planter in moderate circumstances, has been posted up in the streets of Benton, Ala. It is a generous offer, and we presume will be promptly responded to:—"For the comfort of our army, who are now keeping from our firesides an unnatural and unrelenting enemy, headed by old Abe Lincoln, any family in Benton, or within one mile of my residence, who will knit me six pairs of socks suitable for the army, I will haul and deliver to them two cords of good wood. I will deliver in Benton 100 cords of firewood for 300 pairs of army socks. The tradespeople who need wood, can swap their goods for socks, and get wood in pay for them, and give the girls a chance for a nice calico dress these hard times. This is a gratuity to the army."—Memphis Appeal, Aug. 3.

PRAYER-BOOKS AND SCALPING-KNIVES.—The following letter, picked up by an officer of Gen. Cox's staff, on the ground from which Governor Wise's troops fled, shows the affecting tone of true piety that runs through all the Confederate operations:—

"WAY UP ON THE HILL, below Charleston four miles.

"MAT.:—I want you to put every thing in the sergeant's room—every thing that belongs to us. And if there is any engagement, break my little trunk open, and take out my Bible and prayer-book, and those Boone County bonds, and save them for me. I have not read my Bible for sixteen years, but I want them saved. Cook all the provender up there, and put all our cooking utensils together in the sergeant's room. The news is that the enemy is coming up on both sides of the river in a d—d strong force. I am the second company to have a shot. The orders are to scalp all we get near to.

THE WAR AMONG THE FARMERS.—The Dutch Reformed church near the English Neighborhood, in Bergen County, N. J., was the scene of some little excitement on the 4th of July. The church is located in the midst of a wealthy farming population, which supplies New York with no small share of its best fruit and garden vegetables. It has been the custom to ring the bell in the old church on the 4th of July, but on the late occasion the farmers declared it should not be rung. But a man and a woman, (a widow,) who live next to the church, declared it should be rung. This declaration brought the farmers in force to the church on the morning of the 4th, when a sharp word-battle took place between the one man and the widow on one side, and the farmers on the other. The latter declared that "the bell should never be rung on the 4th of July again, until the North has repented of the wicked and abominable abolitionism which has destroyed the union of our country." The widow declared, that if she could only get hold of the key, and get into the belfry, she "would knock any man down who should attempt to stop her from ringing the bell." But she did not get the key, and the church was kept fast locked the whole day. The incident is valuable as indicating the drift of public thought among the intelligent and non-political farmers of the country.—Mobile Advertiser, Aug. 2.

A GOOD SAMARITAN.—Private Job H. Wells, of Company C, was lost in the confusion of the troops at the battle of Bull Run. He got into the woods, and soon after the moon was shut in by a cloud. He wandered till he came to a rye field, where he encamped for the night. Tired and exhausted, he soon fell asleep, but awoke in the morning cold and hungry. He determined to make for a house he saw at a distance, and risk the consequences. He dragged his weary, stiffened limbs along, in a terrible uncertainty as to the reception he should meet with. Arriving at the house and entering, he was heartily welcomed by the lady occupant, who gave him a sofa to rest upon, and in the mean time directed her servants to prepare breakfast. The table was liberally supplied, and our friend told to be seated. The lady was a staunch Unionist, and declared that the National troops were welcome to whatever she had. She said that on the march out, some of the troops stopped at her place and took several ducks; these she cared nothing about, and if they had taken much more they would have been welcome. If they had not broken up her setting hens, she would not have said a word. The good lady did not like to lose her next year's flock. Soon after breakfast, a troop of secessionists came in sight. The lady put Mr. Wells in a rear room, while she conversed with some of them. She feigned great ignorance of what had been going on, and learned from them the route they were going. After they had gone, Mr. Wells inquired how he was to get away. "That is easy enough," replied the matron; "trust to me." She ordered one of her servants to saddle a horse and bring it to the door. She then brought out a long overcoat, and told him to put it on. The pockets were liberally supplied with delicacies to serve him on the way. The horse was brought to the door, when the lady told Mr. Wells that the horse was at his service, and would safely carry him through. Said she, "Take the horse, and go to Washington. You may leave him with my son"—giving his name and residence. "If a secessionist meets you, shoot him; if there is more than one, shoot the first, and trust to the horse for the other, for he will soon carry you out of danger." Mr. Wells mounted the horse, and safely reached Washington. He left the horse as directed, and was welcomed by the son as he had been by the mother.

While Mr. Wells was waiting, a Unionist of the vicinity came into the house, and said he was about to leave for Washington; that he had sent his family over, and had stayed behind to see if it was possible to save any thing. The lady asked him if he had any money. He said he had not. She then went up stairs, and returning with a purse of silver, gave it to the gentleman, remarking, "Take this; you may as well have it as the secessionists. They have already divided my property, and apportioned it among themselves; but the first man that makes the attempt, I shall shoot."

Doubtless there are many such noble women in Virginia and elsewhere, who are now suffering daily and nightly through fears of the force and violence of the secessionists. It is for these we fight, as well as ourselves. Let the remembrance of this fact nerve our arms for the conflict, and impel us to speedily give them deliverance.—Providence Journal, Aug. 2.

THE SECESSIONISTS IN KENTUCKY, who have formed themselves into a regiment, are described as a savage set, who delight to keep every one in terror around them, and consider it a pleasure to chop up a man with an Arkansas tooth-pick. The wife of one of them, who is also a vivandiere, is a thorough soldier, and acts as lieutenant to a company which she drills herself. She is very handsome, and dresses in gay style, and the men all take pride in their dashing heroine, who expressed herself anxious to split a Yankee with her bowie-knife.—Albany Standard, Aug. 1.

SOME REASON LEFT.—In the case of the schooner Crenshaw, tried in the U. S. District Court, at New York, Daniel Lord, an eminent lawyer, took the position that the schooner and the cargo could not be condemned as a prize, because Abe Lincoln had usurped powers not belonging to him, in declaring war without authority of Congress. This reveals two facts—that there is some reason left in the North, and that there must be many who coincide with Mr. Lord, else he would not be allowed to utter such wholesome truths.—N. O. True Delta, Aug. 1.

WHITTIER AND THE ALABAMA PLANTER.—On Monday, the New England Poet, John G. Whittier, passed a few hours here on the way to his lovely home on the banks of the Merrimac, whence he has given to the world so many ringing lyrics and striking poems, stirring the blood like the blast of a trumpet, redolent of the airs of freedom, or tender with the emotions of friendship, charmingly descriptive of New England home life, or graphically embodying our quaint local legends and sturdy historical traditions. He returns from a brief visit to the Wachusett Hills, improved in health, to resume his pen, we trust, and add still further to the rich stores of American literature which he has already adorned so much. Mr. Whittier manifests a deep interest in the cause of the country, and watches with an anxious eye the course of events. We have heard, on reliable authority, an incident with which he was connected, resulting in a singular interview.

The story is substantially this: A few months ago he met with an Alabama planter in Boston, who expressed a desire to converse with him, and an interview took place, during which there was a free interchange of views. The planter frankly acknowledged that there was in the South a strong feeling of hate toward the North and Northern men, and they were determined to fight. He explained how this feeling was fostered by the politicians of the South, and how the feelings of the North were represented there, and stated that almost his sole object in coming to Boston was to ascertain for himself whether the facts were as they had been represented. He was evidently surprised to find the anti-slavery poet "so mild a mannered man," and confessed that, generally, he did not perceive that the feeling of the North toward the South was so bitter and unfriendly as he had been led to expect. He had experienced nothing but civility and courtesy, and admitted that Southerners generally received the same treatment.

Finally, Whittier, after attending him to some of the desirable places of resort, told him that, as he was now here, he might as well see the worst of the anti-slavery phase of Northern fanaticism, as the fashionable phrase is, and proposed to visit Garrison. The planter consented, and so they turned their steps to the Liberator office, where they found Garrison, Wendell Phillips, and Fred. Douglass, and there they enjoyed a "precious season of conversation." Would it not have been a sight worth seeing—that conclave in the Liberator office, with Garrison, Whittier, Phillips, Douglass, and the Alabama planter, in the foreground? The planter went to his home a wiser, and perhaps a sadder man, than he came, and protested that all he could do, while mourning for the condition of the country, was to pray over it. Would that more of the Southern people might come and see for themselves how basely the North has been belied!—Salem Register, Aug. 29.

GEN. PILLOW'S CHAIN CABLE.—Parson Brownlow says:—"Previous to Gen. Pillow being superseded by Bishop Polk, he went to New Orleans and procured a huge chain cable, costing him $25,000, and brought it to Memphis to blockade the river, by stretching it over and resting it upon buoys. The cable, carriage, and work, cost about $30,000. The first big tide that came, bringing down the usual amount of trees, logs, and drift wood, swept the cable and its supporters, as any flat-boat captain would have informed the Confederate authorities would certainly be the case.—N. Y. Commercial, Aug. 3.

TIME TO LEAVE.—One of the "contraband," who has found his way to Boston with the returning troops, and who is some fourteen years old, relates his experience on the battle-field as follows:—"Ye see, massa, I was drivin' an ambulance, when a musket-ball came and kill my horse; and den, pretty soon the shell came along, and he blow my wagon all to pieces—and den I got off!"—Boston Journal.

SAFE, BUT NOT COMFORTABLE.—In the battle at Bull Run, a soldier around whom the cannon shot were flying particularly thick, on seeing one strike and bury itself in a bank near him, sprang to the hole it had scooped out, remarking, "Shoot away! you can't hit twice in the same place." At the instant another shot struck at a few feet distance, almost covering the fellow with sand and gravel. Emerging from what had so nearly become his grave, he continued the unfinished sentence, "But you can come so pesky near it that the first hole is uncomfortable."—N. Y. World, Aug. 13.

PATRIOTIC.—The Pine Bluff (Ark.) News tells this: An old man of about seventy, with snowy beard and hair, but hale and stout, hearing that none would be received in the service over forty-five, was so anxious to enlist, that he went down to the barber's shop, and had his hair and beard dyed black, and came out looking quite fresh and young, and will not acknowledge to more than forty now. He is one of the boys, and we venture to say will do as much service as any of them."

The News also records this noble act:—"A young lady near this place, who is a teacher by profession, and who depends entirely upon her profession for support, gave to the Withers Arkansas Rangers, as her offering upon the altar of her country, $125, earned by her own labor."—N. O. True Delta, Aug. 1.

PIERRE SOULE.—A correspondent of the Boston Journal states that Pierre Soule is a good Union man, and that nothing but the "enormous depreciation of his extensive property in real estate deters him from coming North."

A WORD FOR THE 69TH N. Y. REGIMENT.—An article in the Memphis (Tenn.) Argus closes thus:—"No Southerner but feels that the 69th maintained the old reputation of Irish valor, on the wrong side through misguidance, and not through treachery to the old cause; and not one of us but feels that the day must come when a true understanding of the principle at issue will range their fearless hearts in line with their brethren of the South.

"All honor to the 69th, even in its error."

EX-PRESIDENT TYLER (member of Congress) has been detained at his estate in Charles City County, by illness. We are glad to hear, however, that he is convalescent, and although in bed when the news was read to him of the glorious victory achieved by our troops on the field of Manassas, he called for champagne, and made his family and friends drink the health of our generals.—Richmond Enquirer.

GEN. McCLELLAN AS A WIT.—The Washington Star, speaking of Gen. McClellan's interview with the "press brigade," last week, says:—

Gen. McClellan is not fluent of speech apparently, and doubtless doesn't care to be. That there is some little quiet fun in his composition, was apparent at the interview; and on the suggestion being made that the pictorial papers should be severely talked to for giving representations of our military works and operations, he seemed to think that they could be safely left alone, as quite as likely to confound as to instruct the enemy.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser, Aug. 7.

"BULLY FOR YOU."—The word Bull is destined to become famous in this war. If our men did run from Bull Run, we have now an offset in the fact that the rebels, under Gen. Henry A. Wise, did also run from Bull's Town. So we now have Bull against Bull, and the bully of Accomac is the set-off, who set off so bravely to do what he could not accomplish. "Bully for you."

There was a man of Accomac,
And he was bully Wise;
He jumped into Kanawha's bush,
And scratched out both his eyes;
And, when he saw he lost his eyes,
With all his might and main,
From Kanawha he quickly flies,
To brag, and—run again.

WAR INCIDENTS.—An old lady of Johnstown, Cambria County, Pa., had an only son, a strapping minor, to whom she was sincerely attached. This lad was induced to join a corps from the mountains, and, hoping to deceive the old lady, he invented some plausible tale, and came away. The love of the mother was, however, too great to be deceived, and after a week had elapsed, the true story was revealed to her. She started upon the railroad with a bundle and a small sum of money, and walked to Harrisburg alone, a distance of more than one hundred and fifty miles. At Harrisburg she took the train, and her money brought her to Downingtown, where she again resumed her tramp, and turned up, much to the lad's astonishment, at Camp Coleman, near Frankford. There the old lady, utterly wearied out, fell sick, and the men, hearing of the case, made up a collection, and provided her a bed and attendance in the neighborhood. But her strength revived with her anxiety, and she proceeded to the railroad with the boy, and kissed him a good-bye at the cars, with the tears falling over her cheeks.

A soldier of one of the returned companies, encamped in the suburbs of Martinsburg, Va., relates the following melting incidents:—Shortly after the arrival of the regiment, the squad messing in a certain tent near a dwelling, were listeners to most beautiful music. The unknown vocalist sang in tones so soft, so tremulous, and so melodious, that the volunteers strained their ears to drink in every note of the air. In daytime they went by squads past the dwelling, but saw no soul. Once they pursued a sylph-like figure to the very gate, but alas! she was not the lady sought for. And so they lived on, each night hearing the music repeated, and when it ceased, ambition and worldly interest went out with them, so that their dreams were filled with fancies of the unseen face.

One night, gathered together, the voice struck up again.

"By Jove!" said one, "this is agonizing. I can't stand it. She must be discovered!"

A dozen eager voices took up the remark, and a certain amorous youth was delegated to reconnoitre the place. He crept on tip-toe toward the dwelling, leaped the garden pales, and finally, undiscovered, but very pallid and remorseful, gained the casement.

Softly raising his head, he peeped within. The room was full of the music. He seemed to grow blind for the moment.

Lo! prone upon the kitchen hearth, sat the mysterious songstress—an ebony-hued negress, scouring the tin kettles.

The soldier's limbs sank beneath him, and the discovered, looking up, said, "Go 'way dar, won't ye, or I'll shy de fryin'-pan out o' de winder!" The soldier left—but not to dream, perchance!—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette, Aug. 8.

THE "LITTLE REBEL."—A lady temporarily residing among the Black Republicans in Northern Pennsylvania, writes to her husband in this city that an increase, in the form of a baby boy, had occurred in their family. In her own words, she adds: "Upon the sex of my baby being known, I proclaimed his name to be Jefferson Davis. The indignation with which this announcement was received, can be better imagined than described. No one pretends to call him by his proper name, but instead, the 'Little Rebel!' I had silently submitted to insulting abolition harangues until it was supposed I had been cured of all my secession proclivities. Judge, then, if you can, of the great surprise with which I treated the neighborhood in naming my baby!"—N. O. True Delta, Aug. 1.

SOUTHERN VIOLENCE.—Mr. Collins, son of Dr. Collins, a noted Methodist who escaped from the South some time since, relates the following:—"Miss Giernstein, a young woman from Maine, who had been teaching near Memphis, became an object of suspicion, and left for Cairo on the cars. One of the firemen overheard her say to some Northern men, 'Thank God! we shall soon be in a land where there is freedom of thought and speech.' The fellow summoned the Vigilance Committee, and the three Northern men were stripped, and whipped till their flesh hung in strips. Miss G. was stripped to her waist, and thirteen lashes given her bare back."

Mr. Collins says the brave girl permitted no cry or tear to escape her, but bit her lips through and through. With head shaved, scarred, and disfigured, she was at length permitted to resume her journey toward civilization.—N. Y. Tribune, Aug. 7.

COLONEL CORCORAN.—The Richmond Dispatch remarks:—"We hear of but one account, with few exceptions, from all the prisoners taken by our men everywhere, and that is that they came here without any intention of fighting the South, but were compelled to unite in the invading movement, and that if they were home they would never be caught in such a scrape again. The last assertion may be true, but not a word of the rest. The circumstances under which they left the North are known to the South as well as to themselves; and their very name and organization, volunteers, contradict every word they utter. We confess we have more respect for the most impudent among them—Colonel Corcoran, for example, who, we understand, says: "I went into the business with my whole soul, and I wouldn't take my parole if they'd give it to me."

"TEST OATH."—The following is the test oath adopted by the city council of Montgomery, Ala. All citizens are required to take it:

"Be it further Resolved, That on the top of each page, above the signature, shall be inscribed the following:—"We, citizens of the city of Montgomery, Alabama, whose names appear signed below, do solemnly affirm, in the presence of God, that we will uphold, maintain, and support the Constitution of the Confederate States of America, and hereby pledge our lives and fortunes and most sacred honor in the defence of the rights of the citizens thereof."

"Resolved, further, That all our citizens be requested to call at the Clerk's office, and sign their names in said register."—Louisville Journal, Aug. 9.

BARRING THEM OUT.—A little child who, in other days, had learned to revere the "Stars and Stripes," upon being told that he must in future say "Stars and Bars," wanted to know whether the "bars" were to bar the Yankees out.—Mobile Evening News, Aug. 20.

BURNING OF HAMPTON, VA.—The subjoined reminiscences are from the Richmond Examiner, and were published just after the burning of the Odd Fellows' Hall and jail at Hampton by the United States troops:—

This is the second time in its history that it has been fired by the enemy. In the war of the first Revolution, the English squadron, annoyed by the gallant exploits of two young officers, Samuel and James Daron, attacked Hampton and put the most of it in flames; not, however, without encountering a most gallant resistance from the Hamptonians, supported by the celebrated Culpepper Minute Men—the united force under command of Col. Woodford, who subsequently fell in one of the battles of the Revolution.

No spot in Virginia is invested with more thrilling romance and historic interest than Hampton and its immediate vicinity. It was visited in 1607 by Capt. John Smith, then an Indian town called Kecaughtan. Here Smith and his party were regaled with corn cakes, and exchanged for them trinkets and beads. The locality was settled from Jamestown in 1610, and was incorporated a century afterward as the town of "Ye Shire of Elizabeth City."

The Episcopal church, an ancient pile made of imported brick, is the oldest building in the village, and probably, from its isolated location, may have escaped the late conflagration. It is the second oldest church in the State, and is surrounded by a cemetery filled with countless "marble marks of the dead." Scattered through it may be found, at intervals, stones with armorial quarterings, designating the resting-place of honored ancestry. Some of these are very old, dating, in several instances, back into the seventeenth century. Here repose the earthly remains of many a cavalier and gentleman, whose names are borne by numerous families all over the Southern States.

One of the traditions connected with this old edifice, is that the venerable steeple was, prior to the Revolution, surmounted with the royal coat-of-arms of George III., but that on the 4th of July, 1776, a thunder-cloud blew up, and lightning rent the steeple and dashed the insignia of royalty to the earth.

The village of Hampton is beautifully situated on an arm of the sea setting in from the adjacent roadstead which bears its name, and is celebrated for its health and facilities for fine living.

The late census showed that the aggregate white and black population was nearly two thousand, who pursued nearly all the common or general pursuits of a town of that size. Some of the residences were of brick, and erected at a heavy cost, belonging to opulent farmers and tradesmen; beside, they had large gardens, out-houses, and other valuable improvements, all of which are destroyed.—See Diary of the American Revolution.

FIVE FIGHTING MINISTERS.—The N. Y. Observer says that a Louisiana clergyman, writing to them over his own name, remarks:—

"I am one of five ministers, of three different denominations, in a single company, armed for the defence of our rights and liberties, three of whom are between 60 and 60 years old. And I tell you in candor, and in the fear of God, that if you or any of the brethren who have urged on this diabolical war, come on with the invading army, I would slay you with as hearty a good-will, and with as clear a conscience, as I would the midnight assassin.

"In the name of God, I conjure you, let us alone. I speak the spontaneous sentiment of every Southern heart—man, woman, and child. We will never submit. We will shed the last drop of blood in defence of our rights. You are my enemy, and I am yours,"

"J. F. F."

The editors remark that they withhold the name of the belligerent subscriber who thus expresses his thirst for their blood, and, after stating that he owes them $25, indulge in the hope that before he "slays" them, he will "clear his conscience" by paying that little bill.

A BRAVE NEGRO BOY.—One of the members of the Second Ohio regiment told me, that on the march up to the battle of Bull Run, a negro boy, a bright little fellow, "wanted to go along." They let him do so. He stuck close to them in the midst of the fight, and finally the little fellow got a musket, and fought as bravely as the bravest of them. On their retreat he got tired out, and lay down in the corner of a fence and went to sleep. There they regretted to have to leave him.—Banner of the Covenant, Aug. 10.

KISSING BY A REGIMENT.—The Webster (Mass.) Times relates the following incident of the return of the Sixth regiment:—The engine halted for water at the North Village, and as the girls in Slater's mills had congregated upon the lawn, between the mill and the railroad track, the soldiers flocked from the cars and occupied the few minutes of the halt in most prolonged and indiscriminate kissing, to which the blushing girls submitted with a commendable and becoming grace.

BUNSBY RUSSELL ON BULL RUN.—Bunsby Russell, in writing his squib to the Times, Tells the tale of the flight, but no word of the fight;

How is it—all over the inquiry chimes—

Only one-half the story fell under his sight?

But a reason exists why the battle's chief brunt
Brought no sight to his eye, and no sound to his ear,—

A strict army rule held him back from the front,
For the old women always are kept in the rear.

A TERRIBLE PARSON IN BATTLE.—We have about come to the conclusion that the war correspondents

VOL. III.—POETRY 4

for the Southern papers can beat those of the North. A correspondent of the Memphis Appeal says:—

"Parson Rippetoe, a Methodist preacher, and captain of a Virginia company, performed prodigies of valor at the first taking of Sherman's battery, (for it was taken, then lost, then again taken.) He cut the throats of the horses, and then engaged Lieutenant Sherman in a hand-to-hand conflict with sabres. After a ten minutes' fight—both being accomplished swordsmen—he severed Sherman's head from his body at one blow."

We had a pleasant conversation with General Sherman in our office on Monday last, and he did not appear to be aware that he had been beheaded. At any rate he did not allude to the somewhat interesting event. Possibly, however, his memory may have been affected by the operation, for we cannot suppose the Southern parson would exaggerate.—Providence Journal.

MISS JENNIE A. CURTIS.—Probably all of our readers are familiar with the story of the arrest by the rebels, and subsequent release, of Miss Jennie A. Curtis,—we notice that many of the papers have insisted on calling her Mrs. Curtis, and in fact the name has appeared in our own columns in that shape, but it is a mistake. We do not publish the letter, as Miss Curtis expressly says it is not intended to go into print. She informs us that her business at Washington was to visit her brother, who is a member of Capt. Thomas' Company, we believe, her object being to see for herself how the regiment fared. Her brother had never made any complaints, and she wanted to know how he was faring. After satisfying herself on this point, she was induced by him to remain in the vicinity of the camp until the expiration of his sworn term of three months, when he expected to accompany her home. She is now—or was at the time the letter was written—boarding at the Clarendon Hotel in Washington, but will be home in a few days. Miss Curtis says the "secesh," as she calls them, did not make much out of her, and adds:—"I was determined, if I was to die, to say all I had to say"—and we have no doubt she said it. As we have before stated, she is the daughter of Mr. Hiram Curtis, of Albion.—Rochester Democrat, Aug. 23.

FLYING ARTILLERY.—Rev. J. T. Montgomery's company of flying artillery, at Montgomery, Ala., now stationed at Judge Johnson's Warehouse, have received quite an accession to their numbers since their arrival in this city. The company now has one hundred and forty members, but we understand there is still room for ten more. About one hundred and twenty horses have been procured.—Mobile Evening News.

DIX'S EPISTLE.—A Sunday-school scholar at Akron, Ohio, a lad of eleven, on being requested, with other members of his class, to repeat from the Bible a verse of his own selection, promptly gave the following: "If any one attempts to haul down the American flag, shoot him on the spot."

PRAYING ON JOHN BROWN'S SENTENCE SEAT.—When Gen. Patterson's column had entered Charlestown, Va., and taken possession of the Court House, and raised our flag, to the great indignation of the rebel citizens, the Rev. Mr. Fulton, Chaplain of the First Scott Legion regiment, went into the building and immediately walked up to the bench, and sat down in the chair from which John Brown received his death sentence, and there offered a prayer for our President, our army, our counsellors, and country, while also beseeching God to crush the rebellion, its leaders, and its cause.—Phila. Bulletin, Aug. 2.

JOHN BRIGHT.

BY PAMELIA S. VINING.

I honor you, John Bright!
With your head up in the light,
In your honest English might Standing forth for Truth and Right;
You're a man!
And that's a good deal said,
In these days of strife and dread—
Days of manliness stark dead,
Or stark mad.

I hear across the deep,
Noble, earnest accents sweep—
Words that make me laugh and weep
Both at once,
In a burst of joy, John Bright!
That one man, on Truth's fair height,
With the two extremes in sight
Of man's blessing and man's blight—
Mortal weal and mortal woe,

Hath a soul to speak out clear
To the Old and New World's ear,
So that every man may hear
And understand
Freedom's utterance, bold and strong,
Human right 'gainst human wrong,
Right of Weakness to be strong—
Deathless right!

And the tears are in my eyes,
When I think you sympathize
With my country, rent and torn
By Dissension's cruel thorn;
Bleeding fast,
God alone can tell how fast,
Possibly her best and last
Patriot blood. O God! I bless,
In this hour of our distress,
Our confusion, loss and strain,
Shuddering hopes and throbbing pain—
Thee I bless, that o'er the main
Comes one honest human tone,
Freedom's, Truth's, Religion's own,
Us to cheer!

Thus across the troubled water,
I, America's sad daughter,
From our fields of death and slaughter
Stretch my hand
Gratefully to you, John Bright!
Honest champion of Right,
Standing up in Heaven's pure light—
Up, on such a goodly height
That both hemispheres may see
How you look, John Bright!
With God's sunshine on your head,
Like a heavenly halo shed,
From the empyrean height.

SWORD AND PLOUGH.

BY CHARLES DAWSON SHANLEY.

The Sword came down to the red-brown field,
Where the Plough to the furrow heaved and keeled;
And it looked so proud in its jingling gear,—
Said the Plough to the Sword, "What brings you here?"

"Long years ago, ere I was born,
They doubled my grandsire up, one morn,
To forge a share for you, and now
They want him back," said the Sword to the Plough.

The red-brown field glowed a deeper red,
As the gleam of War o'er the landscape sped;
The sabres flashed, the cannon roared,
And side by side fought the Plough and the Sword.

THE STEAMER CONNECTICUT

Carrying a Regiment through the Highlands.

BY "A. L."

Down through our bright mountain passes
The Northern wind faintly brings
A sound that is sweet and thrilling,
And full of unuttered things:
It's the brazen clangor of trumpets,
And the measured notes of the drum,
And cymbals, and fife, and cornet,
As onward the volunteers come.
There's a "Hail to Columbia" breaking
The murmur of woods and rills;
And Washington's march is sounding
With its war-tramp among the hills.

So nearer, and ever nearer,—
And we gather around the door,
And stand there in deep heart-silence,
As many a time before.
Our eyes take but grave, brief notice,
Of the brightness of earth and sky,—
There's a more soul-rousing glory
In that dark spot passing by.
There are young lives freely offered,
And prospects and hopes laid down;
There are fair heads bared to the death-blow,
Or marked for the victor's crown.

See where, on their mighty transport,
The volunteers crowd the decks,
Their black soldier-caps, in the distance,
Diminished to tiny specks.
A vision of blue hides the steamer,
All over, as with a haze;
But a heavier veil, like to rain-drops,
Comes over my sight as I gaze.
Do they know, these volunteer soldiers,
As down our broad river they glide,
What sort of a welcome awaits them,
Deep hid in the woods on each side?

They know that the hills are in glory,
They can see how the blue waters roll,—
Do they feel the low prayers ascending
From the depth of each woman's soul?
They can see that the sky is its clearest,
That the sun has its brightest glow;

That the Stars and Stripes flutter before them,
In triumph, wherever they go:
Do they know how the hearts are throbbing,
Do they know how the eyes are wet
With a deep, high, grief and gladness,
At this part of the Nation's debt?

Ah me! I am only a woman,—
Not even my voice is strong
To give them a rousing welcome—
A cheer as they pass along.
But hark! how the men are cheering,
All down along the shore;
And the crews of the passing vessels
Give out another roar;
And once more the echoes waken,
As the blue-coats answer back,—
And the steamer is round the headland,
And the waters close over her track.

THE WAY WE WENT TO BEAUFORT.

Full fifty sail we were that day,
When out to sea we sped away,
With a feeling of brooding mystery;
Bound—there was no telling where,
But well we know there was strife to share,
And we felt our mission was bound to bear
A place in heroic history.

The man at the helm, nothing knew he,
As he steered his ship out into the sea,
On that morn of radiant beauty;
And the ships outspread their wings, and flew
Like sea-birds over the water blue,
One thought alone each man of us knew—
How best to do our duty.

Not a breath of wherefore or why was heard,
Not a doubting thought or a doubting word,
Or idle speculation;
But a spirit of inspiring trust
Filled each man's breast, as it always must,
When leaders are brave, and a cause is just
And ours the cause of the nation.

And thus we went—the hurricane's breath
Was felt in our track, like the blast of death,
But we had no thought of turning;
Onward and onward the good fleet sped,
Locked in its breast the secret dread,
To break in gloom over treason's head,
Where—we should soon be learning.

But brave Dupont and Sherman knew
Where the bolt should light, and each gallant crew
Was ready to heed their orders.
Port Royal, Ho!—and a bright warm day,
We made the land many miles away,
And sullenly there before us lay
Fierce Carolina's borders.

The mystery was all compassed then,
And the hearts of sea-sick, weary men,
Cheered up, the prospect viewing;
There is that grit in the human mind,
However gentle, or good, or kind,
That is always to double its fist inclined,
When near where a fight is brewing.

The rebel guns waked a fearful note
From our rifled cannon's open throat,
And our shells flew fast and steady.
The battle is over—the strife is done—
The Stars and Bars from the forts have run—
The blow is struck, and victory won—
Beaufort is ours already!

And then we sailed to the beautiful town,
Where we tore the emblem of treason down,
And planted the starry banner;
And the breezes of heaven seemed to play
With its folds in a tender and loving way,
As though they were proud to welcome the day,
And the old familiar manner.

A thrill pervaded the loyal land,
When the gladdening tidings came to hand;
Each heart felt joy's emotion!
The clouds of gloom and doubt dispersed,
The sun of hope through the darkness burst,
And the zeal the patriot's heart had nursed,
Burned with a warmer devotion.

IN STATE.

BY FORCEYTHE WILLSON.

O Keeper of the Sacred Key,
And the Great Seal of Destiny,
Whose eye is the blue canopy,
Look down upon the warring world, and tell us what the end will be.

“Lo, through the wintry atmosphere,
On the white bosom of the sphere,
A cluster of five lakes appear,
And all the land looks like a couch, or warrior's shield, or sheeted bier.

“And on that vast and hollow field,
With both lips closed, and both eyes sealed,
A mighty figure is revealed—
Stretched at full length, and stiff and stark as in the hollow of a shield.

“The winds have tied the drifted snow
Around the face and chin, and lo!
The sceptred giants come and go,
And shake their shadowy crowns, and say, ‘We always feared it would be so.’

“She came of an heroic race;
A giant's strength, a maiden's grace,
Like two in one seem to embrace,
And match, and blend, and thorough-blend, in her colossal form and face.

“Where can her dazzling falchion be?
One hand is fallen in the sea;
The gulf stream drifts it far and free,
And in that hand her shining brand gleams from the depths resplendently.

“And by the other in its rest
The Starry Banner of the West
Is clasped forever to her breast;
And of her silver helmet, lo! a soaring eagle is the crest.

"And on her brow a softened light,
As of a star concealed from sight
By some thin veil of fleecy white,
Or of the rising moon behind the rainy vapors of the night.

"The sisterhood that was so sweet—
The Starry System sphered complete,
Which the mazed Orient used to greet—
The Four-and-Thirty fallen stars glimmer and glitter at her feet.

"And lo! the children which she bred,
And more than all else cherished,
To make them strong in heart and head,
Stand face to face as mortal foes, with their swords crossed above the dead!

"Each hath a mighty stroke and stride,
And one is Mother-true and tried,
The other dark and evil-eyed;
And by the hand of one of them his own dear Mother surely died!

"A stealthy step—a gleam of hell—
It is the simple truth to tell—
The Son stabbed, and the Mother fell;
And so she lies—all mute, and pale, and pure, and irreproachable.

"And then the battle-trumpet blew,
And the true Brother sprang, and drew
His blade to smite the traitor through;
And so they clashed above the bier, and the Night
sweated bloody dew!

"Now, whichever stand or fall,
As God is great and man is small,
The Truth shall triumph over all—Forever and forevermore the Truth shall triumph over all!"

Thus saith the Keeper of the Key,
And the Great Seal of Destiny,
Whose eye is the blue canopy;
And leaves his firmament of Peace and Silence over bond and free.

THE TRAITOR'S VISION.

BY G. WILLIS WHITE, JR.

He lay on his couch in the silent hour,
And the midnight lamp burned dim,
And he thought of the reins of despotic power,
That none could hold but him;
But his brain was fevered and weary with thought,
And his body was racked with pain,
While his heart beat fast when his memory sought
To bring back old times again.

He figured his profits—a good round sum
They seemed to his fevered mind;
But a spectre grim there seemed to come,
When a balance he sought to find;
He saw on the wall, and in clear relief,
A ghostly group of mechanics appear,
And they built a gallows, and talked of a thief,
Who, dreading his death, was standing near;

And straightway from out of the midst of them all,
A man walked forth with a face like the dead,
While these words appeared above on the wall:
"He betrayed the country that gave him bread!"
And he that lay on his couch that night,
Gazed trembling forward into the space,
While his heart stood still with a sudden fright,
As the criminal turned—he saw his own face!

THE WIDOW OF WORCESTER COUNTY, (EDWARDS' FERRY.)

BY "S. W."

Last spring, when Frank had fed the ploughed and harrowed ground with seed,
A fearful cry tore by us with the South wind's wingéd speed;
But we hoped it was a nightmare, till the news was brought from town,
That the horde of Charleston traitor-knaves had shot
our banner down.
In my bitter grief and anguish keen, I felt the ancient ire
Of Bunker Hill and Lexington course through my veins like fire,
Till, as lightnings cease when breaks the dark cloud's heart upon the land,
I wept when, on my thin gray locks, I felt Frank's manly hand,
And saw my grandsire's musket gleam within his clenchéd grip,
And read the clear and stern gray eye that chid the quivering lip;
Read that the eye would smile no more until it saw
the foe,
Whilst the lips were loth to shape the words, "Dear mother, I must go."
So I sealed them with a kiss, dried up my tears, and filled his sack,
And, at dawn, upon his home my only darling turned his back.
As he kissed my cheek at parting, he whispered in my ear,
"Do not let my Ruth forget me, though I stay away
a year."
Our garden's yield was plenteous, and the meadow filled the mow,
And Ruth came over twice a day to milk our only cow.
The rye that Frank had sown sprang up and turned from green to gold,
But a stranger's flail, within the barn, its master's absence told.
Whilst the hireling reaped the grain, I shudd'ring thought, but held my breath,
How busy in Virginia was the sickle keen of Death!
Thus the troubled summer sped, our note of time the weekly cheer
Of his letters; and we kissed them when they reckoned half a year.
Yesterday I heard our boys had crossed the broad Potomac's flow;
Ruth was reading of the streams where Babel's weeping willows grow,
When a dove perched on the line through which flash
before our gate
Words of sorrow or of gladness for the people and the State.

That lightning-chord the South breeze sighed a sad Æolian moan,
 And my heart grew sick, on looking up, to see the dove had flown.
 Neighbors say there's been a battle, and that we have lost again;
 Was that dove my poor boy's spirit? Is his name among the slain?

ZAGONYL

BY GEORGE H. BOKER.

Bold captain of the Body-Guard,
 I'll troll a stave to thee!
 My voice is somewhat harsh and hard,
 And rough my minstrelsy.
 I've cheered until my throat is sore
 For how our boys at Beaufort bore;
 Yet here's a cheer for thee!

I hear thy jingling spurs and reins,
 Thy sabre at thy knee;
 The blood runs lighter through my veins,
 As I before me see
 Thy hundred men, with thrusts and blows,
 Ride down a thousand stubborn foes,
 The foremost led by thee.

With pistol snap and rifle crack—
 Mere salvos fired to honor thee—
 Ye plunge, and stamp, and shoot, and hack
 The way your swords make free;
 Then back again—the path is wide
 This time—ye gods! it was a ride,
 The ride they took with thee!

No guardsman of the whole command
 Halts, quails, or turns to flee;
 With bloody spur and steady hand
 They gallop where they see
 Thy leading plume stream out ahead,
 O'er flying, wounded, dying, dead;
 They can but follow thee.

So, captain of the Body-Guard,
 I pledge a health to thee!
 I hope to see thy shoulders starred,
 My Paladin; and we Shall laugh at fortune in the fray,
 Whene'er you lead your well-known way
 To death or victory!

RHODE ISLAND TO THE SOUTH.

BY GEN. F. W. LANDER.

Once on New England's bloody heights,
 And o'er a Southern plain,
 Our fathers fought for sovereign rights,
 That working men might reign.

And by that only Lord we serve,
 The great Jehovah's name;
 By those sweet lips that ever nerve
 High hearts to deeds of fame;

By all that makes the man a king,
 The household hearth a throne—

VOL. III.—POETRY 5

Take back the idle scoff ye fling,
 Where freedom claims its own.

For though our battle hope was vague
 Upon Manassas' plain,
 Where Slocum stood with gallant Sprague,
 And gave his life in vain;

Before we yield the holy trust
 Our old forefathers gave,
 Or wrong New England's hallowed dust,
 Or grant the wrongs ye crave—

We'll print in kindred gore so deep
 The shore we love to tread,
 That woman's eyes shall fail to weep
 O'er man's unnumbered dead.

THE WIDE-AWAKE MAN.

Dedicated to the Stay-at-Home Black-Capes.

Now, while our soldiers are fighting our battles,
 Each at his post to do all that he can,
 Down among rebels and contraband chattels,
 What are you doing, my wide-awake man?

All the brave boys under canvas are sleeping,
 All of them pressing to march with the van,
 Far from the home where their sweethearts are weeping,—
 What are you waiting for, wide-awake man?

You, with the terrible warlike moustaches,
 Fit for a colonel or chief of a clan,
 You, with the waist made for sword-belts and sashes,
 Where are your shoulder-straps, wide-awake man?

Bring him the bottomless garment of woman!
 Cover his face lest it freckle and tan;
 Muster the apron-string guards on the Common,
 That is the corps for the wide-awake man.

Give him for escort a file of young misses,
 Each of them armed with a deadly ratan;
 They shall defend him from laughter and hisses,
 Aimed by low boys at the wide-awake man.

O, but the black-cape guards are the fellows!
 Drilling each day since our troubles began—
 "Handle your walking-stick!" "Shoulder umbrellas!"
 That is the style for the wide-awake man.

Catch me confiding my person with strangers!
 Think how the cowardly Bull Runners ran!
 In the brigade of the stay-at-home black-capes
 Marches my corps, says the wide-awake man.

Such was the stuff of the Malakoff takers,
 Such were the soldiers that scaled the Redan;
 Truculent housemaids and blood-thirsty Quakers
 Brave not the wrath of the wide-awake man.

When the brown soldiers come back from the borders,
 How will they look while his features they scan?
 How will he feel when he gets marching orders,
 Signed by his lady-love, wide-awake man?

Now, then, nine cheers for the torch-bearing rangers!

Blow the great fish-horn and beat the big pan!
First in the field that is farthest from danger,
Take your white feather plume, wide-awake man.

THE LAND WE LOVE.

BY MRS. EMELINE S. SMITH.

The land we love! the land we love!
How shall we sound its praise to-day?
Such hope and fear our spirits move,
We cannot sing—we can but pray.

Oh! Star of Promise, shine again,
From out these cloud-enveloped skies!
O, heavenly Light, our path make plain,
Through the dark mists that round us rise!

Since last to these fair vales and hills
We saw the hues of autumn come,
What desolating griefs and ills
Have frowned o'er Freedom's sacred home!

Now vainly all these splendors smile
On wooded height and winding shore;
They cannot saddest thoughts beguile,
Or charm us as they charmed of yore.

In vain bright harvests gleam around;
In vain fair plenty crowns the year;
No heart to joy's light thrill can bound
While warfare's heavy woes are near.

Oh! worse than in that weary time
When patriot sires their toil begun!
When, struggling long with hope sublime,
This goodly heritage they won.

They rose against a foreign foe;
They battled with an alien crew;
Their hands were strong to give the blow;
Their hearts were eager to subdue.

But we!—we pause in doubt and dread;
We have no spirit for the fray—
It is not alien blood we shed,
A friend, a brother, we may slay.

A brother! No! blot out the name,
And "traitor" let the record stand;
For traitors they—all lost to shame—
Who plot against their native land.

Just Heaven! that such a thing should be!
That recreant man bright gifts should war,
And wage 'gainst land so fair and free,
Unnatural and unholy war!

O, Southern chiefs! O, rebel bands!
A sacrilegious deed ye do!
Ye smite, with parricidal hands,
The sacred breast whence life ye drew.

Men of the North! go forth—go forth,
To aid your young Republic now;
Oh! let not her who gave you birth,
Beneath this weight of sorrow bow.

Take from her cheek the flush of shame;
To her sad brow its crown rest e;
And let her, 'mid the nations, claim
The honored place she held before.

Show her she still has loyal sons—
Sons worthy their immortal sires—
Sons through whose leaping veins yet runs
The old, warm glow of sacred fires.

Go forth, unwavering, to the strife;
Give fervent prayers, your zeal to prove;
Give toil and treasure, strength and life—
Give all to save the land you love.

MISSING.

Not among the suffering wounded;
Not among the peaceful dead;
Not among the prisoners. "Missing"—
That was all the message said.

Yet his mother reads it over,
Until, through her painful tears,
Fades the dear name she has called him
For these two-and-twenty years.

Round her all is peace and plenty;
Bright and clean the yellow floor;
While the morning-glories cluster
All around the kitchen door.

Soberly the sleek old house cat
Drowzes in his patch of sun;
Neatly shines the oaken dresser,
All the morning's work is done.

Through the window comes the fragrance
Of a sunny harvest morn,
Fragment songs from distant reapers,
And the rustling of the corn.

And the rich breath of the garden,
Where the golden melons lie;
Where the blushing plums are turning
All their red cheeks to the sky.

Sitting there within the sunshine—
Leaning in her easy chair;
With soft lines upon her forehead,
And the silver in her hair—

Blind to sunshine—dead to fragrance—
On that royal harvest morn;
Thinking, while her heart is weeping,
Of her noble-browed first-born;

How he left her in the spring-time,
With his young heart full of flame,
With his clear and ringing footstep,
With his lithe and supple frame.

How with tears his eyes were brimming
As he kissed a last "Good-bye,"
Yet she heard him whistling gayly
As he went across the rye.

MISSING! Why should he be missing?
He would fight until he fell;
And if wounded, killed, or missing,
Some one there would be to tell.

MISSING. Still a hope to cheer her !
Safe, triumphant, he may come,
With the victor army shouting,
With the clamor of the drum !

So, through all the days of autumn—
In the eve and in the morn—
She will hear his quickening footstep
In the rustling of the corn ;

Or, she will hush her household,
While her heart goes leaping high,
Thinking that she hears him whistling
In the pathway through the rye.
* * * * *

Far away through all the autumn,
In a lonely, lonely glade,
In the dreary desolation
That the battle-storm has made—

With the rust upon his musket—
In the eve and in the morn—
In the rank gloom of the fern leaves
Lies her noble-browed first-born.

“AT EVENING TIME IT SHALL BE LIGHT.”

BY “C. F.”

Our nation's sun was clouded o'er,
When erst he rose at morn ;
But soon those beams were hid no more,
Afar the clouds were borne.
We for a while enjoyed his rays
In all their noon-tide power,
Now once again is hid that blaze,
In this our darkest hour.
But freedom's sky shall yet be bright,
“At evening time it shall be light.”

The sun of Liberty shall ne'er
In clouds and darkness set ;
Her sons are brave—they know no fear—
And God is with us yet.
We know, whatever may betide,
Be it for good or ill,
It is in mercy He doth chide—
His arm is pow'ful still.
Then strike ! for God and for the Right,
“At evening time it shall be light.”

POETRY BY GEN. LANDER.

The following stanzas were written by Brig.-Gen. Lander, on hearing that the Confederate troops had said that “Fewer of the Massachusetts officers would have been killed if they had not been too proud to surrender.” We trust that the suggestion in the last stanza will be promptly met, and the Twentieth Massachusetts be at once recruited to its full complement.

“OURS.”

Aye, deem us proud ! for we are more
Than proud of all our mighty dead ;
Proud of the bleak and rock-bound shore
A crowned oppressor cannot tread.

Proud of each rock, and wood, and glen,
Of every river, lake, and plain ;
Proud of the calm and earnest men
Who claim the right and will to reign.

Proud of the men who gave us birth,
Who battled with the stormy wave,
To sweep the red man from the earth,
And build their homes upon his grave.

Proud of the holy summer morn,
They traced in blood upon its sod ;
The rights of freemen yet unborn,
Proud of their language and their God.

Proud, that beneath our proudest dome,
And round the cottage-cradled hearth,
There is a welcome and a home
For every stricken race on earth.

Proud that yon slowly sinking sun
Saw drowning lips grow white in prayer,
O'er such brief acts of duty done
As honor gathers from despair.

Pride—'tis our watchword, “Clear the boats !”
“Holmes, Putnam, Bartlett, Pierson—here !”
And while this crazy wherry floats,
“Let's save our wounded !” cries Revere.

Old State—some souls are rudely sped—
This record for thy Twentieth corps,
Imprisoned, wounded, dying, dead,
It only asks, “Has Sparta more ?”

AN INCIDENT OF THE WAR.

There are bright spots in the darkness of war. Deeds of mercy by an enemy shed lustre on our common humanity. They have been commemorated in the heroic song of Homer, and have been eagerly caught and honored in every age by the human heart. They bid us hope, too, that the present contest grows, in part, out of mutual misapprehension of the purposes and spirit of the two sections of the country arrayed against each other.

The following lines were written by a lady of Stockbridge, and commemorate an incident very touching and beautiful, which rests upon the best authority, and which ought to be known.

Colonel Mulligan refused his parole at Lexington, and his wife resolved to share his captivity. Accordingly she left her infant, fourteen months old, in the care of one of the strongest secessionist women in the town. That woman assumed the charge of the little child, and dressed it in the captured American flag.

The fight had ceased ! The cannon's roar
Was silent on Missouri's shore ;
The leader and his band so brave
Had turned from walls they could not save—

When voice was heard of sore lament,
A mother o'er her baby bent,
And fast the bitter tears were shed
That fell upon his little head :

“Thy father yields his post and sword,
But rebels shall not have his 'word ;’
In prison rather ling'ring lie,
Than yield the right to fight and die !

“And faithful love shall follow there,
His hard captivity to share ;
But thee, my boy ! such fate for thee !
Like fettered cherub thus to be !

“To pine in loathsome, poisoned air,
To dwell in dungeon damp and bare

Oh! better far for thee, my blest,
Beneath the daisy's turf to rest."

The words her lips are scarcely past,
When round her arms are kindly cast;
A foeman's wife with pitying face,
The mother and the child embrace.

With glowing cheek, with brimming eyes,
"Give me thy son!" she earnest cries;
"And haste thee! for the moments press—
They spare thee but a brief career!"

She's gone, and other care shall shield
The all-unconscious happy child;
Who laughs when glittering foemen come,
And shouts at roll of hostile drum.

But still his friend with instinct true
Has robbed him in his red and blue!
And—mantle fit!—has o'er him thrown
The flag 'neath which the boy was born!

THE STOCKING.

By the fireside cosily seated,
With spectacles riding her nose,
The lively old lady is knitting
A wonderful pair of hose.
She pities the shivering soldier
Who is out in the pelting storm,
And busily plies her needles
To keep him hearty and warm.

Her eyes are reading the embers,
But her heart is off to the war,
For she knows what those brave fellows
Are gallantly fighting for.
Her fingers, as well as her fancy,
Are cheering them on their way,
Who, under the good old banner,
Are saving the country to-day.

She ponders how, in her childhood,
Her grandmother used to tell
The story of barefoot soldiers
Who fought so long and so well:
And the men of the Revolution
Are nearer to her than us,
And that, perhaps, is the reason
Why she is toiling thus.

She cannot shoulder a musket,
Nor ride with the cavalry crew,
But, nevertheless, she is ready
To work for the boys who do.
And yet, in official despatches
That come from the army or fleet,
Her feats may have never a notice
Though ever so mighty the feat!

So prithe, proud owner of muscle,
Or purse-proud owner of stocks,
Don't sneer at the labors of woman,
Or smile at her bundle of socks.
Her heart may be larger and braver
Than his who is tallest of all;
The work of her hands as important
As cash that buys powder and ball.

And thus, while her quiet performance
Is being recorded in rhyme,
The tools in her tremulous fingers
Are running a race with Time.
Strange that four needles can form
A perfect triangular bound—
And equally strange that their antics
Result in perfecting "the round."

And now, while beginning "to narrow,"
She thinks of the Maryland mud,
And wonders if ever the stocking
Will wade to the ankle in blood.
And now she is "shaping the heel,"
And now she is ready "to bind,"
And hopes, if the soldier is wounded,
It never will be from behind.

And now she is "raising the instep,"
Now "narrowing off at the toe,"
And prays that this end of the worsted
May ever be turned to the foe.
She "gathers" the last of the stitches,
As if a new laurel were won,
And, placing the ball in the basket,
Announces the stocking is "done."

Ye men, who our fighting our battles,
Away from the comforts of life,
Who thoughtfully muse, by your camp-fires,
On sweetheart, or sister, or wife;
Just think of their elders a little,
And pray for their grandmothers, too,
Who, patiently sitting in corners,
Are knitting the stockings for you. C.

LYON.

Sing, bird, on green Missouri's plain,
The saddest song of sorrow;
Drop tears, O clouds, in gentlest rain
Ye from the winds can borrow;
Breath out, ye winds, your softest sigh,
Weep, flowers, in dewy splendor,
For him who knew well how to die,
But never to surrender.

Up rose serene the August sun,
Upon that day of glory;
Up curled from musket and from gun
The war-cloud gray and hoary;
It gathered like a funeral pall,
Now broken and now blended,
Where rang the bugle's angry call,
And rank with rank contended.

Four thousand men, as brave and true
As e'er went forth in daring,
Upon the foe that morning threw
The strength of their despairing.
They feared not death—men bless the field
That patriot soldiers die on—
Fair Freedom's cause was sword and shield,
And at their head was Lyon.

Their leader's troubled soul looked forth
From eyes of troubled brightness;
Sad soul! the burden of the North
Had pressed out all its lightness.

He gazed upon the unequal fight,
His ranks all rent and gory,
And felt the shadows close like night
Round his career of glory.

"General, come lead us!" loud the cry
From a brave band was ringing—
"Lead us, and we will stop, or die,
That battery's awful singing."
He spurred to where his heroes stood,
Twice wounded—no one knowing—
The fire of battle in his blood
And on his forehead glowing.

Oh! cursed for aye that traitor's hand,
And cursed that aim so deadly,
Which smote the bravest of the land,
And dyed his bosom redly!
Serene he lay, while past him pressed
The battle's furious billow,
As calmly as a babe may rest
Upon its mother's pillow.

So Lyon died! and well may flowers
His place of burial cover,
For never had this land of ours
A more devoted lover.
Living, his country was his bride,
His life he gave her, dying,
Life, fortune, love, he nought denied,
To her and to her sighing.

Rest, patriot, in thy hillside grave,
Beside her form who bore thee!
Long may the land thou diedst to save
Her bannered stars wave o'er thee!
Upon her history's brightest page,
And on fame's glowing portal,
She'll write thy grand, heroic page,
And grave thy name immortal. H. P.

NATIONAL FOGS.

BY E. P. DYER.

But in the state grim fogs appear,
That will not soon away,
When anarchy and panic fear
And treason rule the day.

Time was but eight short weeks ago,
Before the leaves were out,
That all were trembling for the blow
Before a rebel rout.

Dark was the cloud, that, like a shroud,
Enveloped all the land;
The thunder bellowed deep and loud,
The storm was close at hand.

Columbia's fears were boundless then,
Her hopes of good were few;
"Disunion!" was the cry of men,
Their cry, and ruin, too.

We saw bold anarchy prepared
To level with the sod
The temple by our fathers reared
To Liberty and God.

Vol. III.—POETRY 6

We saw them light the fatal torch,
And grasp the axe and mace,
And enter at the very porch
Of Freedom's holy place.

And yet we stood like hirelings near
To see the temple fall,
Entreating, weeping, pale with fear,
Lest they should ruin all—

While he who kept the inner gate
Was neither wise nor true,
But sat and wept, disconsolate—
'Twas all he dared to do.

And when there came a man of might
In earnest to defend,
The traitors, eager for the fight,
Began the bitter end.

They strike the blow; the trumpet sounds
A warning, loud and long,
In every ear the note resounds,
And wakes the battle-song.

To arms! to arms! whoever loves
The land that gave him birth!
To arms! to arms! whoe'er approves!
What is not freedom worth?

It wakes the city and the farm,
The hillside and the plain,—
And fills the land with just alarm,
From Oregon to Maine.

A score of millions hear the cry,
And herald it abroad;
To arms they fly, to do or die,
For Liberty and God.

Old Massachusetts caught the word,
And as a mighty man,
She buckled on the trusty sword,
And boldly led the van.

Could she forget the hallowed ground
Where first the Pilgrims trod,—
Who made the woods with songs resound,
For Freedom and for God?

Had she forgotten Lexington,
And Concord's bloody field?
And was she now a timid one,
To crouch, and cower, and yield?

No! Massachusetts rose in might,
As in the days of yore,
And entered first the bloody fight
In brutal Baltimore.

How steady was the measured tramp,
How resolute the eye,
As through the traitors' very camp
They marched, perhaps to die.

And when they met the frantic mob,
How unappalled they stood,
While courage quickened every throb
Of patriotic blood.

They raised the arm, they struck the blow,
And gloried in the deed,
That first of all they met the foe,
And made rebellion bleed.

But not without a saddening word
Is told the glorious tale;
For three of Massachusetts' sons
Amid the struggle fell.

The message flew as on the wind
To every freeman's door;
"The blood of Massachusetts stains
The streets of Baltimore!"

Then came again the cry, "To arms!
The capital must yield,
Unless ten thousand valiant men
Shall quickly take the field."

At once ten times ten thousand rose,
Who had not armed before;
A million men were ready, then,
To march through Baltimore.

E'en those who once had striven in vain
To palliate the wrong,
And sought a poor, precarious peace,
Took up the battle-song.

One heart, one hand, the North-men stand,
And swear they will be free;
They battle for their native land,
For life and liberty.

Look, England, who art wont to sneer!
And Europe, now behold!
See here the patriotic zeal
That fired the men of old.

The blood that coursed the father's veins
Is still as warm and pure;
Now call our Government a dream,
Our freedom insecure!

That taunted lack of loyalty!
Look, Europe, what a sight!
When twenty millions rise in strength,
To vindicate the right.

Was ever such a loyalty
Bestowed on any throne?
Can such a country ever fall,
Where such a love is shown?

Ah, no! America shall rise
Above the dismal cloud;
This is her resurrection morn!
She casts aside the shroud!

Harp of Columbia! there is still
A theme to waken thee;
Thou canst again the bosom thrill
As when, of old, from hill to hill
Thy echoes roused the yeoman's will,
And taught him to be free!

Hast thou forgot the songs of yore
Amid the scenes of peace?
And shall thy music nevermore
Awake the land from shore to shore,

As when, from tyrant's hateful power,
Our fathers sought release?

Who calls America a land
Degenerate and base?
'Tis false! 'tis false! that noble band
Who sought their freedom, sword in hand,
Shall see their sons forever stand
A free, a loyal race.

How base the heart that could forget
The blood the fathers spilt!
How heartless he who leaves his debt
Of gratitude to go unmet,
And he, how tenfold baser yet,
Who glories in the guilt!

Ah, yes! Columbia is true,
Her sons are firm and brave;
Let traitors come with fierce ado,
We'll break their columns through and through,
A traitor's death we'll give them, too,
And each a traitor's grave.

Then sweep, ye winds, across the plain!
Ye rivers, to the sea!
Proclaim the word o'er earth and main,
The blood of yore is young again,
Its loyalty without a stain,—
Columbia still is free!

THE DEAD WARRIOR.

BY PARK BENJAMIN.

Bind the oak leaves round his head;
He has shown himself a man;
Bravely charging, he fell dead,
Fighting foremost in the van.

Cheering with a mighty cheer,
On he led the serried band;
Now he lies upon his bier,
Cold and stately, still and grand.

Calmly gather round him now,
All ye soldiers, and be dumb;
Cast one look upon his brow
As you hear the muffled drum.

Then, with solemn feet, and slow,
Mourning for his early doom,
With your folded banners go,
Lay the hero in his tomb.

LINES

Respectfully inscribed to the loyal ladies of Kentucky, and especially to Mrs. Nannette Smith and Mrs. Bland
Bullard, of Louisville, Kentucky, by a private in Captain Van Trees' company, Sixth regiment of Indiana Volunteers, Col. T. T. Crittenden commanding.

BY W. S. G.

We left our homes and firesides,
And those who love us dearly—
Our mothers, brothers, sisters, wives—
All those we love sincerely.
And why? A noble sister State
Called out in tones of thunder,
"Brothers, there's traitors on our soil
Who'd rend our peace asunder."

We heard the call—responded, too,
Though bitter was our parting;
We joined the gallant Crittenden,
As with one heart upstarting.
We gave a hasty brief adieu,
With hearts somewhat dejected;
But every Hoosier vowed to see
Kentucky's fair protected.

And have we proved false to our trust,
Or shirked the foe before us?
Nay! we'll e'er follow that old flag
That's proudly streaming o'er us!
Our fathers bore it on the fields
Won by blood-wrought election;—
And we, their humble progeny,
Will die for its protection.

And, sons of old Kentucky's soil,
The "bloody ground" of story,
Have you proved recreant to yourselves,
And blasted all your glory?
Nay! rouse! rehearse the solemn vows
Which once our fathers plighted,
Shoulder to shoulder let us stand
Till North and South's united.

The same bright stream that laps your State
Rolls on the beach of ours;
And many a Hoosier tendril is Twined with Kentucky's flowers.
All human hopes, all human ties,
Can brothers lightly sever?
Nay! till our country's foes are crushed,
Let's be allied together.

Ye loyal ladies of this State,
Who scorn Disunion's faction,
Arouse your brothers, gallants, sons,
To patriotic action.
Your eloquence can touch their hearts;
Your smiles will hosts assemble;
Place in their hands that "standard sheet"
Before which traitors tremble.

Ladies! we hail your grateful acts
With true, heart-felt emotion,
And for you and our country's rights
We pledge life-long devotion;
May fairest flowers strew your path
On earth to God's own heaven;
And e'er on glory's pages live
Kentucky's loyal women.

CAMP INDIANA, HARDIN CO., KY., Oct. 28, 1861.

WHISKEY AND ICE SCARCE AT RICHMOND.—The New Orleans Picayune thinks whiskey and ice must be growing exceedingly scarce in Richmond. A "friend just returned informs the editor, on entering a fashionable drinking saloon in the Confederate capital, he saw this placard posted over the counter: 'Drinks fifteen cents each. No bills changed except at heavy discount. Gentlemen will please refrain from eating the ice in their tumblers after drinking.'"—Cincinnati Gazette, Nov. 14.

A LITTLE COUNTY WITH A BIG HEART.—Ritchie County, in Western Virginia, is a very small county, but she gave seven hundred votes for the Union, and out of these seven hundred voters, five hundred have gone to make good their ballots with their bayonets, and others are getting ready to do the same.—Philadelphia Bulletin, Sept. 19.

PICKET COURTESIES.—A night or two ago, a German picket-guard stationed outside of Arlington, in Va., heard their own language spoken by the rebel scouts opposite them. A few words were interchanged, and the parties on both sides, finding themselves fellow-countrymen, proceeded to meet each other in perfect confidence. So well pleased were they with their interview that, after posting a sufficient number of guards along the prescribed lines, the majority returned to the neutral ground, and, building a fire, passed the best part of the night together, on the warmest and most amicable terms.—N. Y. Tribune, Sept. 25.

PRINCE NAPOLEON AND THE UNION.—The Mining Register relates that while Prince Napoleon was at Copper Falls, in Lake Superior region, the following incident occurred:

While returning from the stamp mill, the Prince proposed to drink (it being quite warm) from a spring by the wayside, and, taking an empty powder can used by the miners for the purpose, he drank—"The land of Washington—one and inseparable." The compliment was handsomely returned by Mr. Burnham, in—"France—the friend of America," which was received by the whole party with much enthusiasm.

DAN RICE, the showman, is stumping the Western States, outside of his menagerie, in favor of the Union cause. He addressed a meeting at Oshkosh, Wis., on the 28th ult.—Louisville Journal, Sept. 12.

MAJOR LYNDE, the officer who surrendered Fort Fillmore to the rebels in New Mexico, has been arrested by two of his subordinates, (Captains Gibbs and Potter,) who have taken the responsibility of conveying him to Santa Fé for trial. The old man was very indignant at this treatment, but the two captains were young and active, and held him fast.—N. Y. Evening Post, Sept. 11.

MAURY'S "OBSERVATIONS."—A curious discovery was made at the national observatory at Washington, from which Lieut. Maury seceded. On attempting to use some of the instruments for observation, it was found that a large tree had grown up in front of them so as to completely obstruct the view—thus giving conclusive evidence that the instruments have not been used for years! A striking commentary on the manner in which the seceding superintendent discharged his duties. Workmen are now cutting away the mute but unimpeachable witness against him.—N. Y. Tribune, Sept. 11.

IMPRESSMENT OF WOMEN IN MEMPHIS.—The Memphis (Tenn.) Appeal of the 5th of Sept. has a long account of the action of the Common Council of that city in relation to the want of nurses for the soldiers. It gives a deplorable account of the condition of the hospitals, and that the women refused to do any thing to aid them until it absolutely became necessary to appeal to the Council to force women to work in the hospitals. The Appeal heads its Common Council report "Impressing Women," and says:

"By permission, Dr. Keller was allowed to state to the Board that the washing of the sick soldiers had not been done for two weeks; the cleanliness of the hospital, and consequently the lives of the soldiers, were involved. Fifteen dollars a month each woman would be paid, but no effort had been able to procure women, either black or white, who would remain more than a day or two. Dr. Keller called upon the Council to order the police to compel the women to do the work. Ald. Kortrecht offered a resolution to grant the request. Ald. Merrill said the request deserved attention, if it was only from the fact that it was the first request the military power had made of the city authorities. That power had hitherto paid little attention to the officers and laws of the city."

Dr. Keller's request was finally refused, after more discussion.

The Appeal says that the Southern Mothers' Home in Memphis is overflowing with sick soldiers, and citizens willing to take any of the sufferers in their own houses are earnestly requested to inform the association.

JEFF. DAVIS.

By the act of rebelling, Jeff. Davis appears
To have shown to the world a pair of long ears;
As a mettlesome beast he is needing a check,
And the wisest is this: to halter his neck.

—Hudson River Chronicle, Oct. 15.

MARY HENDERSON, an old lady of Johnson County, Indiana, who has been blind for a number of years, has knit twelve pairs of socks for volunteers in the army from her neighborhood, the yarn for which she twisted herself at the spinning wheel. This is an example worthy of being imitated by those who are younger, and have the unimpaired use of their organs of vision.—Louisville Journal, Nov. 15.

DISGUISED AS A BELL-WETHER.—The Louisville Journal gives the following account of a noted character:

"Among the Tennesseans now in camp in Kentucky is a little fellow of about five feet four inches, with gray and grizzled beard, dilapidated nose, and an eye as keen as a fish-hawk's. The manner of his escape was remarkable and highly ingenious. He headed a large squad of his neighbors, and eluded the rebel pickets by wearing a big sheep's bell on his head, and bleating away over the mountains, followed by a herd of men who did likewise. By this stratagem he deceived the rebel scouts, and passed within a few feet of them through one of the most important mountain passes. Old Macfarland (for that is the name of the hero of the bell) thus won the sobriquet of the bell-wether, by which name he passes all through the camps. He is a rough and good-humored old man, with a full supply of mother wit, and speaks of himself as 'under size and over age for a soldier,' which he literally is."

THE battle-field of Bull Run is owned by George Leary, of New York, son of the famous hatter. As soon as the war is over, certain parties, with the consent of Mr. Leary, intend building an immense hotel there, to accommodate the curious, who will flock there to inspect the battle-field.—Woonsocket Patriot, Oct. 4.

A PATRIOTIC FAMILY.—David Norton, of Candia, N. H., has all his sons—William C., David T., Richard E., and Henry C.—in the Federal army. Mr.

Norton himself served in the war of 1812, and was on duty at Marblehead when the ship Constitution was chased into port by two British seventy-four gun ships. His father, Mr. Simon Norton, who was born at Chester, N. H., 1760, enlisted when fifteen years of age, and served throughout the Revolutionary War. He was in the battles at Bunker's Hill and at Bennington, and went South under General Washington. In 1775 and 1776 he was in Breed's regiment, under Capt. Emerson, of Candia. Henry C., the youngest son, seventeen years old, was in the battle of Bull Run under Colonel Marston, of the New Hampshire Second, and was there wounded by a rifle ball. The ball tore away his hat band, and, glancing along the skull several inches, lodged there and was not extracted till he reached Washington, he walking the whole distance. The next morning the brave young soldier was ready for duty. Neither Mr. Norton nor his father ever received a pension. Such patriotism is worthy of record.—Boston Journal.

"ODE TO NEGRO LIBERTY."—The pastor of the church in Dayton, Ohio, where Vallandigham attends, the other day gave out the beautiful hymn:

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing;

whereupon Vallandigham wrote the pastor a scurrilous letter, roundly abusing him for introducing an "ode to negro liberty" into religious exercises.—Lawrence (Kansas) Republican, Oct. 10.

THE New Bedford Mercury states that Mrs. Samuel A. Frazer, of Duxbury, Mass., is now (Oct. 10) engaged in knitting stockings for soldiers in our army. She was employed eighty-five years ago in knitting stockings for the soldiers of the Revolution. She is now ninety-two years old.

GEN. BUCKNER, at Rochester, on Green River, Ky., forcibly took a fine yoke of oxen and other property from the Rev. Mr. Wiggins, a worthy clergyman, and paid him with a three hundred dollar check on the Southern Bank at Russellville, where he hadn't funds to the amount of a dollar. To say nothing of the epauletted rascal's forcible seizure of the property, his giving a check upon a bank in which he had no money deposited was a penitentiary offence under our laws. We hope the officers of justice in that section will do their duty. We are well aware, that if Buckner shall be put to hard work at Frankfort in the service of the State, his friend the Governor will let him loose, but he should be sent there anyhow.—Louisville Journal, Oct. 12.

A KENTUCKY GIRL.—Capt. Claypool, living about ten miles from Bowling Green, is commander of a company of Home Guards. He had the guns of his company at his house, but, on hearing of the arrival of General Buckner at Bowling Green, he sent them to Colonel Grider's camp in a neighboring county. The next day a squad, despatched by Buckner, called at his house, and, finding only his daughter, demanded the guns of her. She answered that they were not there, and that, if they were, she wouldn't give them up. They handed her Gen. Buckner's order for the weapons, and she tore it up before their faces. They went to the bucket and took each a drink of water, whereupon she threw the rest of the water out of the bucket and commenced scouring the dipper.

They concluded they could do no better than to go back and tell their General about their adventure and get fresh instructions.—Louisville Journal, Oct. 12.

AN ODE

On the "Caravan Government" (so called by a Southern Editor,) to be sung at the Funeral Solemnities of the Southern Confederacy.

COMPOSED BY JEFF. DAVIS AND CO.

TUNE—"Secession hath killed us."

The "Caravan Government" hath taken its flight
From Montgomery to Richmond, to stop over-night;
The next move it shall make will be over the sea,
Where Jeff. Davis and Co. are expecting to flee.*

The mushroom Confederacy shall not go abroad,
The halter shall hang it, or some vengeance of God.
By Jehovah blockaded, the Pharaohs shall sleep
In the sea with their banners; who for them shall weep?

But the pure flag of the Union shall proudly wave
O'er land and o'er ocean, yes, o'er the vile traitors' grave;
The God of our fathers shall oppression destroy,
And the bright star of freedom shall thrill us with joy.
—Boston Traveler.

CONGRESSMAN ELY PRESENTED WITH A WOODEN SWORD BY HIS FELLOW-PRISONERS.—HON. Alfred Ely, M. C., of the Rochester, (N. Y.) district, in Lincoln's Congress, who was captured on the field of Manassas on the memorable 21st of July, and who has since been imprisoned in one of the Richmond tobacco factories, was the recipient, a few days since, of a valuable token of the regard and esteem in which he is held by his fellow-prisoners. An ingenious artisan among the number fabricated a wooden sword of considerable dimensions and comely shape, together with a rope sash, which was presented to the belligerent Congressman by a committee in an address, which was replied to by the recipient of the honor in excellent style, followed by an acceptance of the gift. The prisoners, of whom Mr. Ely is one, seem to get along very well under the care of Capt. G. C. Gibbs, who has them in charge. Mr. Ely himself certainly has not suffered in flesh, however he may have done in the spirit.—Richmond Examiner, Oct. 7.

It is rumored that Lincoln is about to issue a proclamation declaring all matrimonial relations existing between his loyal subjects, male or female, and secession enemies, male or female, to be null, void, and thenceforth dissolved, the parties divorced being at liberty to contract new marriage relations as shall please them to do so, so that their new spouses be good and loyal persons.

On this subject the Richmond Enquirer says that Mr. Lincoln will induce the next Congress to pass a divorce act to divorce wives residing within the jurisdiction of Abraham, where husbands have left them with the intention of aiding the fortunes of the South.—Richmond Dispatch, Oct. 10.

* Jeff. Davis and his brother Joe have invested two hundred thousand dollars in France, so that if compelled to leave America they may be provided with a home there.

THE Memphis Appeal offers the following polite invitation: "Let the brutal minions of a beastly despotism come on! The slaughter pens are ready, and Yankee blood shall flow as free as festal wine."—N. Y. World, October.

HOW MAJOR TANNER FELL.—The Brown County (Ind.) Union, contains a letter from Missouri, dated Sept. 21st, in which the writer, an eye-witness, gives the following account of the rencontre in which the gallant Major Gordon Tanner received the wounds which resulted in his death:

On the 18th inst., under command of Lieut.-Col. Hendricks, our regiment proceeded by steamer, in company with the Eighteenth Indiana and Twenty-sixth Indiana, from Jefferson City, up the river, and on the 19th reached a point about five miles below Glasgow, where it was reported the secessionists were collected in force.

It was night when we reached the point referred to—a bright, moonlight night—when two or three companies from the Eighteenth and three companies, including ours from the Twenty-second, were ordered, under command of Major Tanner, to proceed by land through a corn-field and the "woods" to the town to take it by surprise. We proceeded about a quarter of a mile through a corn-field, and had reached a point at the foot of a hill in the woods, when Major Tanner ordered company B, Capt. Steepleton, and my company, C, to proceed to the front of the column, which we did. The head of our company rested upon an eminence; all to the rear, down at the base of the hill, some ten or fifteen feet lower.

Major Tanner rode up on the left of the column, some five or six steps from where we were, and asked where company B was. He was told. He then asked where was company C. I answered, "Here." He was then on horseback, in the moonlight, in full uniform. I had scarcely answered, when a volley of musketry, judging from the volume of sound, amounting to, at least, a platoon, opened upon us, being directed at Major Tanner, who was shot through the hips, and shortly fell from his horse. The body of the volley passed a little over our heads (those of us on the high ground) being evidently aimed at Major Tanner, who was between us and the direction of the fire, but directly in its line. The suddenness and the nearness produced such a shock that the whole of the head column was carried back up the hill about ten steps. The first volley was immediately followed by another, which went right into our company, mortally wounding W. A. Coffman at my side, and severely wounding in the hip Hugh Butler, cutting the jacket pocket of Wm. H. Taggart, knocking hats off, and splitting the gun-stocks of several others. Major Tanner's horse just then came through our ranks, knocking several down, among others myself, near where W. A. Coffman fell. When I next recovered, a party of our boys had commenced firing from the hill-side above us, and the pickets from the Twenty-sixth Indiana, previously thrown out above our boats without our knowledge, were returning the fire. We were thus between two fires. Some eight or ten of us thus situated struggled up the hill-side to get from between the two fires, when they ceased measurably, some one commanding to "cease fire." When I was knocked down, Wm. H. Taggart rallied some ten or fifteen of our men on the hill-side, and kept up a fire till ordered to cease firing. Lieut. Adams, as was his place, was immediately in the rear of this squad. A number of our boys went it on their own hook, firing all their rounds. I am satisfied our boys will stand fire.

A PATRIOTIC landlady, in her desire to emulate the generosity of city governments and other corporations in continuing the wages of absent soldiers, has given notice that if any of her boarders wish to enlist, she will allow their board to run right on all the time they are gone the same as if they remained. Can the spirit of generous devotion to the interests of the country go any further than this?

"SKADADDLE."—A Washington correspondent informs us that the German soldiers have christened the rebel earthworks back of Munson's Hill "Fort Skadaddle."

For the benefit of future etymologists, who may have a dictionary to make when the English language shall have adopted "skadaddle" into familiar use by the side of "employee" and "telegram," we here define the new term.

It is at least an error of judgment, if not an intentional unkindness, to foist "skadaddle" on our Teutonic soldiers. The word is used throughout the whole army of the Potomac, and means "to cut stick," "vamose the ranche," "slope," "cut your lucky," or "clear out." So that Fort Skadaddle is equivalent to "Fort Runaway."—N. Y. Evening Post, Oct. 17.

A SOLDIER writing from the Potomac about his "feed," says: "We get a substance for soup called 'pressed vegetables.' It looks a good deal like a big plug of 'dog leg' tobacco in shape and solidity, and is composed in part of potatoes, onions, beans, lettuce, garlic, parsley, parsnips, carrots, etc. I acknowledge eating two China tin plates full without any convulsions of nature, and can now speak the German language with fluency."

Oct. 10.—A correspondent of the New York Times says: I was to-day informed by a gentleman who was well acquainted with the fact, that in June last Mrs. Jefferson Davis wrote a letter to a colored woman in Washington, in which she stated that before the end of July the rebel Government would be inaugurated in that city, and she be installed as mistress of the White House. The object of the letter was to assure the colored woman that she would be safe to remain in Washington, and to secure her services when Mrs. Davis was called to dispense the hospitalities of the Executive Mansion.

HUNDREDS of those exceedingly sensitive Kentuckians who so eloquently proclaimed that they could never take up arms against the Southern States, inasmuch as those States were Kentucky's sisters, have now taken up arms for the conquest of Kentucky herself. Isn't that enough to make the Devil laugh?—Louisville Journal, Oct. 12.

THE SONG OF FREEDOM.

AIR—"Near the lake where drooped the willow.

On our hill-tops, fortress crested,
Long time ago,
Freedom's battles were contested
With a stern foe.

There the flag of Freedom flying
Like Heaven's bow,

Nerved the living, cheered the dying,
Long time ago.

Sons of freemen, do the fires
In your hearts glow,
That sustained your gallant sires
Long time ago?

Then arouse, a band of brothers!
To the world show
Slavery's chains may rest on others,
On you, never! no!

A SQUAD of Indiana volunteers, out scouting, came across a female in a log cabin in the mountains. After the usual salutations, one of them asked her, "Well, old lady, are you a secesh?" "No," was the answer. "Are you Union?" "No." "What are you, then?" "A Baptist, an' always have been." The Hoosiers let down.

A PATRIOTIC gentleman has written to Gen. Scott to offer the services of a new and formidable engine of war. His belief is that if the General wishes to scatter the rebel forces at Manassas without further delay, he need only furnish the writer's wife a passport to enable her to get within the enemy's lines, and she will blow the rebel crew to Tophet in twenty-four hours. He considers her tongue equivalent to a ton of gunpowder any day.

Dr. CLARKSON T. COLLINS, a wealthy and celebrated physician of Great Barrington, Mass., declares his readiness and desire, in defence of the Federal Government, to be one of a thousand men, or one of three hundred, to arm and equip themselves, each taking two horses and a servant—to enter the field, to give their lives, if need be, or to continue in service till the close of the war, be it for one year or ten, and all at their own expense, not to cost the Government a cent. That kind of patriotism has a true ring.

GARIBALDI.—The following letter from Garibaldi has been received by the United States Consul at Antwerp:

"CAPREPA, Sept. 10, 1861.

"MY DEAR SIR: I saw Mr. Sanford, and regret to be obliged to announce to you that I shall not be able to go to the United States at present. I do not doubt of the triumph of the cause of the Union, and that shortly. But if the war should unfortunately continue in your beautiful country, I shall overcome all obstacles which detain me, and hasten to the defence of a people who are dear to me.

"G. GARIBALDI.

"To Mr. QUIGGLE, U. S. Consul at Antwerp."

HOME GUARDS REPUDIATED BY LADIES.—The following resolutions were passed at a meeting of the young ladies in Logansport, Ind., on the 30th of Sept.:

Resolved, That we deem it to be the duty of every young unmarried man to enlist and fight for the honor of his country, his flag, and his own reputation.

That the young men, in this time of our country's peril, have but one good excuse for not being a soldier, and that is cowardice.

That the young man who now fails to respond to the call of his country is not worthy the kind regrets or the smiles of the young ladies of our native State, and that none but ladies of doubtful age will smile on such men.

That we will have nothing to do with young men who refuse to go to the war, and that "Home Guards" must keep their distance.

That the young man who has not pluck enough to fight for his country has not the manliness to make a good husband.

That we will not marry a man who has not been a soldier.

That we will not marry till after the war is over, and then "Home Guards!" No! never!

MARRIED.—On Tuesday morning, the 24th of September, at St. Paul's Church, in Lynchburg, Va., by the Rev. W. H. Herckle, General E. Kirby Smith, of the Confederate States army, to Cassie, daughter of Samuel M. Selden, deceased.

General Smith, the gallant Kirby, has surrendered. The brave Blucher of Manassas, who marched boldly and unshrinkingly to the cannon's mouth, has at last thrown down his arms at the sting of an arrow. He was married in our city this morning to Miss Cassie Selden, daughter of Samuel Selden, deceased; and who that knows the sweet young bride can wonder at her conquest? Modest, retiring, gentle—in a word, womanly in the truest sense of the term—I know no one better qualified to win and wear the heart of a brave, good man. Long live the wedded pair, and may ruthless time ever preserve, in primeval freshness, both the orange wreath and the laurel!—Lynchburg Republican.

SOUTHERN MAIL COMMUNICATION WITH EUROPE.—We learn from L'Abeille, of New Orleans, that M. Antonia Costa, of that city, has undertaken the establishment of regular monthly mail communication between that city and Europe, for which he has the approbation of the postmaster of New Orleans. The mails go by way of Mexico, and are transported in the regular English steamers, which carry the mails of Mexico and the West Indies. The first post left New Orleans on Thursday week, and contained one thousand three hundred and eighty-three letters; the next leaves on the 10th of November. As soon as the necessary arrangements can be completed, it will leave every two weeks—on the 10th and 25th of each month. Letters of half an ounce and under will be charged as follows: To Mexico, fifty cents; to Cuba, seventy-five cents; to Europe, one dollar. Letters for this mail must be enclosed, with the amount of postage, in an envelope, directed "Costa's foreign mail, care of Postmaster, New Orleans," and the postage paid to New Orleans.—Memphis Appeal, Oct. 19.

The first of the new Confederate States postal stamps were issued on the 18th of October, and were eagerly bought up. The new stamp is green, with a lithographic likeness of President Davis within double oval border, surmounted with the inscription "Confederate States of America." Outside of the circle, and at the head of the stamp, is the word "postage," and at the lower edge its denomination, "five cents."—Richmond Examiner, Oct. 19.

PRAYER FOR A DYING ENEMY.—A correspondent of the New Orleans Crescent says: A most touching scene took place in the affair of Major Hood's, already alluded to. Among those mortally wounded was a Northern man; he was shot through both hips, and had fallen on the road, where he was discovered by a Louisianian. He was suffering the most intense pain, his face and body distorted by his agonized sufferings. He begged for water, which was promptly given him. His head and shoulders were raised to make him comfortable, and his face and forehead bathed in water. He urged the Louisianian to pray for him, who was forced to acknowledge his inability to pray. At that moment one of the Mecklenburg troopers came up, and the poor fellow urged his request again, with great earnestness. The Virginian knelt at his side, and asked the wounded man if he was a Christian, and believed in the promise of Christ to save repentant sinners. He answered, yea. The trooper then commenced a prayer, fervent, pathetic, and eloquent. The soldier's face lost all the traces of his recent suffering, and became placid and benignant, and, in his new-born love for his enemy, attempted to encircle his neck with his arms, but only reached the shoulder, where it rested, and, with his gaze riveted on the face of the prayerful trooper, he appeared to drink in the words of hope and consolation, the promises of Christ's mercy and salvation, which flowed from his lips, "as the parched earth drinketh up the rain;" and, as the solemn Amen died on the lips of the Christian soldier, the dead man's hand relaxed its hold and fell to the ground, and his spirit took its flight to unknown realms. The scene was solemn and impressive, and the group were all in tears. The dying never weep, 'tis said. Having no implements with which to dig his grave, and expecting the return of the enemy in large force, they left him—not, however, without arranging his dress, straightening his limbs, and crossing his hands on his chest, leaving evidences to the dead man's companions that his last moments had been ministered to by humane and Christian men.

We regret that the Louisianian could not pray.—Richmond Dispatch.

THE HOLLINS TURTLE.—The following is a description of the Turtle with which Greytown Hollins attempted to destroy the Federal fleet:

The Turtle is a vessel of great power of engine. She has a bow nine feet long, of oak planks, secured all around by timbers six feet in thickness, also covered in the same manner, and made perfectly tight and solid, beside being shielded with iron plates two inches in thickness. The hull rises only two and a quarter feet above the water level. She is destined to run into the Brooklyn, which lies down on the Balize, and to sink her. She is provided with a steam-borer or auger, about the size of a man's arm above the elbow, intended to make a hole in the vessel. Twenty-five hose are kept to throw boiling water over the Brooklyn to keep her hands from defending her. Already several trials have been made with her, which, the rebels say, have given complete satisfaction. Cannon balls have rebounded when fired upon her, producing no injurious effect, and, in fact, it is very difficult to hit her, so small a portion of her being above water.—N. Y. Tribune, Oct. 26.

"THE WOOD-CHOPPERS."—The Sixth Maine regiment has earned the sobriquet of the "Wood-choppers," by felling acres and acres of woodland across the Potomac, to deprive the rebels of skulking places for sharpshooters. They cut the trees about three feet from the ground, felling them all one way, thus forming abatis through which neither horse nor man can pass.

Military roads have also been cut from the bridges and ferry, which rival the famous pathways of the Roman legions, traces of which are still to be seen in the countries which they conquered. One of these roads, leading from Fort Ethan Allen, at the Chain Bridge, to Falls Church, will long remain a monument to the industry of the Vermonters who constructed it.—Washington Star, Oct. 19.

HUMORS OF THE CAMPAIGN.—A rollicking army correspondent of a New York paper perpetrates the following :

La Mountain has been up in his balloon, and went so high that he could see all the way to the Gulf of Mexico, and observe what they had for dinner at Fort Pickens. He made discoveries of an important character, my boy, and says that the rebels have concentrated several troops at Manassas. A reporter of the Tribune asked him if he could see any negro insurrections, and he said that he did see some black spots moving around near South Carolina, but found out afterward that they were some ants which had got into his telescope.

The Prince de Joinville's two sons, my boy, are admirable additions to Gen. McClellan's staff, and speak English so well that I can almost understand what they say. Two Arabs are expected here to-morrow to take command of Irish brigades, and Gen. Blenker will probably have two Aztecs to assist him in his German division.—Cincinnati Gazette, Oct. 22.

AN AMAZONIAN LEADER.—One of the features of the First Tennessee regiment is in the person of a brave and accomplished young lady of but eighteen summers, and of prepossessing appearance, named Sarah Taylor, of East Tennessee, who is the step-daughter of Captain Dowden, of the First Tennessee regiment.

Miss Taylor is an exile from her home, having joined the fortunes of her step-father and her wandering companions, accompanying them in their perilous and dreary flight from their homes and estates. Miss Taylor has formed a determination to share with her late companions the dangers and fatigues of a military campaign. She has donned a neat blue chapeau, beneath which her long hair is fantastically arranged, bearing at her side a highly-finished regulation sword, and silver-mounted pistols in her belt, all of which gives her a very neat and martial appearance. She is quite the idol of the Tennessee boys. They look upon her as a second Joan of Arc, believing that victory and glory will perch upon the standards borne in the ranks favored by her presence. Miss Captain T. is all courage and skill. Having become an adept in the sword exercise, and a sure shot with the pistol, she is determined to lead in the van of the march, bearing her exiled and oppressed countrymen back to their homes, or, if failing, to offer up her own life's blood in the sacrifice.—Baltimore American, Oct. 23.

THE WHOLE STORY TOLD IN RHYME.

BY W. J. S.

John Bull he met our Jonathan,
"Ah! Jonathan," said he, sir,
"Pray tell me, now, what's all this row
I hear across the sea, sir?"

You're kicking up a pretty fuss,
Pray tell me what it's for, sir;
Let me advise: just compromise—
A horrid thing is war, sir.

"I shall want cotton, Jonathan,
Likewise Virginia's weed, sir;
And, really now, I can't allow
This quarrel to proceed, sir."
"Du tell," said Brother Jonathan,
"Now, don't you get excited;
At hum I rule—so just keep cool
You'll see this thing all righted.

"My Southern boys for years have held
The Presidential reins, sir—
Until to-day they've held a sway
They never can regain, sir.
And when they cannot rule, they kick
And hate with all their might, sir,
For love of Union's second to
Their fondness for State rights, sir.

"They say we mean to free their slaves
And take them from their hands, sir,
And rob them of their property,
Their daughters, and their lands, sir.
We've told them that we meant not sich,
But this they have not heeded;
So, feeling sore, they've took to war
And wilfully seceded.

"We only ask them to obey
The same laws that we do, sir,
Their fathers helped our own to make—
They were good men, and true, sir;
We ask no more, we'll take no less,
Though every tarnal drop, sir,
Of Northern blood the land shall flood
Till then it cannot stop, sir.

"I want but justice, bully John,
Respect, and all my dues, sir,
And when I have them, Johnny Bull,
You shall have cotton too, sir.
But not till then, that's sartin, sure,
So take the matter easy;
And when the war is over, John,
I'll do my best to please ye."

GEN. ROUSSEAU CROSSING ROLLING FORK.

BY MISS SOPHIA H. OLIVER.

"We cross this ford," he exclaimed, "never to retreat again to this side. We are to march forward. There is to be no backward movement. It is victory or death."
The command was about to be given and repeated through the lines, when Gen. Rousseau, in the van, rising in the saddle, exclaimed: "Men, follow me! I expect none of you to do what I am not willing to do myself," and, springing from his horse, he stepped briskly into the stream, and crossed the breast-high ford on foot. His men, cheering wildly, followed their General, crying they would "follow wherever he dared to lead."—Correspondence Louisville Journal.

Upon a river's verdant banks
Our troops advanced at dawn of day;
Their pathway to the invading ranks
Across the bridgeless river lay.
But ere their watery track they take,
Lo! thus their gallant leader spake:

" Brave soldiers : once that river passed,
Onward must be our battle cry,
Our all is on the venture cast,
To march to death or victory.
No backward glance, no base retreat,
When we our country's foemen meet ! "

Then crying, " Follow where I lead,
I ask you naught I may not do ; "
Brave Rousseau, springing from his steed,
Marched proudly through the waters blue ;
Her clasping arms the river pressed
Around the hero's fearless breast.

The morning sunbeams slightly glanced
Along the shining path he sped,
And swift the gallant hosts advanced,
All following where their chieftain led :
While streamed aloft their banner brave,
Borne proud above the dashing wave.

High over head the glittering arms
Each warrior held with martial pride ;
While loud as battle's wild alarms
Rung shout on shout along the tide ;
Each hill flung back the rallying cry
" On, on to death or victory. "

Oh ! lofty words not idly said,
For fierce the fight and red the field,
And fallen many a noble head
E'er Rousseau and his heroes yield.
Then, soldiers, in the gallant fight
May God defend and save the right.

Oh country ! for whose sacred cause
Such patriot spirits are to bleed ;
Oh country ! for whose blessed laws
All that is pure and holy plead—
Before thee well may traitors quail,
Thy cause is just, and must prevail !

IN MEMORIAM.

OCTOBER 21st, 1861.

The oaks whirl down their crimson leaves,
And make the pathways red as blood ;
But redder far, with ghastlier stains,
Potomac's banks and rushing flood.

We mourn for those, the early dead,
Who sleep in glory's crimson grave ;
Still may their names a watchword be
To the sad land they died to save.

Now, on the far Pacific's shore,
New joined to us in heart and hand,
Sad breezes sigh, and mournfully
The rivers roll their golden sands.

A darker burden bears that stream
Whose waters, rolling to the sea,
Carry the tribute sealed in blood,
Our offering paid to liberty.

In grief, in pain, and toil, and tears,
We sow the holy seed of truth,
That, springing from the blood-drenched earth,
Shall blossom in perennial youth.

Then rest in peace, O noble hearts,
Who to your country's altars gave
Your youth, your swords, your lives, your all
And died your country's life to save !

—Boston Evening Transcript, Oct. 31.

NEVER ! NEVER ! NEVER !

" I may be asked, as I have been asked, when I am for the dissolution of the Union ? I answer, never—never—NEVER. "—HENRY CLAY.

You ask me when I'd rend the scroll
Our father's names are written o'er,
When I would see our flag unroll
Its mingled stars and stripes no more—
When, with a worse than felon's hand
Or felon's counsels, I would sever
The Union of this glorious land ?
I answer : never ! never ! never !

When ye can find the lawless might
Where carnage treads its crimson way,
Where burning cities gild the night,
And cannon smoke obscures the day ;
In towns deserted, fields of ground
Abandoned by the faithful plough,
Security, hope, peace profound,
The blessings Heaven vouchsafes you now.

Think ye that I could brook to see
The emblem I have loved so long,
Borne peaceful o'er the distant sea,
Torn, trampled by a frenzied throng ?
Divided, measured, parcelled out,
Tame surrendered up forever,
To gratify a lawless rout
Of traitors ? Never ! never ! never !

On yonder lone and lovely steep,
The sculptor's art, the builder's power,
The landmark o'er the soldier's sleep,
Have reared a lofty funeral tower.
There it shall stand until the river
That rolls beneath shall cease to flow,
Aye, till the hill itself shall quiver
With nature's last convulsive throes.

Upon that column's marble base,
Its shafts, that soar into the sky,
There still is room enough to trace
The list of millions yet to die.
And I would cover all its height
And breadth before the hour of shame,
Till space should even fail to write
Even the initials of a name.

Nay, I would haste to swell the ranks,
Direct the fire, or lead the way,
While battle swept the rifted ranks
And bore the serried lines away ;
Fall, bleeding, in the doubtful strife
Beneath the motto of my sires,
And draw the latest breath of life
Before that Union flag expires.

Dissolve the Union ! nay, remove
The last asylum that is known,
Where patriots find a brother's love,
And truth may shelter from a throne !

Give up the hopes of high renown,
The legacy our fathers willed,
Tear our victorious eagles down
Before their mission is fulfilled.
—Fitzgerald's Phil. City Item, Nov. 9.

ON GUARD.

At midnight, on my lonely beat,
When shadows wrap the wood and lea,
A vision seems my view to greet
Of one at home that prays for me.

No roses bloom upon her cheek—
Her form is not a lover's dream
But on her face so fair and meek
A host of holier beauties gleam.

For softly shines her silver hair,
A patient smile is on her face;
And the mild, lustrous light of prayer
Around her sheds a moon-like grace.

She prays for one that's far away—
The soldier in his holy fight—
And begs that Heaven, in mercy, may Protect her boy and bless the Right.

Till, though the leagues lie far between,
This silent incense of her heart
Steals o'er my soul with breath serene,
And we no longer are apart.

So, guarding thus my lonely beat,
By shadowy wood and haunted lea,
That vision seems my view to greet
Of her, at home, who prays for me.

BEAUTIFUL LINES.

A member of the First New Jersey regiment, at Alexandria, Va., was buried near the hospital, having died the night previous. A correspondent of the Newark Daily says: "Who he was I could not learn, but the scene was a sorrowfully impressive one—the dying boy, in his delirium, frequently lisping, in the agonies of his dissolution, the name of the loved ones at home."

The candle dimly burned, the room was small,
The shadows flickered on the floor and wall,
The raging wind outside went roaring past,
While leafless trees bent, groaning, to the blast!
Upon a bed of anguish and of pain,
For four long weeks that noble boy had lain
Without a friend, save his own comrades, near,
Thus murmured he—the dying volunteer:

"God bless you, comrades! lay me down to sleep;
No mother dear or sisters here to weep.
I'm dying, slowly, comrades; by my side
Oh! lay my trusty musket—once my pride.
My hands are feeble, too, I am not strong;
I shall not trouble you now, comrades, long;
So hear my childish talk, my nervous fear,
I'm dying, comrades," said the volunteer.

We cooled his tongue, and bathed his feverish face,
Yet in his eye the gloss of death could trace;

We smoothed the bed, and softly laid him there,
We turned back from his brow his curly chestnut hair;
And while the wind outside went raging past,
While leafless trees bent, groaning, to the blast,
We laid his trusty musket by his side—
He grasped it, held it to his heart—AND DIED!

THE IOWA TWELFTH.

BY HETTIE M. ELLIS.

Thou God of Right! do Thou protect
The brave and noble band,
Who break the dearest ties of life
To save our noble land.

They bid adieu to home and friends,
Their country's call obey;
Their labors leave, their joys forego,
And haste without delay.

Our country's wrongs, and treason's dye,
Each bosom brave shall thrill—
Shall nerve each arm, and fire each eye,
Each heart with courage fill.

Our country's flag, that o'er them waves
They'll gallantly defend;
And Freedom's cause, with patriot zeal,
Shall triumph in the end.

The "Stars and Stripes" our fathers loved Shall lead them safely on,
Till shouts of victory make known
The battle nobly won.

The Iowa Twelfth! fear not for them.
Ah no! their country's fame
They shall not dim; when they return
They'll bear an honored name.

Yet some may fall; but doubly dear
The life which thus is given
For Freedom—noblest cause on earth
And in the sight of Heaven.

The Eagle bold, with pinions spread,
The cannon's heavy roar,
The joyous shouts of "Union boys,"
Will greet them then no more.

Fight, brave ones of the gallant Twelfth!
Till conquerors you become,
And laurel wreaths shall deck your brows—
Then welcome, welcome home.

Dubuque, Nov. 20, 1861.

A FABLE FOR SOME PROFESSING UNIONISTS.

A maiden lady kept for sport
A tabby of the rarest sort;
She loved to see his arch'd back,
A tail triumphant, tipped with black,
When his stomachic flattering purr
Proved his allegiance true to her—
Which, courtier like, he would express
By softly rubbing 'gainst her dress.

To present cat-hood from a kitten,
 Oft had he dozed and watched her knitting;
 And Jemima's faith, how'er ill-founded,
 In him, her favorite, was unbounded.
 She loved but one thing more than tabby—
 Not having husband or a baby—
 It hung in palace light and airy,
 Her own, her darling, sweet canary.
 But once came home from tea, Jemima
 Horror on horrors piled! to see
 The seed, which once so sprightly tinkled,
 Upon the carpet all besprinkled;
 And water, too, the floor bespattered
 From out the bird-cage, smashed and battered—
 'Mid broken flower-pot and geranium,
 There lay, in death, with fractured cranium,
 All specked with red his breast of yellow,
 Silent and stark, the little fellow!
 Fancy the maiden's dumb surprise,
 What notes and queries in her eyes!
 With tears of anguish and vexation,
 She looked to Tom for explanation.

Now Tom, a lawyer of his kind,
 A ready answer soon could find;
 A moment more, his thoughts to rally by,
 He'd clear himself on proof of alibi;
 But, taken rather by surprise,
 He opened wide his opal eyes;
 Th' exordium framed to turn attention,
 Of former mousings he made mention,
 A modest statement of his merit,
 Slightly disparaged dog and ferret.
 The case went on with that acumen
 Oft seen in practice purely human;
 For he described the lost one singing,
 There by the window gently swinging—
 None could replace his dear, dead brother,
 E'en should his mistress buy another!
 Tom spake of music, and its power
 To soothe the saddest, heaviest hour—
 A perfume for the soul to drink of—
 And every fine thing he could think of.
 Whether 'twas change from the pathetic,
 Or tickling, acting like emetic,
 Our cat, declaiming like Lord Chatham,
 Was choked with feathers and out spat 'em.
 About to resume—" 'Tis quite enough, sir,
 Your protestation is all stuff, sir;
 Nor can I think that cat is truthful WHOSE WORDS COME FORTH WITH SUCH A MOUTHFUL."

"BULLY," "CRAPEAU," AND THE "BEAR."

BY NAYNHA.

Mr. Bull, with a face like a brick,
 One evening, just after his dinner,
 Says, now my poor cousin is sick,
 "Hi'll mau' 'im has Hi ham a sinner.
 His vessels 'ave plenty to do,
 His soldiers 'ave more, and can't do it;
 I'll pop in a thousand or two,
 By Jingo! hi'll soon put 'im through it."
 Singing: Give it him, Bull, tra la,
 Take care of your chances and work 'em,
 If your "dear friends" are ailing, tra la,
 Don't lose any time till you burk 'em.

But Patrick was sitting close by,
 His face it flushed up like a daisy—
 "Arrah! what did the ould rascal say?
 Be jabbers, 'Old Bully' is crazy.
 Shure, here is myself dhat wud crack
 His ugly ould pate in a minute;"
 And he made a grimace at his back
 Saying, "I hope that ye'll put yer fut in it."
 Singing: Give it him, Bull, tra la,
 Take care of your chances and work 'em,
 If your "dear friends" are ailing, tra la,
 Don't lose any time till yees burk 'em.

But John never minded bould Pat,
 (He was too busy counting his money,)
 Says he, I won't lend him a rap!
 He don't need un, cries Patrick, my honey;
 He's got plenty of money at home,
 'Mongst the Jarmans and ould residentsers.
 We'll sind, if we need it, to Rome,
 Or the Presbytayrian Dissenters.
 Your grandson is ailing, but la!
 You're not the ould fellow to burk him,
 Stay at home, you're fast failin', 'ould da,
 You've not the material to work 'em.

But here, John, is Mr. Crapeau,
 Look how he comes, smirking and bowing in,
 "Gude mornin', sarz, how du day do?"
 "Purty well, ye ould chap, are yees 'going in?'
 Ye're two purty villyans well met;
 But Jonathan will not be caught by yees;
 I'll lay a respectable bet
 Uncle Sam don't require to be taught by yees.
 Singing: Trust him not, Bull, tra la,
 The Divil's benathe that swate face of his;
 He's making yees dance, tra la,
 While he whistles his exquisite symphonies.

Arrah! look at ould John wid his arm
 Roun' the neck of that frog-ayting popinjay,
 Begorra, he'll bring him to harm
 If he trusts his Impayryal Majesty;
 Arrah! John, but ye're innocent, man!
 Don't ye see what the little thafe's dhruvin' at?
 Why, ye tun-bellied, fat omadhaun,
 Ye don't drame, now, of what he's connivin' at.
 Singing: Look out for your purse-strings, John,
 For Louis is up to a thing or two,
 He'll clip your aspiring wings, John,
 Some morning, before yees know what to do.

But, suddenly, came a fierce growl
 And a rustle beneath the old table
 Where Louis and John, cheek by jowl,
 Sat plotting fast as they were able,
 'Twas the bear from the North had broke loose,
 Having heard of their wicked designings,
 Says he, Boys, don't crow now so crouse,
 I'll spoil all your secret combinings.
 Oh! Ill have a hand in the pie,
 For Jonathan is an old friend of mine
 You are flying a little too high,
 On his bones you never need hope to dine.

With a "sacre," "mon Dieu," and a fling,
 The Frenchman leaped back with affright,
 While John's face, like a "shoat" in spring,
 From crimson became a bad white.
 "Pardonnez moi," Crapeau did cry;
 "Oh, the devil!" cries John in a huff;

While the Russian looked on mighty sly,
 "Hooch!" says Pat, "my boys, you'll get enough."
 Singing: It's better be honest and true,
 And spake out, like men, what you mane;
 "Ould dad," you are not "the true blue,"
 A fig for France, England, and Spain.

THE CAPTAIN OF THE GUN.*

BY CHARLES D. GARDETTE.

He never trod the quarter-deck
 In pride of high command;
 No gold on his broad shoulders gleamed,
 No rapier graced his hand;
 But a braver captain of a gun
 Did ne'er by truncheon stand!

He had, perchance, but little grace
 Of learning, or of mien;
 His conscience and his gun, he thought
 His duty lay between.
 And with his utmost skill he strove
 Alike to keep them clean.

He fought as fight Columbia's tars,
 Her ensign overhead;
 Her clear eye o'er his smoking gun
 A cheery radiance shed.
 A shell crashed through the port; oh God!
 His limb hung by a shred.

I tell you, had the Jarls of old
 Beheld the hero then,
 Their beards had gleamed with tears of pride—
 Those iron-hearted men!
 And all Valhalla's warrior halls
 Had rung with shouts again.

He crawled the bulwark near; his eye
 With coming death was dim;
 He drew his clasp-knife forth, as death
 No terrors had for him,
 And strove, with firm, though feeble hand,
 To sever his torn limb!

He strove in vain! They bore him thence Still yearning to abide
 The combat's issue, at his post.
 "Messmates," he feebly cried,
 "We'll beat them! aye, we'll surely beat,
 I trust," and so he died.

BALL'S BLUFF.

Big Bethel, Bull Run, and Ball's Bluff—
 Oh, alliteration of blunders!
 Of blunders more than enough,
 In a time full of blunders and wonders.

History, shut up your book,
 Or blot from your record the story,
 Nor honor such scenes with a look,
 Where the shame so eclipses the glory

No one to blame! Oh, no!
 No one to blame for the slaughter;

* Thomas Wilson, captain of a gun on board the steam frigate Wabash, killed in the action at Port Royal.

None but the truculent foe
 And the merciless rush of the water.

Where could be found braver men?
 Braver men ne'er were in battle;
 Who drove them into the pen,
 There to be slaughtered like cattle?

Two thousand men against six,
 Led as the blind lead the blind;
 Two thousand men hemmed in by six,
 And the rushing river behind.

The rushing river behind,
 And the furious foe before—
 Who could have ever divined
 That these were the perils of war?

Six thousand rifles ahead,
 And behind them a river like Styx,
 Gulphing the wounded and dead—
 God pity the two against six.

A river as fatal as Styx,
 With a heart dying out on each wave,
 Till the blood, where the streams intermix,
 Is swollen with the blood of the brave.

The stain of the sorrow and shame
 Is mixed with the stain of the slaughter,
 And the dead hearts write vainly a name
 On the face of the innocent water.

For no one's to blame, and yet,
 Who issued the murderous order?
 We men may forgive and forget,
 But not the Eternal Recorder.

ARMY POETRY.

The war, if it results in wounds and death, also produces much exquisite poetry. The solitude of the camps, the thought of absence from friends and home, the expectation of battle, and all the natural risks incident to the life of a soldier, are well calculated to inspire serious and sentimental reflection. The apprehension of parents and friends that military experience leads to dissipation and recklessness, is not, generally, well founded. Many who, at home, are not in the habit of thinking of religion, or of their own future state, meditate profoundly upon these things amid the loneliness of camp life. The following beautiful lines were written by a private in Company G of Stuart's Engineer regiment, at Camp Lesley, near Washington. In explanation of one of the verses of the poem, it is right to state that white rags are frequently scattered along the sentinel's path, of a dark night, to mark his beat.—Philadelphia Press.

THE COUNTERSIGN.

Alas! the weary hours pass slow,
 The night is very dark and still,
 And in the marshes far below,
 I hear the bearded whip-poor-will;
 I scarce can see a yard ahead,
 My ears are strained to catch each sound—
 I hear the leaves about me shed,
 And the springs bubbling through the ground.

Along the beaten path I pace,
 Where white rags mark my sentry's track,
 In formless shrubs I seem to trace
 The foeman's form, with bending back;
 I think I see him crouching low—
 I stop and list—I stoop and peer,
 Until the neighboring hillocks grow
 To groups of soldiers far and near.

With ready piece, I wait and watch,
Until my eyes, familiar grown,
Detect each harmless, earthen notch,
And turn guerillas into stone ;
And then, amid the lonely gloom,
Beneath the tall old chestnut trees,
My silent marches I resume,
And think of other times than these.

"Halt ! Who goes there ?" my challenge cry,
It rings along the watchful line ;
"Relief !" I hear a voice reply—
"Advance, and give the countersign !"
With bayonet at the charge I wait—
The corporal gives the mystic word ;
With arms apart I charge my mate,
Then onward pass, and all is well.

But in the tent, that night, awake,
I asked, if in the fray I fall,
Can I the mystic answer make
When the angelic sentries call ?
And pray that Heaven may so ordain,
Where'er I go, what fate be mine,
Whether in pleasure or in pain,
I still may have the Countersign.

THE GOLDEN WEDGE OF ACHAN.

(JOSHUA VII.)

When Joshua, warrior of the Lord,
O'er Canaan held his powerful sway,
Lo ! once the mighty victor's sword
Arrested in its conquering way.

Humbled, in ruinous defeat,
The men of Israel fled apace ;
Chased by the foe, in full retreat,
They own the visible disgrace.

And Joshua rent his clothes, and said
Alas ! O Lord, and must it be
To perish thus without thine aid,
And fall by thy great enemy ?

The Lord replied : 'Tis sin, 'tis sin !
There is, O Israel, in thy midst,
A secret and accursed thing
That on thee all thy troubles bring'st.

They searched around, confessed, and owned,
And lo ! from Achan's guilty tent,
'Mong other spoils, a wedge of gold,
Of vast and ominous portent !

The curse of God was on the gold—
'Twas stolen, coveted, retained,
Against command to touch or hold,
Lest Israel's camp should be profaned.

Thus saith the Lord : Ye cannot stand
Before your enemies in fight,
Until, by my divine command,
This thing is out of mind and sight.

'Twas done, and lo ! what honors came
To Joshua's triumphant arms !
New victories clustered to his fame,
And whelmed the foe with new alarms.
VOL. III.—POETRY 8

Threescore and one of hostile kings,
Cities and armies strong and great,
In quick succession now he brings
To death—to all-devouring fate.

Triumphant Justice, pure and grand,
Ho, all ye nations of the earth,
And thou, America, blest land,
Struggling to Freedom's second birth—

Learn of the God of Israel's might,
Success in war does not depend
On numbers rushing to the fight,
Though just the cause we may defend.

Make it all just. Shun to pollute
The sacred fire of the soul,
Or Freedom's holy name imbrute
With slavery's tyrannous control.

Throw out that cursed wedge of gold !
Remnant of old barbaric spoil,
Nor seek one hour a slave to hold
On Freedom's consecrated soil.

Strike at the foe's bloody heart !
In thought, at least, deal every blow,
With deadly, stern, heroic art,
At slavery's self—the only foe.

Warm up thy courage at the fire
Of crushed humanity's sad course,
Nor let one lurking, foul desire
Of avarice taint these holy wars.

Then shall the armies of the skies—
Ten thousand thousand legions strong,
Of angels bright, with glad surprise,
Draw near to join thy conquering throng.

Then shall thy sword no more be stayed,
Thine armies then retreat no more ;
Lo ! Israel's God shall be thine aid,
And give thee victory, as of yore.

SONGS OF THE REBELS.

"THE BANNER OF THE SOUTH." *

BY W. O. S. J., ESQ.

Written during the "Bull Run" excitement.

I.

Gather round it, gather round it,
Fear no North, no East, nor West,
'Twill protect the rights of Freemen,
And will wave for all oppress'd.

* This song was sent to the Editor of the Rebellion Record, with the following authority :

You will please find enclosed a "Rebel Song," written in July last, soon after the Union defeat at Manassas. It was taken from an old vest pocket after the rebels evacuated Fairfax C. H., by a friend of mine in the glorious army of the Potomac, which he found in a log hut near by.

Then, oh! gather round your banner,
 "White and crimson" is for you,
 And remember they're the colors
 Of the bravest and the true.

II.

Let the hordes of Lincoln rally,
 Let them blow their loudest blast;
 Let them "muster in" by thousands
 'Til they've called the very last;
 And we'll wave aloft our banner,
 With defiance from each mouth,
 For it is the Freeman's Standard—
 "White and Crimson" of the South.

III.

"They have only twenty thousand,
 This rebellion they'll regret,
 They will never stand a battle,"
 Vide the "Abolition pet;" *
 They forget our "Ben McCullough,"
 Generals "Beauregard" and "Lee,"
 Who a la Washington are fighting
 For their rights and liberty.

IV.

Hark! we hear their myriads coming,
 See them with their banners flying,
 "Come, boys, onward now to Richmond!"
 Hear the vandal wretches crying;
 List! the martial note is sounded,
 With "for Dixie," from each mouth;
 They but little know thy power,
 "White and Crimson" of the South.

V.

Go defend your budding Liberty
 From the vandal thirsty North,
 Be adamant in heart as firm,
 While you call your armies forth,
 "Strike home" for wives and children,
 God will smile upon the right,
 And a victory will crown you
 'Neath the "Crimson and the White."

VI.

You've excelled them now in battle,
 Ere the carnage has begun;
 They've been scattered in confusion—
 Mark the "stampede of the Run;"
 With a loss of many thousands,
 (All hail to Southern might,)
 By a victory of honor
 'Neath the "Crimson and the White."

VII.

See, yonder hosts of Lyon,
 In the good old western State;
 Mark well McCullough's onset,
 And the tyrant general's fate!

He sent it me with the injunction to keep it in remembrance of him, should he never return. I have the MSS.—
 Your friend, HENRY J. HOWARD.
 BALTIMORE, Md., March, 1862.

* The New York Tribune has for years been known as "the abolition pet"—throughout the South, and a greater part of the border States.

Then say not the "God of battles"
 Disregards the Freeman's right,
 For He, in mercy, smiles on all
 'Neath the "Crimson and the White."

VIII.

Then, arise! arise, ye Southrons,
 Let your cry be for the brave,
 And, oh! if perchance in battle
 You should meet a "soldier's grave,"
 Be content to die for freedom,
 'Gainst the thralldom of the foe:
 With your "White and Crimson" banner
 Floating high above you—go!

IX.

And you'll shout at last triumphant
 O'er the Abolition band,
 Who, alas! usurps the power
 O'er the laws of Maryland;
 And when at last her sons are free,
 How gallantly they'll fight
 For their firesides and laws of State,
 'Neath the "Crimson and the White."

X.

Missouri, too, will "fall in line,"
 Kentucky—Tennessee—
 And e'en will little Delaware,
 Determined to be free!
 Then will the retribution come—
 "Revenge!" in every mouth,
 And tyrants fall with shame before
 "THE BANNER OF THE SOUTH."

FAIRFAX C. H., Va., July 30, 1861.

THE FLAG OF SECESSION.

TUNE—"Star-Spangled Banner."

Oh, say can't you see by the dawn's early light
 What you yesterday held to be vaunting and dreaming,
 The Northern men routed, Abe Lincoln in flight,
 And the palmetto flag o'er the Capitol streaming?
 The pumpkins for fare,
 The foul fetid air,
 Gave proof through the night that the Yankees
 were there;
 Now the flag of secession in triumph doth wave
 O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.
 'Midst the dust that is raised by the fugitives' feet,
 His acts of coercion now bitterly rueing,
 See the Rail Splitter running in panting retreat,
 And gallant Virginia in laughter pursuing;
 Now he catches a beam
 Of the bayonet's fierce gleam,
 And he hurries away with a jump and a scream;
 And the flag of secession in triumph doth wave
 O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

But where is the despot who came to our soil,
 In the garb of the soldier—his minions disgracing,
 And showed them our fields and our homes as their spoil,
 We only can say that his speed is surprising;
 O'er the fences he made
 When that was his trade,

He has leapt in his fears from our vision to fade ;
And the flag of secession in triumph doth wave
O'er the land of the freed and the home of the brave.

Oh, such is the welcome the Southron bestows
On the minions who strive to make slaves of a nation,
We've a hand for our friends but the sword for our foes,
And the charge of our soldiers in fierce exultation ;
Then again to the fight,
And God for the right,
And the Northmen shall shrink from our warriors'
might,
And the flag of secession in triumph shall wave
O'er the land of the freed and the home of the brave.

DOWN-TRODDEN MARYLAND.

BY "B."

AIR—Tom Bowling.

Down-trodden, despised, see brave Maryland lie,
The noblest of all States ;
Up and to ransom her let each one try,
To hasten the plans of the Fates.
Her land is of the greatest beauty
That e'er the eye gazed on ;
Fearless she roused her to her duty,
Nor paused she till 'twas done.

From her, her Old Line has departed,
With leaders true and brave ;
She's been of all the truest hearted—
Why suffer her to be a slave ?
She's waited long with murmurs deep,
Aye calling on ye oft ;
Still traitors on her insults heap,
Still lies her hope aloft.

But yet she hopes for better things,
When Jeff., who all commands,
This wanton war to an end quick brings,
With peace to our Southern lands.
And when the South is free once more,
'Twill be her proudest boast,
That forth the first her men did pour,
To curb the invading host.

BALTIMORE, Nov. 18, 1861.

A VIGOROUS DEFINITION.—A Western cotemporary defines a Peace Meeting to be "a meeting to enter a solemn and indignant protest against every effort to save the Government from being overthrown."—Michigan Argus, Nov. 8.

SOUTHERN ENGLISH GRAMMAR.—The undersigned have now in press, and about the 1st day of September next will publish, a new Southern English Grammar, by the Rev. Allen M. Scott, D.D., late President of South Gibson College Tennessee. Dr. Scott is a Tennessean by birth and education, and he has been a practical teacher in various parts of the South and West for thirty years. He has made English Grammar a specialty, and, perhaps, has taught that science to more persons than any other in the Southern confederacy. The forthcoming work has been examined in MSS. by many critics, and in every instance pronounced to be eminently adapted to the purposes of school instruction. The rules are brief and comprehensive, the illustrations are numerous, and the notes just such as the student may need. The examples in parsing are mostly new, and the book will show on almost every page that it is a Southern work by a Southern author. We appeal to teachers and to all others interested in the cause of Southern education, to sustain us in this attempt to furnish school-books for our people. Let us have no more school-books or teachers from the North. Let our divorce from those fanatics who have grown rich upon our industry, and who are now seeking to subjugate us, be extended to our literature in all its departments. The price of the Grammar will be seventy-five cents. Liberal arrangements made to supply schools, &c., &c. Booksellers furnished at a liberal discount. We have also in preparation from the same author, a new speller.

HUTTON &amp; FRELIGH.

NEW SOUTHERN STYLES.—Miss M. Perdue, 326 Main Street, is now prepared to present to the ladies of Memphis and vicinity the Southern styles, gotten up expressly for Southern wear. We no longer will (or can) depend upon New York for our styles and fashions, which never did suit our climate or our people. We will have our opening of fall millinery on Saturday, October 5. We ask you, ladies, one and all, to call and examine our goods, and then decide for yourselves if Memphis has not outdone any thing New York could ever present to the South.—Memphis Appeal, Oct. 22.

MARTIAL MUSIC.—In the programme of a concert recently given in the interior of Georgia, we find the following: "Battle of Manassas, Descriptive Fantasia, Soldier's March in Camp, Cannon's Booming, Call the Alarm, Yankee Doodle Advancing, Dixie Answering, Yankee Doodle and Dixie Fighting, Dixie played on the Right Hand, Yankee Doodle on the Left Hand, Yankee Doodle Running, Dixie Victorious, Sweeping the Field."—Illinois State Journal, Nov. 6.

A PREDICTION FULFILLED.—A correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette, writing from Nolin, Ky., says: "On his memorable journey home from Washington, shortly before his death, Senator Douglas remarked to a distinguished Kentuckian whom he chanced to meet at Indianapolis, 'I know your man Breckinridge better than you do yourselves. Mark my words, sir; within a year from this time John C. Breckinridge will be a General in the rebel army!' The result shows how thoroughly Mr. Douglas did know his former friend. The year is but half passed since the prediction was made, and to-day Mr. Breckinridge holds a position as Brigadier-General in the rebel army under Buckner, at Bowling Green."

AN INCIDENT.—As the fleet of transports was passing down the Chesapeake Bay to Hampton Roads, on that beautiful day in October when we first got under weigh at Annapolis, a large bald eagle came sweeping out from the shore of Maryland, and soaring high in air above the fleet, finally alighted on the mast-head of the Atlantic, the head-quarters of the army. In an instant all eyes were upon him, and conjectures were busy as to whether he were a loyal bird, come to give his blessing at parting, or a secession rooster, intent on spying out our strength. We gave the bird the benefit of the doubt; an officer peremptorily stayed the hand of a soldier who would have shot him, and we accepted the omen as auguring the full success of our enterprise.—Leavenworth (Kansas) Times, Nov. 22.

GEORGIA IN THE WAR.—From the annual report of the Comptroller-General of the State of Georgia we learn that she has now in the field thirty-four full regiments, (some more than full,) and four partially filled regiments, together with three battalions and other independent companies in Virginia and Georgia, amounting in all to about forty regiments in the Confederate Government service. And besides this, three regiments now in the State service are to be increased at once to six regiments, for the defence of her sea-coast.—Richmond Examiner, Oct. 29.

CAMP PHRASES.—An enterprising publisher might make money by getting up a camp dictionary for the benefit of those who visit the army, and are mystified by the extraordinary words and phrases used. The word "arms" has been distorted into "uum," brought forcibly forth like the last groan of a dying cat, and in place of "march" we hear "utch." A tent is jocularly termed "the canvas," a sword is a "toad-sticker," and any of the altered patterns of muskets are known as "howitzers." Mess beef is "salt horse," coffee is "boiled rye," vegetables are "cow feed," and butter "strong grease." "Bully" is the highest term of commendation, while dissent is expressed in the remark "I don't see it." Almost every regiment has its nickname, and few officers or privates receive their legal appellations or titles when spoken of in their absence.—Cincinnati Commercial, Nov. 20

The Boston Post has the following Mark Tapley species of letter from one of its correspondents:

CAMP GUNPOWDER, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, }
November, 1861. }

DEAR MESSRS. EDITORS: Billy Briggs and I still remain in the army. The other morning I was standing by him in our tent. "Hand me them scabbards, Jimmy," said he. "Scabbards!" said I, looking round. "Yes, boots, I mean." Billy arranged himself in his scabbards—a dilapidated pair of fashionable boots—and stood up in a very erect and dignified manner. "Those boots of mine, I don't think were any relation to that beef we had for dinner today, Jimmy," said he. "No," said I. "If they were only as tough as that beef, and vice versa, it would have been better."

"I say, Cradle," he called out, "where are you?" Cradle was our contraband, a genuine darkey, with a foot of extraordinary length and extra heels to match, giving him a queer look about those extremities.—"What do you call him Cradle for, Billy?" said I, "that's a queer name." "What would you call him, Jimmy? if he ain't a cradle, what's he put on rockers for?" Cradle appeared with a pair of perforated stockings. "It's no use," said Billy, looking at them. "Them stockings will do to put on a sore throat, but they won't do for feet. It's a humiliation for a man like me to be without stockings; a man may be bald-headed, and it's genteel, but to be barefooted is ruination. The sleeves is good, too," he added, thoughtfully, "but the feet are gone. There is something about the heels of stockings and the elbows of stovepipes in this world, that is all wrong, Jimmy."

A supply of stockings had come that day, and were just being given out; a pair of very large ones fell to Billy's lot. Billy held them up before him. "Jimmy," said he, "those are pretty bags to give a little fellow like me. Them stockings was knit for the President or a young gorilla, certain;" and he was about to bestow them upon Cradle when a soldier in the opposite predicament made an exchange. "Them stockings made me think of the Louisiana volunteer I scared so the other day," said Billy. "How's that?" said I. "He was among our prisoners, and saw a big pair of red leggings, with feet, hanging up before a tent. He never said a word till he saw the leggings, and then he asked me what they were for. 'Them,' said I, 'them is General Banks' stockings.' He looked scared. 'He's a big man, is General Banks,' said I, 'but then he ort to be, the way he lives.' 'How?' said he. 'Why,' said I, 'his regular diet is bricks buttered with mortar.'" The next day Billy got a present of a pair of stockings from a lady; a nice soft pair with his initials in red silk upon them.—He was very happy. "Jimmy," said he, "just look at them," and he smoothed them down with his hand—"marked with my initials, too; 'B' for my Christian and 'W' for my heathen name. How kind! They came just in the right time, too; I've got such a sore heel; for it's a fact, Jimmy, that if there's any thing in life worse than unrequited love, it's a sore heel." Orders came to "fall in." Billy was so overjoyed with his new stockings he didn't keep the line very well. "Steady, there," growled the sergeant, "keep your place, and don't be travelling around like the Boston Post Office." We were soon put upon double-quick. After a few minutes Billy gave a groan. "What is it, Billy," said I. "It's all up with them," said he. I didn't know what he meant, but his face showed something very bad had happened.

When we broke ranks Billy hurried to the tent, and when I got there, there he stood, the very picture of despair, with his shoes off, and his heels shining through his stockings like two crockery door-knobs. "Them new stockings of yours is breech-loading, ain't they, Billy?" said an unfeeling volunteer. "Better get your name on both ends, so you can keep them together," said another. "Shoddy stockings," said a third. Billy was silent; I saw his heart was breaking, and I said nothing. We held a council on them, and Billy, not feeling strong-hearted enough for the task, gave them to Cradle with directions to sew up the small holes. I came into the tent soon after, and he was drawing a portrait, with a piece of charcoal, on a board. "That's a good portrait of Fremont," said I, "he looks just like that; that's the way he parts his hair, in the middle." "That isn't a portrait of Fremont," said Billy, "it's a map of the United States; that line in the middle you thought was the upper part in his hair, is the Mississippi River."

"Oh!" said I. I saw him again before supper; he came to me, looking worse than ever, the stockings in his hand. "Jimmy," said he, "you know I gave them to Cradle and told him to sew up the small holes, and what do you think he's done? He's gone and sewed up the heads." "It's a hard case, Jimmy," said I, "in such a case tears are almost justifiable."

BATTLE OF LEESBURG.—One personal encounter is worthy of record. As Captain Jones, of Company B, Seventeenth Mississippi, was passing through the woods at the head of his men, he met another party headed by an officer. The two halting instantly upon discovering their close proximity, Jones exclaimed, "For God Almighty's sake, tell me quick—friends or enemies—who are you?" The other replied, "We are friends," and at the same time advanced. A little boy, named Joseph Ware, who was behind the Mississippian, instantly cried out, "Captain, they are not friends; don't you see they have not guns like ours. They are Yankees, let me shoot." Again Jones exclaimed, "Who are you? Speak quick, for I can't keep my men from firing." "I'll let you know who we are, you d—d rebel," said the Yankee officer, for such he was, and suiting the action to the word, he sprang upon and seized Captain Jones by the collar. For a second or two a scuffle ensued between the officers, when the latter broke loose. At the same instant one of the Mississippians dashed out the Yankee's brains with the point of his musket.—Charleston Courier.

THE CLERGY OF REBELLION.—A correspondent of the Richmond Dispatch, writing from Marion, Ala., says: "Rev. H. A. M. Henderson, late of Kentucky, is now canvassing this portion of the State, raising a regiment. He is a Methodist clergyman, and was driven from Kentucky because he would not take upon him the Lincoln yoke. It argues well for the Southern confederacy to see the clergy flying to arms. It is stated here that one-half of the Baptist ministers of this State are in the army, so that in the convention many vacant seats are to be found."—N. Y. World, Nov. 20.

A SHAM FIGHT BECOMES EARNEST.—Encouraged by the war, one Sergeant J. W. Ambler has been teaching broadsword and bayonet exercise to the young men of Biddleford, Me., and on a recent evening, gave a public exhibition, at which it was announced there would be a "sham fight" between the Federals and the rebels, the latter to fall at a proper moment. But the "rebels" had determined not to die so easily, but instead thereof to drive the "Union men" from the stage; and they had nearly done it when the gallant sergeant grasped his trusty sword and the work became no joke. He slashed right and left, regardless of heads or points, and turned the scale of battle. As a result there were seven men who needed surgical attendance. The audience were too much interested to have "our side" win to scruple about bruised heads. Indeed, intense excitement prevailed; and the audience were all on their feet, cheering the sergeant on. One man has been in bed ever since, and the sergeant was not able to drill for several days.—Portsmouth (N. H.) Chronicle.

ATTENTION, RATTLESNAKES.—Charge with fell poison and be prepared to strike. We find many subjects in this town who must receive the force of our venom. Call early at the Hole and hear the Big Snake. Little snakes, keep your eyes open and bring in the list of those unfriendly to our holy cause. By order of the BIG RATTLE.

There were found upon the person of Colonel John A. Washington and forwarded to the War Department, two revolvers, (Colt's Navy,) one pair of spurs, one opera-glass, one large bowie-knife, and one pocket compass. General Reynolds retained one of the revolvers, and requested of Secretary Cameron permission to present it to Sergeant Lieber of the Seventeenth Indiana Regiment, who undoubtedly shot the speculator in the ancestral estate of Mount Vernon.

HOW A REBEL CAPTAIN DIED.—Captain John Sperlock, a native Virginian, in command of a company of Home Guards, near Mud River, Boone County, about forty-five miles up Guyandotte Creek, met a rebel captain named Harvey Barrett mounted on a large gray horse and driving before him two unarmed Union men, whom he was about to force into the rebel army. These men were on their way to join Sperlock's company when waylaid by Barrett, who threatened to shoot them if they attempted to escape. As soon as Captain Sperlock saw the party he rode up to Barrett, and ordered him to lay down his arms, which he refused to do. Sperlock then told him he was attempting to impress into the service of the rebels two men against their wills, and that if he did not instantly dismount and give himself up, he would kill him. Barrett denied that the men were going against their wills, but they, seeing that there was a chance of escape, cried out that they were Union men. Sperlock then raised his rifle to his shoulder and sent a ball through Barrett's heart, who toppled from his horse, and, like a true rebel, died with a lie in his throat.—Cincinnati Gazette, Nov. 6.

Follow with your earnest brothers,

BLASTED B'S.—The B's have swarmed upon us for some time, and are more provocative of nightmare than mince pie at ten o'clock. We had Buchanan, Breckinridge, Black, Bright, Bigler, Bayard, Benjamin, and Brown to curse the nation in the civil ranks, and now we are haunted by Bull Run, Bull's Bluff, Big Bethel, and Bull's Bay, boldly entered by our fleet, notwithstanding the ominous prestige against B's. Blast the B's. We hope they will cease to swarm on the boughs of the Tree of Liberty. We hope our fleet will make no Bull in Bull's Bay, and regret that Beaufort begins with B.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

There seems to be another "blasted B" down at Belmont, Mo.

SECESSION BARBARITIES.—The following is an extract from a letter from a gentleman of the highest respectability in Illinois, to his friend in Albany, N. Y., dated Oct. 26:

"Yes, my dear Sir, we live too near the borders of Missouri not to feel intensely excited by the scenes that are being enacted in that State. Secession and rebellion are rampant on the very borders of Illinois. The newspapers have informed you of the undermining of a railroad bridge by the rebels, by which scores of men, women, and children were suddenly sent into eternity, and great numbers, who were not killed outright, were maimed for life. Scenes equally brutal, though not so destructive, by wholesale, of human life, are every day perpetrated by the 'Secesh' of Missouri. A more cowardly set of savages does not exist. Two of my three sons are now in the Union army. The oldest is captain of a company, but Frank, our youngest boy, is only a private.

Both are in the field in Missouri, and both have frequently enjoyed the gratification of smelling gunpowder in battle with the Secession rascals. One day a small party of Missourians, concealed behind a wood-pile close to the railroad, fired into the cars as they were passing, and killed an excellent young man who was sitting by the side of Frank. The young man assassinated in that cowardly manner was Frank's bosom friend, and both were born in the same county. Ever since that day Frank has never been in a skirmish with the Missouri rebels without taking deliberate aim and dropping his man; for the boy is a capital shot, and always hits his mark. He says he feels no more compunction in killing a Missouri rebel than he would in killing a mad dog.

"You can hardly realize the ferocity with which slavery inspires the owner of a negro or two. Even woman, when she owns a slave, or one is owned in the family, seems, in many instances, to have cast aside her feminine nature and to have become savage. A woman of wealth, the owner of quite a number of slaves, when a band of Cherokee Indians, a few months ago, came to the south of Missouri, where she lives, to join the Secession army, under McCulloch of Texas, that woman, or rather fiend, publicly offered the Indians a large reward if they would bring her 'Yankee free-soil' scalps enough to make a counterpane for her bed. There is no mistake about it.

"The same ferocity exists wherever slavery is found. Last June, a beautiful and accomplished girl, a native of Western New York, employed as a teacher in New Orleans, was dragged, on Sunday morning, to Jackson Square, and placed in ad nuditate nature in the presence of many hundreds of spectators, including scores of well-dressed women. To the latter the poor girl made a heartrending appeal, that they would save her sex from such an outrage. But they replied only by jeers and insults, telling her it was no more than every Yankee woman deserved. The unfortunate girl was tarred and feathered, and then banished from the State, without receiving the salary due her. You may rely upon the entire truth of this statement. It comes on the authority of a spectator, upon whose words as implicit reliance can be placed as upon that of any man in the community.

"I hope and trust that God designs to make this wicked rebellion the instrument for ridding our land from the curse of slavery."—Albany Eve. Journal.

THE Scientific American describes a breast-plate which, it is said, is being extensively worn by the officers and men in the Federal army before Washington. It is composed of thin spring steel, and is worn between the cloth and the lining of a common military vest. It has two leaves, which lap at the edges when the vest is buttoned, so as to cover the entire chest. It weighs only three pounds and a half, and can be worn with ease by any officer or soldier during the most active exercise. It is very strong in proportion to its weight, as it can resist the thrust of a bayonet or sword, and it will repel the bullets of muskets and pistols at ranges which would otherwise be fatal to life.

HERE is a specimen of the material employed to keep up the spirits of the rank and file of the rebel army. It is from the Atlanta (Ga.) Intelligencer of October 8:

A Mutiny among the Union Troops at Washington—General McClellan shot and mortally wounded.—We have received information from a reliable source, in regard to the reported slaughter of Federal troops at Washington. It appears that four regiments were required to change their arms, whereupon they mutinied, and Gen. McClellan surrounded them with five regiments. A meleec with stones and brickbats then commenced, and to quell the riot, McClellan gave the order to fire. The slaughter is represented to have been fearful. Surely the Lincolnites have commenced the work of blood and carnage among themselves. A report is in circulation that McClellan has since been shot and mortally wounded, but this lacks confirmation.

MEMBERS OF THE CHARLESTON CONVENTION KILLED IN BATTLE.—Major Gavitt, the United States officer killed in the fight at Fredericktown, Mo., was a Douglas delegate to the Charleston Convention from Indiana, and also attended the adjourned session in Baltimore.

Lieutenant L. A. Nelms, of Georgia, (a Rebel officer,) reported as killed at the Santa Rosa fight, was a member of the Charleston Convention, and a most devoted Union man. When twenty-six of the Georgia delegates seceded from the Convention, he was one of the ten who refused to vacate their seats, but remained in the Convention till the close. On his return home Nelms was accused by one of his seceding colleagues with being untrue to the South on account of his remaining in the "Squatter Sovereignty Convention." A duel was the consequence, in which Nelms was badly wounded in the arm with a bullet. When the Convention reassembled at Baltimore, Mr. Nelms, though still suffering from his wound, again appeared and remained till the close of the Convention.—Baltimore American, Oct. 30.

AMONG the soldiers now at Fort Sumter, is Jas. Cabell, who, a few weeks ago, had the bravery to say that when the Union fleet hove in sight he intended to spike the guns of the fort. For this expression Captain Rhett (son of the editor of the Mercury) ordered him to be tied across a gun and whipped—to receive one hundred and twenty-five lashes, well laid on. The soldiers in the fort rebelled against the infliction of this punishment, and so alarming was the mutiny that Rhett sent to Fort Moultrie for soldiers to quell it. They came, and the man was whipped. This incident, which occurred but two or three weeks ago, shows the state of feeling among the soldiers in Fort Sumter. They are mostly foreigners and Northern men, who having no work, were obliged to go into the army to live.—Milwaukee Wisconsin, Oct. 30.

THE RHODE ISLAND GUNNERS in the late battle at Edwards' Ferry were fourteen in number—ten of them were killed or wounded, and all their horses were killed. As only four escaped unhurt, it is hardly fair to charge such men with any thing except too much bravery. These facts are from the highest authority, and, in the name of the same authority, a "protest" is entered, &c., &c. J. C. R.—National Intelligencer, Oct. 31.

INCIDENTS IN THE BATTLE OF WILD CAT.—A correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette relates the following:

I will give you a few incidents of the recent fight at Wild Cat, which a regular report could not show. The hill upon which it took place is a round, lofty elevation, a third of a mile from our camp, surrounded by deeply-wooded ravines, and cleared for space of about two acres on top. To take and this Colonel Coburn, with half his regiment, led off through the bushes in a trot from the boys, like boys starting out on a turkey hunt. In minutes they could be seen on the high summit of the hill. Very shortly they were fired on; the result was a scramble between Coburn's men and the rebels which should get on the hill first, approaching from opposite directions. When the firing fairly commenced, at intervals in the roar could be heard, in the camp, the shrill, wild voices of Coburn, and Durham, his adjutant, ringing out, "Give 'em hell, boys!" "Dose them with cold lead!" "Shoot the damned hounds!" "Load up, load up, God's sake!" "Give it to old Gollywhopper!" When the boys would cheer and yell till the glens echoed.

Capt. Dille, during the fight, in rushing around helping on the cause, ran astride a briar bush, the nethermost part of his unmentionables was torn, and a flag of white cotton was seen flaunting in the air. One of the boys said, "Captain, it can't be told of you that you never turned tail on the enemy." "By the way, the captain is a heroic fellow, and did, the boys say, "a big job of fighting." He has a queer old fellow in his company named John Memminger, a crack marksman, with a big goggle, rolling eye. John would take his tree, fire, and then move on a little. At one time he was peeping over a stump taking aim when a ball struck the stump a few inches from the top at the opposite side, which knocked bark and splinters in his eyes. "Bully for Jake," says John. This is now a cant phrase in the camp. "Bully for Jake," can be heard at all hours.

When Major Ward of the Seventeenth Ohio came over the hill with a part of the regiment, Col. Coburn took him down the hillside in front of the Kentuckians in a somewhat exposed place. Some one asked the colonel why he put him there. "Well," said he, "I eyed him, and he looked like an old bull-dog, so I put him down where he could wool the hounds." The major, you know, never before had a compliment paid to his homely, sturdy face, being rather hard-favored. Next day some of the boys got the joke on him by telling him they had heard his beauty complimented. He asked for the compliment, got it, and drily remarked, "that it was rather an equivocal recommendation of his pretty face."

Almost every officer fought gun in hand, except Cols. Coburn and Woodford, who were armed with navies. Captain Hauser, Adjutant Durham, Capt. Dille, Lieutenants Maze and Scott, more than the men themselves, blazed away at the rebels. What could not men do with such examples set them. When part of the Kentucky boys fled, Capt. Alexander screamed out to the men, "Boys, if you are such damned cowards as to run, I'll stay and die." Instantly a boy scarce sixteen years old turned back, ran up to the captain's side, saying, "Yes, Cap., and I'll stay and die with you." He did stay, and others followed his example. In the afternoon when the fighting had ceased, Gen. Schoepff came over to the hill, and taking Cols. Coburn and Woodford by the hand in the presence of the boys, thanked them for saving the hill, for it saved Camp Wildecat and prevented a retreat of our whole force to the other side of the river. Just then a shower of balls whizzed around, and one knocking the dirt in his eyes, the General quietly rubbed it out, and looked around as unconcerned as if at dress parade. He is a noble-looking man, a Hungarian patriot, one of General Bem's officers, who spent three years in Turkey with him drilling their army.

Just before the enemy made their charges, there could be seen two regiments in a neighboring field. One of the boys said to Col. Coburn, "We'll have to retreat." Another sturdy little fellow stepped up and swore he was not of the running kind, and he'd stay and fight anyhow. He got the cheers, so the boys concluded to stay and did stay about there all that day and night. Such pluck makes one man equal to four. The boys captured an orderly sergeant's book, love letters, a diary, &c., giving details up to the hour of battle. The utmost confidence in victory was expressed.

Since the battle, some of our boys were out looking at a grave of one of the Secesh; he had not been well buried, and one hand stuck out. "He's reaching for his land warrant," says one.

When Col. Coburn and Capt. Dille were rallying the flying Kentuckians, the former found a crowd sheltered behind one stump; he cried out, "Pile out, pile out, boys, it don't take seventeen men to guard a black stump." It was electric, they after this fought like men. SPECTATOR.

AN INCIDENT AT THE BATTLE OF ROMNEY.

ROMNEY, VA., Nov. 16, 1861.

While the National forces were standing under the enemy's fire, on the day of the battle here, and the shot and shell were flying in every direction around us, a little incident occurred which I think is worthy of notice.

Capt. Butterfield, of the Eighth Ohio regiment, (being one of the ranking captains,) acted as major upon that occasion, and was obliged to ride an old sorrel horse, which had been used as a team horse, and required both spurs and whip, which the captain had provided himself with, the latter cut from a tree and about five feet long. It was found that our small six-pound guns would not reach the enemy's battery, and Col. Mason ordered Captain B. to bring forward a brass twelve-pounder which was in the rear. Off sped the old sorrel and his brave rider, and in a few moments up came the gun. Its position was assigned and made ready for the match, but the captain came dashing back in front of the gun, and the smell of powder or something else had made the old sorrel almost unmanageable, for in trying to wheel him from the front of the gun, the more the captain applied the whip and spur, the more the old sorrel would not go. This kept the gunners in terrible suspense, for much depended on that shot. Finally the captain finding his efforts to move his steed fruitless, he sang out at the top of his voice, "never mind the old horse, blaze away;" and sure enough they did blaze away, and it proved a good shot, for it caused the rebels to limber up their battery and take to their heels. At that moment orders came to charge, and off dashed the old sorrel frightened at the discharge of the gun, which had scorched his tail, and mingled in the charge. He was lost to my view until I arrived in the town, where I saw him brought to a stand, and the captain standing in his stirrups, with his cap flying, cheering for the glorious victory that had been achieved. A SOLDIER.

SOUTH CAROLINA THIRTY YEARS AGO.

On the 4th of July, 1832, "Independence Day" was celebrated at Charleston by two separate meetings: one the Unionists, the other the Nullifiers. Colonel Hayne, the Southern champion who was so discomfited in the tilt with Webster, spoke to the Nullification meeting, and Drayton, a distinguished Unionist member of Congress, father of Gen. Drayton who commanded at the Port Royal forts during the recent bombardment, to the Unionists. At the conclusion of Drayton's powerful and splendid oration, the following beautiful ode was chanted by a full choir:

Hail, our country's natal morn !
Hail, our spreading kindred born !
Hail, thou banner, not yet torn,
    Waving o'er the free !
While this day in festive throng,
Millions swell the patriot's song,
Shall we not the note prolong ?
    Hallowed jubilee !

Who would sever Freedom's shrine ?
Who would draw the invidious line ?
Though by birth one spot be mine,
    Dear is all the rest—
Dear to me the South's fair land ;
Dear the central mountain band,
Dear New England's rocky strand,
    Dear the prairied West.

By our altars pure and free,
By our laws' deep-rooted tree,
By the past's dread memory,
    By our Washington—
By our common kindred tongue !
By our hopes—bright, buoyant, young,
By the tie of country strong,
    We will still be one.

Fathers ! have ye bled in vain ?
Ages, must you droop again ?
Maker, shall we rashly stain,
    Blessings sent by Thee ?
No ! receive our solemn vow,
While before thy throne we bow,
Ever to maintain as now,
    " Union—Liberty ! "

ODE TO AMERICA.

BY GEO. H. BOKER.

No more of girls and wine,
No more of pastoral joys,
No after-sighing for some antique line
Of bearded kings who, at their nation's birth,
    As children play with toys,
Made merry with our earth :
No more, no more of these !
    The girls are pale ;
    The wine is drunken to the lees ;
Still are the bleatings of the woolly fold ;
The olden kings look thin and cold,
    Like dim belated ghosts
    That hurrying sail
Toward their dark graves,
    Along the brightening coasts,
Chased by the golden lances hurled
From the young sun above his cloudy world.

My country, let me turn to thee,
With love and pride that glow
Pure as twin-altar fires that blow
Their flames together to one Deity.
Look where I may,
O land beneath the iron sway

Of the strong hand ;—
O land gored through and through
By thy own faithless brand ;
Land of once happy homes,
    To whose now darkened doors
The hand of sorrow comes,
    Early and late, and pours,
With no soft prelude, or no warning beat,
Her urn of bitter tears before thy feet !

O suffering, patient land,
Thou bearest thy awful woe
So grandly, with such high command
Of tears, that dare not flow
For the great godlike smile
Which crowns thy lips the while,
And stills thy mighty heart to move
As calmly on as when the hand of love
Guided thy peaceful realm,
And idly swung the almost useless helm ;
That I, who, in my erring thought,
Have often wronged thy fame,
By sneers and taunts of blame,
Bow down with penitence o'erwrought,
And pangs of reverent shame.

Thy rulers put aside thy rights ;
Thou murmurest not :
They waste thy gold ;
Still thy great cause is not forgot.
Thy ancient foe grows loud, and bold
To proffer counsel, jeers, and spurns ;
The swaggering coward burns
With new-found courage ; England smites
Thy sensitive, proud cheek :
Smites, like a craven, when she deems thee weak !
Thy pale, stern features blush,
Thy passionate arteries gush
With hot rebellious blood :
But thou stillest the raging flood ;
Thou seemest to listen, in a patient hush,
To the audacious kings,
As they prattle empty things.
Thy pale, stern features blush,
From thy heart the churl is spurned ;
But thy ready sinews pause,
Remembering thy holy cause,
And the blow is not returned !

Not yet, not yet ! Oh ! bear,
As the lion in his lair,
Whetting his teeth, and gathering all his strength,
Bears the insulting cry
Of hunters drawing nigh
The dreadful door of his invaded home :
Whence, with a roar and bound, at length—
With bristling hair, with mane that rolls
Above his fiery eyes,
Like the tumultuous vapors of the skies,
Above the piercing lightning—he shall come,
The lordly beast, whose lifted paw controls
The fatal ends of life, and, in his wrath,
Sweep from his onward path
The awe-struck phalanx of his enemies !
I saw thy many squadrons file and form ;
I saw them driving through a deadly storm
Of shot and shell,
Where thousands fell ;
But who survived, ah ! they, indeed,
Were soldiers true ; a race to breed
Avenging warriors, ripening for the day
When thou shalt cast thy shame away.

thy mail-clad fleets, whose ponderous arms
 Laugh at the toys of Europe, daily grow
 By stream and silent lake.
 I saw them glide and take
 The sheltered waters, as the wild swan glides,
 With scarce a ripple at their moulded sides,
 To mar the current in its onward flow.
 Swiftly they gathered, by the rising walls
 Of armed ports;
 Hither and thither at prodigious sports,
 Try their watery wings, they sped;
 Then snuffed a welcome from the briny breeze,
 And, with one will, away they fled
 To join their dusky sisters of the seas!
 I saw it all; and bending low,
 My lips against thy ear I set,
 With "Hist! a hope begins to grow!
 Bear on, bear on! Not yet, not yet!"

O glory of our race,
 Long suffering guardian of the free,
 Thou who canst dare to be,
 For a great purpose, in a lowly place!—
 Thou who canst stretch the olive o'er the wave,
 And smite the master of the slave,
 Yet wisely measure all
 That might and must befall
 Ere the great end shall crown the thing to be!—
 How shall I honor thee?
 How shall I fitly speak,
 In song so faint and weak,
 Of majesty and wisdom such as thine?
 For now the scales so long,
 Held on the side of wrong,
 To thee again incline;
 And thou mayst lift thy radiant head,
 And bind thy ring of reappearing stars
 About thy forehead, and forget thy scars
 In joy at holding that for which they bled!
 Resume thy place, unchallenged now,
 Nor bow thy glories to the haughtiest brow
 That wears a royal crown!
 False prophets scowled thee down,
 And whispered darkly of thy coming fate:
 The cause, the way, the date,
 They wrote for thee with the slow augur's hand.—
 Their lies were scrawled in sand!
 They perished utterly!

What is the splendor of the diadem,
 The gilded throne, the brodered carpet-hem,
 The purple robe, the sceptre, and the strain
 Of foregone kings, whose race
 Defies the herald's trace,
 Before thy regal steps on land and main?
 There are some deeds so grand
 That their mighty doers stand
 Ennobled, in a moment, more than kings:
 And such deeds, O land sublime,
 Need no sanctity from time;
 Their own epoch they create,
 Whence all meaner things take date;
 Then exalt thee, for such noble deeds were thine!
 Envy nothing born of earth,
 Rank nor wealth nor ancient birth,
 Nor the glittering sorrows of a crown.
 O nation, take in stead
 Thy measureless renown,
 To wrap thy young limbs like a royal stole,
 And God's own flaming aureole,
 To settle on thy head!

 Shouting liberty forever,
 Throughout our happy land.
 I am glad I'm in this army, &c.,
 For the victors we shall stand,
 Shouting liberty, forever, &c.

THE AMBULANCE SONG.

Let the broad columns of men advance!
 We follow behind with the Ambulance.
 They lead us many a weary dance,
 But they cannot weary the Ambulance.
 We rattle over the flinty stones,
 And crush and shatter the shrinking bones.
 Here we ride over a Christian skull—
 No matter, the Ambulance is full.
 Behold! a youthful warrior dead,
 But the wheels glide over his fair young head.
 See smoke and fire! hear cannon's roar!
 Till the bursting ears can hear no more.

Till the eyes see only a sky blue frame,
And a lurid picture of smoke and flame.
And the air grows dense with a thousand sighs,
And shriek's defiance in shrill death-cries.
And blood lies black in horrible streams,
And we think we are dreaming fearful dreams.
But our wheels are strong, our axles sound,
And over the sea we merrily bound.
What do we care for the bursting shell?
We know its music, and love it well.
What do we care for sighs and groans,
For mangled bodies and shattered bones?
We laugh at danger, and scorn mischance,
We who drive the Ambulance.
Through rattling bullets and clashing steel,
We steadily guide the leaping wheel.
Writhing in agony they lie,
Cursing the Ambulance, praying to die.
While some in a dreamy deathlike trance,
Bleed life away through the Ambulance.
Hurrah! Hurrah! Up bands and play!
We're leading a glorious life to-day.
For war is play and life a chance,
And 'tis merry to drive the Ambulance.

— Vanity Fair.

THE ADVENTURES OF THE C. S. A. COMMISSIONERS.

Ye jolly Yankee gentlemen, who live at home at ease,
How little do ye think upon the dangers of the seas!
The winds and waves, the whales and sharks, you've heard of long ago,
But there are things much worse than these, as presently I'll show.
If you're a true-bred Union man, go joyful where you please;
Beneath the glorious Stars and Stripes cross safe the stormy seas;
But look out for "San Jacintos" that may catch you on your way,
If you're acting as Commissioner for the noble (?) C. S. A.

And now you'll guess my subject, and what my song 's about;
But I'd not have put them into rhyme, if they hadn't first put out;
For they put out of Charleston, when the night was drear and dark,
And then they put out all the lights, that they might not be a mark;
And then they did put out to sea, (though here there seems a hitch,
For what could they expect to see when the night was black as pitch?)
But they somehow 'scaped the Union ships, and hoped on some fine day
To land in Europe and to "blow" about the C. S. A.
They safely got to Cuba, and landed in Havana;
Described the power and glory of New Orleans and Savannah;

Declared that running the blockade was a thing by no means hard,
And boasted of the victories won by their valiant Beauregard:
Davis's skill in government could never be surpassed—
The amazing strokes of genius by which he cash amassed;
Foreign bankers would acknowledge ere a month had passed away,
That the true financial paradise was in the C. S. A.

* * * * *

Some days are passed, and pleasantly, upon Bermuda's Isle,
The sun is shining bright and fair, and Nature seems to smile:
The breezes waved the British flag that fluttered o'er the "Trent,"
And the ripples rose to lave her sides as proudly on she went.
Mason and Slidell on her deck thought all their dangers past,
And poked each others' ribs and laughed as they leant against the mast:
"Haven't the Yankees just been 'done' uncommonly nicely, eh?
"They've got most money, but the brains are in the C. S. A.!"

You have heard the ancient proverb, and, tho' old, it's very good,
Which hints "That it's better not to crow until you've left the wood:"
And so it proved with these two gents, for at that moment—souse!
A cannon-shot fell splash across the steamer's bows
The San Jacinto came up close, and tho' rather rude, 'tis true, Good Wilkes he hailed the Trent and said, "I'll thank you to heave to;
"If you don't give up two rascals, I must blow you right away,
"Mason and Slidell they're named, and they're from the C. S. A.!"

The British captain raged and swore; but then what could he do?
It scarcely would be worth his while to be blown up, he knew;
Wilkes's marines with bay'nets fixed, were standing on the "Trent,"
So he gave up the traitors, and o'er the side they went.
Wilkes, having got them, wished they'd feel pleasant and at home,
So offered his best cabins if their ladies chose to come;
But they shook their heads, and merely smiled; I am sorry for to say Conjugality's at a discount down in the C. S. A.

They coolly said unto their lords, "Our dresses all are new;
What on earth would be the use of going back with you?
And tho' we're very sorry that your plans are undone,
We mean to pass the winter in Paris and in London.

'Stead of bothering you, and sharing your prison beds and fetters,
We'll write each mail from Europe the most delightful letters:
Tell you of all we've done and seen, at party, ball, or play,
To cheer your hearts, poor martyrs to Colton and
C. S. A."

So the two vessels parted; the San Jacinto went To unload her precious cargo, while the captain of the "Trent"
Having lost a (probable) douceur which had seemed within his grip,
We presume, for consolation, retired and took a nip.
The ladies talked of the affair less with a tear than smile—
Their lords and masters took their way to Warren's
Fort the while:
And gratis lodged and boarded there, they may think for many a day
That brains are sometimes northward found as well's in the C. S. A.

LE BATON MILITAIRE.

BY SOLON S. S. SHAKESTICK.

Not a stick of a song, but a song of a Stick;
Nor a sharp-pointed one but as dull as a brick;
Nor a smooth-sided one, but as rough as a hog;
Nor a comely-shaped one, but as foul as a frog;
Or a lobster that lazily lolls on a log,
Forms the stock of this song of a stick.

Not the stage stick, who strides, and who stalks, and who slides,
And who whispers her "points," and who yells her
"asides;"
Nor the stick of long peppermint, painted with stripes;
Nor the gingerbread stick, nor the stick used for types;
Nor the sticks in the pile where the Afric was found;
Nor the sticks up in steeples, nor sticks underground;
Nor the mock-auction stick with his blarney and tricks,
Where Rural was stuck with his hat full of bricks,
And with knife, minus blades, and with watch, minus ticks;
Nor the sticks used for walking, nor Stygian Styx;
Nor the sticks of ratan, which the school-marms prepare;
But the stick of all sticks—Le Baton Militaire.

He's a soft sort of one, he's a slippery one—
He looks as if Nature had made him in fun.
He's as noisy as juveniles full of their tricks,
When they rattle the railings with riotous sticks.
He's as proud as a peacock, with tail in full glory;
He's as proud as a rebel, or Tennessee tory,
When he boasts of a theft, or a massacre gory.
He walks like a duck, or he moves around you,
With a hop, skip, and jump, like a wild kangaroo,
And his brass-buttoned coat-tail incessantly swings,
Like a mule's or a bull's when the blue-bottle stings;
Or he stands like a cow, when considering her cud,
If his bright patent leathers are sprinkled with mud,
And pricks up his ears at the mention of blood.

He's stern with small boys, and with weak-minded men,
Like an owl sitting on the same perch with a wren;
But he's affable, loud, when with drunkards and gluttons,
And his breast, like a Poeter's, swells under its buttons.
He hates all that "nonsense" the ladies prepare,
With stockings and shirts for sick soldiers to wear.
He's sour if they're homely, he's sweet if they're fair;
He's the stick of all sticks,—Le Baton Militaire.

He turns up his nose at the city parade,
And the stay-at-home guards, for reception arrayed;
The "feather-bed knights," as he calls them with sneers,
Who dare not to battle, like bold grenadiers;
Too mean their own guns and equipments to buy,
Rush out to the war-ground, and conquer or die,
In defence of the homes of the wealth-rolling Jews,
Who, a cent to contribute most calmly refuse.
He roars of great battles he never did see,—
How the "Tenth" were destroyed—how the rebels did flee—

And swears, that, if Wool makes a contraband free,
He will go (Le Baton will) where white people be.
He laughs at a wound, tho' he never has felt it,
And glories in blood, tho' he never has smelt it.
With a shrug of his shoulders that rustles his "bobs,"
He wonders, "what next from the Cabinet snobs?"
"Will Russell (the Cockney!) be thrown in the sea?"
"Will the princes of Bourbon both Brigadiers be?"
Le Baton most familiarly nicks the high names; Says, "the old codger (Scott) is always up with his sprains;"

"Little Mac," for McClellan, for Seward, says
"Billy."
Talks of "Johnnie Fremont," and of "Jessie, his filly."

And all of these things with a soldier-like air,
With a swagger and swell and a saucer-eyed stare,
As becomes the great stick—Le Baton Militaire.

Macaulay gave glory to Hall of Navarre
With his oriflammé plume, as a signal afar,
For the thick of the scrimmage—the tide of the war;
But, bless you, 'twas nought to the one I exalt
In the praise of this hero, who never cries "Halt!"
"Nor "Charge!" for that matter, (for Marshal Baton Doesn't command,) but he still is the pride of my song.

He follows the progress of fleeting events,
Without stirring a peg in his country's defence.
He quotes you Hardec, twirling up his moustache,
And tells you how to smoke out the traitorous batch,
As easy as swallows are smoked from a thatch.
You never will see him in battle engaging,
But he's been (so he says) where 'twas very near raging.

You may see him, however, on every street,
With his epaulettes bright and uncommonly neat—
Ready dressed and prepared the invader to meet.
So glory at least, to whom glory is due,
And why not for him with the coat, brass, and blue?
Oh! why not for him, with the heart—not the hand—
To sweep the Secessionists out of the land?
Oh! why not for him with the brow-beating stare—
The Stick animated, with blood-thirsty air?
Why not for the stick—Le Baton Militaire?

A REBEL BURLESQUE ON GENERAL SHERMAN'S PROCLAMATION.

PORT ROYAL, CAMP LOAVES AND FISHES.

To the Loyal Ladies of the Sea Island:—

Having been long familiar with your soft feather beds, well-supplied tables, beautiful flowers, and hospitable smiles, more charming even than your fish and game, we entreat you, with every assurance of our most tender regard, to come and partake of some of the delicacies which we have appropriated by a "military necessity."

It really grieves our loving hearts to live on the fat of your land while you are houseless, particularly when we have so often boasted of your hospitality, and been your honored guests, year after year, "without money and without price."

If you decline this affectionate overture remember that we are cognizant to every creek and every corner in your larders; we know all your little rivers of milk and honey, the small hillocks of fresh butter, and the promontories of orange preserve jars, and we will appropriate them all to the glory of Abraham the First.

On the other hand, if you will only separate yourselves from the rebel husbands, sons, and brothers, who are behaving so improperly to our blessed Government, by fighting for your homes and your honor, you shall be taken to our affectionate embrace, and bouquets of roses, such as you used to place around our firesides, and on our toilet tables, shall be showered upon you. Yours, with sacred memories,

CHAS. O. BUTTERWELL & CO.

—Charleston Courier.

WHEN Col. Corcoran, while a prisoner at Richmond, Va., was told that he was to be hung if one of the privateers on trial at the North was selected for punishment by death, he said:

"Well, sir, I am ready; when I engaged in this war I made up my mind to sacrifice my life, if necessary, in defence of that flag under which I have lived and gained an honorable position."—Buffalo Courier, Dec. 9.

NORFOLK, Nov. 18, 1861.

THE news of the arrival in Hampton Roads of Ministers Slidell and Mason, also their secretaries, in the United States frigate San Jacinto excited considerable interest here on Saturday night and yesterday. It is stated by a gentleman from Old Point that six shots were fired between the two vessels. It is also reported that the papers of the Ministers were not taken, and that the ladies connected with the party were allowed to proceed on the voyage.—Richmond Dispatch.

THE SPIRIT OF THE REBELS.—The subjoined intercepted letter from James Blackburn to his wife has been sent to us by Gen. Nelson with a request that it shall be published. In complying with the request we omit portions of the letter which are strictly of a private nature, and publish only such parts as exhibit a fiendish hatred toward men in Kentucky who have only offended in remaining loyal to their country and State. James Blackburn was a schoolmate of the editor, and our personal relations were friendly. He is a son of Edward Blackburn of Woodford County, and a brother-in-law of Thompson Flournoy, of Arkansas, in which State he has himself resided for several years. We have no doubt that the devilish and murderous spirit exhibited by the latter are shared by most of the renegades who have lifted their traitor hands against their native State, and all hesitating Union men may see from it what they have to expect if they shall ever be placed at the mercy of such men as our quondam acquaintance:

ABINGTON, VA., Oct. 2, 1861.

MY DEAR WIFE: I have left you and our children in the land of the despot, but God grant that I may soon be able to make the Union men of Kentucky feel the edge of my knife. From this day I hold every Union traitor as my enemy, and from him I scorn to receive quarter, and to him I will never grant my soul in death, for they are cowards and villains enough. Brother Henry and I arrived here without hindrance. I have had chills all the way, but I hope to live to kill forty Yankees for every chill that I ever had. I learn that Hardee is still in the Arkansas lines inactive, and if this proves to be true, I will tender my resignation and go immediately to Kentucky. I hope I will do my duty as a rebel and a freeman. Since I have the Union men of Kentucky I intend to begin the work of murder in earnest, and if I ever spare one of them may hell be my portion. I want to see Union blood flow deep enough for my horse to swim in. Your husband,

JAMES BLACKBURN.

—Maysville Eagle, Nov.

CONDEMNED OUT OF THEIR OWN MOUTHS.—In the instructions which Mr. Toombs, as Secretary of State, gave to privateers, we find the following passage: "Neutral vessels, conveying enemies' despatches, or military persons in the service of the enemy, forfeit their neutral character, and are liable to capture and condemnation." If we had applied this general rule to the Trent, she would have been lying in one of our harbors as a prize.—Cincinnati Times, Dec. 2.

A NEW WAY TO OBTAIN LIQUOR.—The expedients of soldiers to obtain liquor seem inexhaustible. A Paducah correspondent of the St. Louis Republican says the other day a man started out with his coffee-pot for milk; and on his return, an officer suspecting him for having whiskey in his can, wished to examine it, and the man satisfied him by pouring out milk. At night there was a general drunk in that soldier's quarters, ending in a fight. It was at last discovered that the man had put a little milk into the spout of his can, sealing the inside with bread, and filling the can with whiskey. That man is "'cute" enough to lead an expedition against Jeff. Thompson.—Louisville Journal, Nov. 30.

The Richmond Examiner tells with solemn horror that "Lincoln's soldiers" at Harper's Ferry amuse themselves by lying in wait and shooting the little fair-haired girls of the village on their way to school. It mentions the names of two or three innocent little victims, and tells the vile lie with such an air of sincerity that no doubt many of its readers believe it.—Baltimore American, Dec. 7.

A CURIOUS COINCIDENCE.—In the first volume of "Baneroff's History of the United States," page 26, occurs the following singular passage:

"For an agricultural colony, a milder climate was desirable; in view of a settlement at the South, De Monts explored and colonized for France, the rivers, the coasts, and the bays of New England, so far, at least, as Cape Cod. The numbers and hostility of the savages led him to delay a removal, since his colonists were so few. Yet the purpose remained. Thrice in the spring of the following year did Dupont, his lieutenant, attempt to complete the discovery. Thrice he was driven back by adverse winds, and at the third time his vessel was wrecked. Pourtrincourt, who had visited France, and was now returned with supplies, renewed the design; but meeting with disasters on the shoals of Cape Cod, he, too, returned to Port Royal. Thus the first settlement on the American Continent had been made—two years before James River was discovered, and three years before a cabin had been raised in Canada."

The name of Dupont in connection with a naval expedition at Port Royal, in 1693, and with another and greater two hundred and fifty years later, is one of those curious coincidences in which the muse of history loves to indulge. If the first had succeeded in his efforts to possess the New England shores, who can tell what would have been the effect upon the destinies of this continent? If the second had failed in entering Port Royal harbor, how differently the future annals of the Republic might read! If Port Royal menaced New England in 1693, the tables have been turned in 1861.—Philadelphia Press.

IN Eastport, Me., a general news despatch is received every evening, and at the sound of a bell, the people collect and listen to the last news. An officer passes through the crowd, and takes a contribution to defray the expenses of telegraphing.—Cincinnati Times, Dec. 3.

BURSTING THE GREAT GUN.—A Columbus (Ky.) correspondent says:

"A most painful accident occurred here late yesterday, (Nov. 11th), being the explosion of the big pivot-gun, the 128-pounder, that has so frequently made the hills and valleys for thirty miles around Columbus reëcho with its potent voice. The gun had been loaded during the progress of the battle of the 6th, while hot; but no opportunity offering itself in the latter part of the day to use it to advantage against the enemy, it was allowed to remain loaded up to yesterday afternoon. I am told that Gen. McCown assured the gunners that the piece would explode, supporting himself with a lucid explanation of the principles on which he based his supposition; but the huge proportions of the gun were supposed to be a sufficient protection to those around against the mine of saltpetre imbedded in the breech; and the gun was fired, exploded, and caught the magazine belonging to the piece, which lay immediately beneath the gun, killing eight men, among whom were Lieutenant of Artillery Snowden, and John Dublin, a citizen of Columbus, and seriously wounding five others, among whom are Maj.-Gen. Polk, who was knocked senseless by the concussion, having his clothes literally torn off him. Captains of Artillery Rueker and Miller, were seriously, though not dangerously wounded, and Capt. Pickett, of the Sappers and Miners, considerably bruised by the concussion."—Memphis Appeal, Nov. 14.

A CHAPLAIN CAPTURES A COLONEL.—While the Rev. J. D. Rodgers, Chaplain of the Twenty-third Indiana Regiment, was on his way from conference at Rockport, Indiana, to Paducah some weeks ago, an old gentleman came on board the boat at Henderson who attracted his attention. He was dressed like an ordinary farmer, and in conversation appeared to be not very bright. At length, however, he became excited, and when talking, used language which convinced Mr. Rodgers that he was not exactly what he professed to be. Arriving at Paducah, Mr. R. called the attention of the Provost Marshal to the circumstance, when the old man was identified as a colonel in the Confederate Army. He was taken into custody, and is still at Paducah. He was at the Bull Run Battle.—Louisville Journal, Nov. 30.

JOHN MILLIKEN, who was formerly the Postmaster at Paducah, has met a deserved fate. Since secession was first planned in Kentucky he has been among the foremost in the rebellion, and when the Federal troops were about to occupy his town he left for Mayfield, and has since then been unscrupulous and unsparing in his persecution of every one who was loyal to his country. On Tuesday of last week he entered a house where he found two Union men, and commenced in the most vituperative language to threaten them, and, having lashed himself into fury, he finally struck one of them. As quick as the thunder follows the lightning's flash, the report of a musket was heard, and the ruffian received its entire contents, killing him instantly. This terrible retribution will, it is hoped, have the effect to deter others from the commission of similar outrages. While the Union men in that vicinity are disposed to be peaceable, the secessionists are violent, turbulent, and aggressive. Our friends are extremely anxious to reach Paducah, that they may join Col. Williams' regiment, but the rebels will not permit them to leave their homes, and they subject them to all kinds of indignities. The Colonel has four or five complete companies, and they are a terror to the secessionists, because they will be able to identify them and bear witness against them for their ruthless deeds. In view of the great importance of having a full regiment recruited from the First district, we hope the Military Board will make an exceptional case in favor of Col. Williams, and give him an extension of time instead of consolidating his companies into some other regiment. They know every foot of ground in the infected district south of the Tennessee River, and in a short time they will be able to clear it of every sneaking rebel who is now committing depredations. The fate of Milliken shows that the Unionists there are resolute, and they only need a little more strength and organization to protect themselves fully.—Louisville Journal, Nov. 25.

"DAVIS IS DEAD."*

BY "F."

With his hands by the blood of slain thousands made red,
And the signet of Hell on his brow,
The branded arch-traitor now sleeps with the dead,
By the arm of Jehovah laid low.

He has bartered his soul for the sceptre of State,
Which to him proved the thing of a day;
And the Union still lives for a destiny great,
And will stand till Earth passes away;

For the great God of Hosts watches over our land,
And protects it from every foe;
And He'll ever crush those, with omnipotent hand,
Who would Freedom's fair fabric o'erthrow.

* Written while the report of his death was in circulation and fully credited.

NATIONAL PRISONERS.—A writer in the Savannah (Georgia) Republican asks the question: "How shall we dispose of the prisoners?"—and answers it as follows:

"Let the Quartermaster-General of the Confederate States issue his proclamation stating that the prisoners will be hired out to the highest bidder for some specified time, and in such number as the hirer may desire. I know of a gentleman of this city, a rice planter, who would gladly take two hundred of the Yankees on his plantation to build up and mend the dams of his fields. He is more desirous of doing this, he says, as the Northern gazettes have long asserted that we can do without negro labor, and he is anxious of testing the question. One good black driver to every forty Yankees would insure good order and lively work among them."

MRS. L. VIRGINIA SMITH, a lady of decidedly literary talent and reputation, has written a series of lectures, appropriate and relating to the times, which it is her intention to deliver through the principal cities in the South—the proceeds to be appropriated to the purchase of winter clothing for the Confederate soldiers in Missouri.—Balt. American, Sept. 4.

BORGIA AT THE SOUTH.—The rebels are repeating their attempts at poisoning. The Louisville Democrat makes the following statement: "While a young man named Bennett, member of Captain Dill's Company of the Twenty-fourth Indiana regiment, was walking backward and forward as sentinel, outside of Lafayette Park, St. Louis, near the entrance, he was approached by a young man, who, with a friendly face, asked the sentinel if he did not feel weary, to which the soldier replied, 'Yes, I do feel a little tired,' when the kind-faced stranger, after a word or two of further conversation, asked him if he would not accept a piece of his pie. The sentinel thanked him with heartfelt gratitude, and ate the pie. Shortly afterward he was seized with convulsions, and was carried by his comrades to the hospital tent. The physician of the regiment found that he was poisoned with strychnine."

One of these rebel Borgias, however, met a sudden fate, a few days since, in the Federal camp at Buckley's Town, Maryland. A correspondent tells the story:

"Yesterday the owner of the farm on which the army is encamped was seized and shot without trial. He raged fearfully when they quartered on his land, and utterly refused to sell his hay at any price, and finally carried his spite so far as to attempt to poison a spring from which the soldiers obtained a large supply. He was arrested in the act, with the damning evidences of his guilt upon him, and was shot without benefit of clergy."—Alb. Journal, Sept. 3.

A SPARTAN MOTHER.—Among those who were on board the Kate Cassel to take leave of the New Boston boys, was Mrs. Sanders, the aged mother of Mr. Mahlon Sanders, who went with the company. Five of her sons have volunteered to fight for their country, and when some of them asked how she felt under the trial of parting with all her boys, the grand old mother replied that she only regretted that she had not five more to lay upon the altar of her country.—Oleto (Ill.) Record.

THERE is a George B. McClellan, who is an officer in a Mississippi regiment, and who bears a marked resemblance in appearance to Gen. Geo. B. McClellan.—Boston Transcript, Sept. 4.

A PRESBYTERIAN clergyman, while walking the deck of a steamer at St. John's, N. B., where secessionism had considerable footing, noticing the American flag flying from the masthead of a ship, tauntingly said to Col. Favor, "Why don't you take a slice off that flag, since you have lost a portion of your country?" Yankee-like, the Colonel quickly replied, "Why don't you tear a leaf from your Bible, because a part of your church have fallen from grace?" The clergyman had no more to say on that subject.

BLACK COMPANIES IN ARKANSAS.—The Fort Smith Times, of the 10th September, states that two companies of Southern black men have been formed in that neighborhood. They are thorough Southern men, not armed, but drilling to take the field, and say that they are determined to fight for their masters and their homes.

AT FORT HATTERAS, when the white flag appeared, cheer upon cheer went up from the fleet. Our tars, who had entered into the contest with their whole soul, regarded the captives as their game, which they bagged with the utmost enthusiasm. One gunner, who lost his rammer overboard, was in the water after it in a jiffy. He returned with it before he was missed, swearing that he wasn't going to have his gun disgraced for want of a rammer.—Balt. American, Sept. 3.

INCIDENTS OF HATTERAS.—When the first salutations were made between the United States officers and Commodore Barron, he asked, "How many were killed on the fleet?" The answer was, "None." "How many were wounded?" "None," was the reply. "Why," he exclaimed, "you astonish me. I thought that to capture these forts it would cost a thousand lives, and it would be cheap at that."

When Commodore Barron and his officers descended to the deck of the flag-ship Minnesota, where Commodore Stringham was stationed on the quarter-deck to receive him, Gen. Butler presented Barron to the gallant old Commodore, saying, "Commodore Barron! Commodore Stringham." The latter, raising himself up to his full height, looked the traitor straight in the eye, and barely inclining his head, replied, "I have seen Mr. Barron before."

Barron, who has always prided himself on the hauteur monde, fairly winced under the whole volume of honest sarcasm contained in that look and sentence. It was a touching sight. On the one side stood the manly old tar, who will die as he has lived, under that glorious flag that has flung its crimson folds over his head on every sea, waiting to tread the shore and receive the grateful plaudits and loving thanks of a mighty nation. Opposite to him stood the base traitor who deserted his post in the very hour when his services were most needed by his country. What must have been the tumultuous emotions in his breast! Scorned by his former friend of a lifetime, the object of contempt and execration to the humblest coal-passer on a ship where once his proud form and graceful manner had been followed by the devotion of the entire ship's company. It will be remembered that Barron sunk the obstructions in Norfolk harbor to prevent the egress of the United States ships before Virginia joined the rebels.

and yet his pitiful plea is that he had to go with his State. Did he have to steal millions of property from a nation that had fed and clothed him, and reaped honors upon him, and to steal it before his State had made a step towards leaving the Union?—Phila. Inquirer, Sept. 3.

A UNION man flogged a secessionist in Wyoming, Pa., recently, for expressing treasonable and riotous sentiments. The latter brought the case before a Justice of the Peace, who decided that the flogging was a constitutional act under the circumstances.—Fitzgerald's City Item, May 18.

ANECDOTE OF FLOYD.—The following anecdote is told of Floyd, the great Virginian: A few years since a gentleman residing in Richmond, Va., gave a large dinner party to some distinguished men, among whom was Floyd, then a rising man, but whose personal appearance indicated neither mental nor physical superiority, he being a puffy, dark-complexioned man, with crispy, wiry hair. Among the distinguished guests were two Indian chiefs, returning from a visit to their "Great Father," the President—magnificent specimens of their race. Floyd, thinking to compliment them and make them at their ease, told them in a condescending manner, that he could boast of Indian blood in his veins, being a descendant of Pocahontas. One of the chiefs, drawing himself up majestically and disdainfully, and with a look of contempt upon his noble countenance, said in broken English, "Ugh! no! no! nigur! nigur!" The confusion and dismay of Floyd was complete, and it required all the boasted politeness of Richmond to keep the other guests from exploding with laughter.—Springfield Republican.

A PLEASANT VOCABULARY.—A member of the "Tiger Killers," of Louisiana, gives the New Orleans True Delta a very highly colored picture of the exploits of that fierce regiment, at the battle of Bull Run, in the course of which he says:

"Our Lieutenant, old Tom Adrian, than whom a braver man never wore a hair, shouted out, 'Tigers, go in once more—go in, my sons; I'll be greatly, gloriously God d—d if the s—s of b—s can ever whip the Tigers.' Our blood was on fire, life was valueless; the boys fired one volley, then rushed upon the foe," &c.

Such language would naturally "fire the blood" of most men. We should like to know if this is the ordinary vocabulary of the rebel officers.—N. Y. Times, Sept. 5.

PATRIOTISM OF PHILADELPHIANS.—At a meeting of the People's party, held at Philadelphia, Sept. 4th, allusion being made to the present war and the necessity of sustaining the Government firmly, a motion was made and adopted, amid general applause, to appoint a committee to wait on Alderman Patchell and request him to administer the oath of allegiance to the whole body of the citizens collectively. The alderman responded with alacrity. The citizens all stood up, with hats off and hands uplifted, and with solemnity and emphasis the oath was administered. At the close there was an outburst of vehement cheering. The meeting evinced the determination to assert the authority of the Republic everywhere, and exact loyalty from every man as a bounden duty.—N. Y. Commercial, Sept. 5.

GEN. McCLELLAN'S SONG.—A musical lady friend has made the discovery that Gen. McClellan's speech is well adapted to go as a song to the John Brown tune. Now, as the soldiers will sing that tune in preference to any other, we think it highly desirable they should be furnished with better words to it; and who knows but they may be willing to adopt this, which is at least unexceptionable on the score of taste and sentiment. Gen. McClellan is fairly entitled to the reward offered by the National Song Committee.

We have had our last retreat,
We have had our last retreat,
We have had our last retreat,—
McClellan's marching on.
Glory, halle—hallelujah! &c.

We have seen our last defeat,
We have seen our last defeat,
We have seen our last defeat,—
McClellan's marching on.
Glory, halle—hallelujah! &c.

You stand by me, and I'll stand by you,
You stand by me, and I'll stand by you,
You stand by me, and I'll stand by you,
And victory shall be ours.
Glory, halle—hallelujah! &c.

—Boston Evening Transcript, Sept. 13.

A REMINISCENCE OF JEFF. DAVIS.—I never saw the so-called President of the so-called Southern Confederacy but once; but the circumstances were such as to distinctly impress the man's character, as revealed by that authentic medium, natural language, upon my mind. A few days before the inauguration of General Taylor, a lady of Washington who had been a schoolmate of his daughter, invited us to accompany her on a visit of welcome to her old friend. The greeting between them was most cordial; and being introduced to the family of the President elect under such auspices, having no political object to gain by the acquaintance, we soon became on terms of familiar intercourse with the good old man, and improved opportunities to converse with him, not so much because of his antecedents and actual position, nor on account of any special interest which he himself inspired upon a superficial observation, but because a friend with whom I had been in the habit of discussing character had often entertained me with an account of a delightful sojourn at Prairie du Chien in midwinter, when, during a Western tour, he was the guest of General Taylor, whose conscientious and modest as well as patient and intrepid character he had learned to regard with the highest respect and affection.

It was one of those anomalous social experiences nowhere realized except in this land of transition and of contrasts, to hear the simple-hearted old general talk of his impressions, feelings, and purposes, amid the intrigues of office-hunters, and the ostentation of fashionable and the excitement of political life at Washington on the eve of his inauguration. Not a man of that eager and restless throng seemed more unconscious and unpretending than the one about to be installed as the head of the nation. There was an almost ludicrous contrast between the homely costume and manners, the simple tastes and habits, and the frank and modest conversation of the central figure, and the reserve or pretension of those surrounding him. He seemed literally "dragged along in the procession" of political aspirants, as Lamb complained was his fate in the march of the new world. More like a martyr than a victor, he "bore his faculties so meekly," that it seemed as cruel to the man to wrest him from his native sphere, as inappropriate and undesirable for the country to place in the Presidential chair one whose aptitudes were almost exclusively for the post of a frontier soldier or thrifty agriculturist. It needed no prescient insight to anticipate that he would become the tool of designing politicians, or the victim of unaccustomed responsibilities.

But these considerations only made him an object of sympathy to a looker-on, and increased the interest to observe from day to day the phenomena of that peaceful transfer of executive power, which, before the present climax of treasonable violence, has been one of the grandest tests and triumphs of free institutions. A well-informed habitué of Washington society, behind all the political scenes and familiar with all the social agencies of the Capital, kept us regularly informed of all that was going on, and interpreted what was perplexing. It was through this invaluable cicerone that I was notified when and where the committee appointed by Congress would wait upon the President elect, and announce to him his election by the people as Chief Magistrate. It was doubtless with a courteous intent that Jefferson Davis was made chairman of this committee,—his previous domestic relations with General Taylor suggesting him as an acceptable medium; though, had the public been as well informed as the private mind, such a choice would have been the last adopted. The duty in question is, of course, only a form, to be fulfilled with the gravity and the grace adapted to the occasion, but calling for no display of rhetoric, and no assumption of official dignity; it is simply a constitutional observance, whereby the representatives of the nation testify to the result of the ballot, and state the same to the successful candidate.

General Taylor's want of oratorical accomplishments, his aversion to display, his modest demeanor, and his conscientiousness, were known as well as his bravery and his patriotism, and would have been respected by a thorough gentleman in the discharge of this simple duty, which needed for its performance only quiet courtesy and respectful consideration. Instead thereof, Jefferson Davis, entering the hotel parlor, where General Taylor was seated, with the aspect of a kindly, honest old farmer, paused about eight feet from him, threw back his shoulders, turned out his right foot, and, with precisely the air of a complacent sophomore, began a loud harangue about the "highest office in the gift of a free people," the "responsibility of an oath," and other rhetorical platitudes; the needless pitch of his voice and dogmatism of his emphasis, the complacency and elaboration of his manner and assumption of his tone, in connection with the meek attitude and deprecatory air of his auditor, made the tableau resemble a prosecutor and prisoner at the bar. The difference of age and the former relations of the parties, (Davis having by a runaway match married General Taylor's daughter, who died a few months after,) and the utter novelty of the good old man's position, made the scene, to say the least, a flagrant violation of good taste not less than good feeling.

It was one of those unconscious and therefore authentic revelations of character, which reveal a man's disposition and temper better than a biography. Though ostensibly doing him honor, the speaker seemed to half defy the gray-haired soldier, whose eyes were cast down, and whose hands were listlessly folded—to challenge, as it were, with his fluent self-confidence the uneloquent but intrepid man of action, and make him feel how alien to his habits and capacity was the arena to which popular enthusiasm had lifted him. In a word, Jefferson Davis then and there appeared like the incarnation of rhetorical impudence; the style of the man was presumptuous and aggressive, and no delicacy of perception or fine instinct of humanity tempered his arrogant ambition; while the modest, patient, faithful old hero made the inference and the impression more vivid and repulsive; and the recent and recreant career of Jefferson Davis—the bombastic mendacity, as well as the impudent and vulgar tone of his public communications—make this little episode foreshadow that impersonation of reckless audacity which confronts, with brazen aggressiveness, the free people of the United States.—"Y," in the Boston Transcript, Oct. 15.

GENERAL McCLELLAN'S SPEECH.—A correspondent takes the poetic license of thus paraphrasing General McClellan's recent patriotic address to his soldiers:

We've had our last retreat,
We've seen our last defeat;
You stand by me, and I will stand by you;
Like Lane instructed, we will "put it through."

—N. Y. Herald, Sept. 12.

RATHER SARCASTIC.—A good story was told by Gen. Butler, a short time since, in Washington. The General, speaking of the farce of administering the oath to captured rebels, and then turning them loose, related an incident that occurred at Fortress Monroe. A scouting party having captured and brought in a live rattlesnake, a question arose as to the disposal of the dangerous customer, when a partially intoxicated soldier hiccupped, "D—n him! swear him in, and let him go!"

Sept. 1.—The New Orleans Picayune says the heavy growth of grass in some of the streets in that city "would pay the mower for his trouble."

St. Louis, Sept. 11.—Mrs. Willow and a free colored woman named Hannah Courtena, were arrested yesterday for selling poisoned pies to the soldiers at Camp Benton.—N. Y. World, Sept. 12.

THIRTY-FOUR.

BY REV. S. F. SMITH, D. D.

Fling out the banner on the breeze;
Shake out each starry fold;
Summon the stalwart soldiers forth,
The mighty, and the bold—
The bell of Freedom from its tower
Its solemn call has tolled.

The sound sweeps wildly o'er the land,
Sweeps o'er the bounding sea;
It echoes, from each mountain-top,
The anthem of the free;
It snaps the chain which sin has forged
It sings for liberty.

Marshal the legions for the fight,
The youthful and the brave;
Stand for the noble and the right,
The glorious Union save:
Stand for the cause for which their blood
Our patriot fathers gave.

Dread not the angry foeman's rage;
Dread not the tempest's crash;
Dread not the billows, though the cliffs
Along the shore they lash;
Dread not the awful thunder's roar,
Nor lightnings' piercing flash.

Above the cloud, the brilliant sky
Shines in immortal blue;
And light, like Heaven's approving smile,
Streams, in its glory, through;
Be patient, till the strife is o'er;
Have faith to dare and do.

With willing heart Heaven's high behest
Fulfil without alarm;
The foe has planted for our hand,
And nursed the conqueror's palm;
And He that bade the sea "Be still,"
The stormy waves will calm.

Then fling the banner to the wind—
The emblem of the free;
Strike the sweet harp-tones that proclaim
The reign of Liberty;
And bid the melody rebound
From every trembling key.

And count each star that studs the blue,
Whate'er the past has been,
A wayward wanderer, welcomed back,
To fill its place again;—
A loving band of sister-lights,
Just like the Old Thirteen.

Strike not one jewel from the crest
The loving mother wore;
Reset the gems upon her breast,
Each where it stood before.
Clasp in the glorious cynosure,
The whole dear Thirty-Four.

THE PORT ROYAL DANCE.

BY R. S. BURK,

A Seaman on Board of the Vandalia.

Behold, our glorious banner floats gaily in the air;
But four hours since, base traitors swore we could not plant it there;
But brave Dupont he led us on, to fight the vaunting
foe,
And soon the rebel standard was in the dust laid low.

When we were seen advancing, they laughed with foolish pride,
Saying that soon our Northern fleet they'd sink beneath the tide;
And with their guns trained carefully, they waited
our advance,
And the gallant Wabash soon struck up the music for the dance.

The Susquehanna next in line delivered her broad-side;
With deadly aim each shot was sent, and well each gun was plied;
And still our gallant ships advanced, and each one,
as she passed,
Poured in her deadly messengers, and foes fell thick and fast.

Each ship advanced in order, each commander wore a suile,
Until the famed Vandalia brought up the rear in style;
And as our guns were shortest, we balanced to the right,
Which brought us to the enemy, the closest in the fight.
Then round the room (Port Royal bay) we took a Highland fling,
And showed them in Fort Walker what loud music
we could sing;
And thus we poured in our broadsides, which brought their courage low,
And o'er the rebel batteries soon our Union flag did flow.

Three cheers for gallant Haggarty—he led us safely through;
And three for our loved Whiting—he is the real true
blue;
Success to every officer who fought with us that
day;
Together may we pass unscathed through many a gallant fray.
A health to every gallant tar who did his duty well;
Peace to the ashes of the dead, who, nobly fighting, fell;
'Twas in a glorious cause they died, the Union to maintain—
We who are left, when called upon, will try it o'er again.

HYMN FOR THE NATIONAL FAST,

SEPTEMBER 26, 1861.

With humbled hearts, great God, this day,
Before Thy throne we sorrowing stand;
O hear our prayer, forgive our sins,
And turn Thy judgments from our land.

Our fathers placed their trust in Thee,
And Thou didst lead them like a flock;
Through Thee they stemm'd the wintry waves,
Through Thee they braved the battle's shock.

Be to the sons once more, O God,
As to their sires Thou wert so long;
Revive our faith, rebuke our fears,
And let us in Thy might be strong.

The clouds which thicken o'er our path,
'Tis Thine alone to chase away;
O! show the brightness of Thy face,
And turn our darkness into day.

Pour forth Thy Spirit, gracious Lord,
To help us in this hour of need;
Appease the rage which rends our land,
And bid its wounds no longer bleed.

In vain we burnish sword or shield,
Without a blessing from on high;
If radiant with no smile from Thee,
In vain our banners sweep the sky.

Give counsel to our chosen chiefs;
Give courage to our marshall'd bands;
Let prayer, and faith, and trust in God,
Inflame their hearts, and nerve their hands.

In no resentment let them strike;
No hatred stain their holy cause;
But consecrated be each arm
To "Union, Freedom, and the Laws."

And O! in Thine own time, restore
Good-will and peace from sea to sea;
And in each brother's breast revive
The love that springs from love to Thee.

So may our land, from danger freed,
With one consent Thy mercy own;
And every knee and heart be bent
In grateful homage at Thy throne.

"Not unto us—Not unto us,"
In joyful chorus then we'll sing;
"But all the glory, all the praise,
Be unto Thee, our God and King!"

THE CHARGE OF THE TWENTY-SEVEN,

AT DAVIS' CREEK.

BY RICHARD KIRKE.

The brave lieutenant then
Unsheathed his ready blade,
And cried, "Now charge, my men!
Now charge you false brigade!"
A moment, breathless still,
They halted on the hill,
And mutely turned to Heaven;
Then on the foe,
Who lay below,
Swooped down the TWENTY-SEVEN!

They charge with fire and steel;
They thunder o'er the plain;
The rebel legions reel—
The ground is piled with slain;
The stricken foes divide,
Like Jordan's fearful tide,
Smote by the hand of Heaven;
And right and left,
Their ranks are cleft
Down by the TWENTY-SEVEN!

They are but twenty-seven,
The foe are thousands strong,
And yet their swords have riven
A pathway through the throng;
But on that crimson plain,
Four fearless heroes slain,
Have passed from earth to heaven;
And never more,
Through death and gore,
Will ride the TWENTY-SEVEN!

As once the prophet rose,
On flaming coursers driven,

So passed they from the foes,
Upborne on fire to heaven;
And now, to after-times,
Like solemn vesper chimes,
Their death and deeds are given;
And freemen long,
In tale and song,
Will laud the TWENTY-SEVEN.

MASON WORK.

BY "MAJOR."

One more unfortunate!
Poor F. F. V.!
Rashly importunate,
Caught out at sea!

Take him up tenderly,
Abraham L. ;
Handle him gingerly—
No one can tell
What risks we encounter,
In thus rudely chasin'
The pompous ambassador,
C. S. A. Mason!

Ah, the proud Minister
Cometh to grief;
With prospects so brilliant,
How wonderful brief
His life diplomatic—
All smoothly it runs,
Till over his pathway
It bloweth great guns!

A sorry denouement
This, brave F. F. V. ;
Thy fondest hopes blasted,
Thy plans all at sea!
You dreamed not of capture,
While with Johnny Bull;
You thought if we tried it,
We'd have our hands full!
But when Uncle Samuel
Appeared on your track,
And gave you his thunder,
To which you knocked under,
O! is it a wonder
You were taken aback?

O! poor Master Mason,
There are sermons in stones—
Don't they speak to you yonder
In eloquent tones?
How'er mortar-fying
To "go to the wall,"
We think we've discovered
Your Forte after all!
We send you to Warren,
Your station to fill,
As Minister Foreign
Nigh old Bunker Hill!
You always was warrin'
In public, they say—
We hope you'll keep quiet
Where Dimmick has sway.

THE NORTHMEN ARE COMING.

BY GEORGE FERRY.

The Northmen are coming, Oho! oho!
 The Northmen are coming, Oho! oho!
 The Northmen, the Northmen,
 The warriors of Freedom!
 The Northmen are coming, Oho! oho!

Their star-spangled banners I see, I see!
 The plume-crested horsemen I see, I see!
 Down mountain and valley the hosts are streaming,
 And shouting the battle-cry, "One and Free."
 The Northmen are coming, &c.

The peal of their bugles I hear, I hear!
 The clangor of trumpets I hear, I hear!
 The banners outflame like the blazing morn,
 O'er billows of bayonet, sword, and spear.
 The Northmen are coming, &c.

With rattle of musket they come, they come!
 With thunder of cannon they come, they come!
 With tempest of fire, and storm of steel,
 To drive out the traitors from Freedom's home.
 The Northmen are coming, &c.

The boom of their cannon is Tyranny's knell;
 Wherever they battle shall Liberty dwell;
 They fight for the holiest hope of man;
 They triumph with Washington, Bruce, and Tell.
 The Northmen are coming, &c.

They come with the banners our sires unfurled,
 Unfurled for the exile, the bondman, the world;
 And Heaven shall speed their victorious march,
 Till Liberty's foes to the dust be hurled.
 The Northmen are coming, &c.

THE BRAVE AT HOME.

BY T. BUCHANAN READ.

The maid who binds her warrior's sash
 With smile that well her pain dissembles,
 The while, beneath her drooping lash,
 One starry tear-drop hangs and trembles.
 Though Heaven alone records the tear,
 And Fame shall never know her story,
 Her heart has shed a drop as dear
 As ever dewed the field of glory.

The wife who girds her husband's sword,
 'Mid little ones who weep or wonder,
 And bravely speaks the cheering word—
 What though her heart be rent asunder?
 Doomed, nightly, in her dreams, to hear
 The bolts of war around him rattle,
 Hath shed as sacred blood as e'er
 Was poured upon the plain of battle.

The mother who conceals her grief,
 While to her breast her son she presses,
 Then breathes a few brave words and brief,
 Kissing the patriot brow she blesses;

With no one but her secret God
 To know the pain that weighs upon her,
 Sheds holy blood as e'er the sod
 Received on Freedom's field of honor.

THE RAT-HOLE SQUADRON.

BY P. REMSEN STRONG.

Steadily, grimly, o'er the waters,
 Moves a veteran fleet:
 Steadily, grimly steering Southward,
 Strangest doom to meet!

Laden down to their very gunwales,
 Groaning 'neath their freight,
 Food for sport to the mocking billows—
 Ministers of Fate!

Side by side, like a band of brothers
 Knit by a common vow,
 Steadily, slowly moving Southward,
 Points each weary prow.

All, from main-truck down to keelson,
 Seamed with ghastly scars,
 Canvas sere, and straining cordage,
 Rotting planks and spars.

Racked by thousand fierce encounters,
 Worn by tempest-shocks,
 Crippled by the raging billows,
 Treacherous shoals and rocks.

Many a year, among the icebergs,
 By the wild Northern light,
 They have chased the ocean-monsters
 In their desperate flight.

Fierce pursuit and boisterous triumph:
 Swift each glad return:
 Echoing shouts would hail the headland
 Where the watchfires burn.

Burthened now with many winters,
 Shattered wrecks of Time,
 Mightier service shall they render,
 Than in proudest prime.

Damming up a venomous fountain;
 Hemming Treason in;
 Forcing back its loathsome current,
 Foul and black with sin.

Teaching wide the bitter lesson,
 (Wholesome, though 'tis late)—
Rebel hordes and noxious vermin
 Find a common fate.

O'er them now may roll the billows
 Once they proudly rode;
 Sea-birds shriek to see them reeling,
 Plunging with their load.

Steadily, grimly moving Southward,
 Justice wings their flight:
 He, who shaped our Nation's future,
 Guides their course aright.

MOVE ON THE COLUMNS!

BY "W. D. G."

Very Respectfully Inscribed to "The Powers that Be," at Washington and Elsewhere.

I.

Move on the columns! Why delay?
Our soldiers sicken in their camps;
The summer heats, the autumn damps,
Have sapp'd their vigor day by day;
And now the winter comes apace,
With death-chills in its cold embrace,
More fatal than the battle-fray.

II.

Move on the columns! Hesitate
No longer what to plan or do:
Our cause is good—our men are true—
This fight is for the flag, the State,
The Union, and the hopes of man;
And Right will end what Wrong began,
For God the right will vindicate.

III.

Move on the columns! If the land
Is locked by winter, take the sea;
No possible barrier can be
So fatal to a rightful stand,
As wavering purpose when at bay.
This way, or that—"at once! to-day!"
Were worth ten thousand men at hand.

IV.

Move on the columns! With the sweep
Of eagles let them strike the foe.
The hurricane lays the forest low
Momentum wings the daring leap
That clears the chasm: the lightning stroke
Shivers the wind-defying oak:
The earthquake rocks th' eternal steep.

V.

Move on the columns! Why have sprung
Our myriad hosts, from hill and plain?
Leaving the sickle in the grain—
Closing the harvest-hymn half sung—
Half filled the granary and the mow,
Unturned the sod, untouched the plough
Scythes rusting where they last were swung.

VI.

Move on the columns! They are here
To found anew a people's faith;
To save from treason and from death
A nation which they all revere;
And on each manly brow is set
A purpose, such as never yet
Was thwarted, when, as now, sincere.

VII.

Move on the columns! Earth contains
No guerdon for the good and free,
Like that which bless'd our Liberty;
And while its banner still remains
The symbol of united power,
Nor man nor fiend can tell the hour
In which its star-lit glory wanes.

VIII.

Move on the columns strong and bright!
Strike down the sacrilegious hands
That clutch and wield the battle-brands
Which menace with their Wrong our Right:
Words now are wasted: glittering steel
Alone can make this last appeal:
They've willed it so—and we must fight.

IX.

Move on the columns! If they go
By ways they had not thought to take,
To fields we had not meant to make,
Or if they bring unthought-of woe,
Let that which woke the fiery wrath
Fall, scorch'd and blackening in its path.
Not man but God may stay the blow.
Move on the columns!

THE PICKET.

BY MARIE.

Slow across the blue Potomac fades the dim November light,
And the darkness, like a mantle, folds the tented field from sight;
Through the shadowed wood beside me breaks the wind with quivering moan,
Floating, sighing,
Falling, dying,
As I hold my watch alone.

Forward, backward, stern and fearless, till the moon-beam's dancing ray
Breaks in many a gleaming arrow from my bayonet's point away;
So I pace the picket lonely—but, apart from mortal sight,
Watch I'm keeping
With the sleeping
Loved ones far away to-night.

On the morrow comes Thanksgiving, when, from households far and wide,
Round their home the children gather—seek once more the old fireside;
Fill once more the vacant places, that they left so long ago,
Self-relying,
Proudly trying
All life's unknown joy and woe.

On the morrow comes Thanksgiving, not as long ago it came,
Bright, without a shade of sorrow lingering on its good old name;
War has waved his crimson banner, and beneath its blood-stains rest
All his glory,
Dim and gory,
Laid on many a lifeless breast.

Wife and child, and aged mother, wake at morn to bend the knee,
And around the hearthstone glowing supplicate their God for me;

Near my vacant chair they gather, blending tears amid their prayers—
God will hear them;
And anear them,
Will my spirit kneel with theirs!

Nor is darkness all around us;—we can thank our God for might;
For the strength which He has given still to struggle for the right;
For the soul so grandly beating in the nation's onward way;
For the spirit
We inherit,
On this new Thanksgiving day!

* * * * *

Still the blue Potomac ripples like a silver thread below,
And amid the sullen darkness rises high the camp-
fire's glow;
So I pace the picket lonely, while, apart from mortal sight,
Watch I'm keeping
With the sleeping
Loved ones far at home to-night.

'76. FROM MY WINDOW. '61.

BY M. H. COBB.

Outward from the dusty city, far beyond the bustling streets,
Through the hazy atmosphere, quivering with the summer heats,
I am gazing where the heavens bend to touch the valley's rim,
And the farmer's humble cottage seems a spectre,
pale and dim;
Where the roseate, fragrant clover, where the yellowing harvest grew,
Where June flowers and tender grasses treasured up
the jewelled dew—
On those glowing fields and meadows war has set its iron heel,
And the eye is pained and dazzled by the deadly gleam of steel.

In the grove and leafless forest gleams the many-tented camp,
And the russet fields are shaken by the dull and measured tramp
Of a mighty host of freemen, true of heart and strong of limb—
Men who learned to love their country from their mothers' cradle-hymn!
From their pleasant Northern firesides, from their children and their wives,
Come they to redeem the nation, if it need be, with their lives!
Leavened by the martyr spirit, lo, in eager hosts they come!
Never were such legions marshalled in the palmy days of Rome!

Think they of our birth-time struggle?—how our fathers gathered then
From the fields and from the workshops—few, but stern, determined men!

Freedom's champions were fewer, but their hearts were strong and true,
And their pulses coursed as madly when the trump
of battle blew;
Freedom's workers were not many, but their arms
were tried and strong,
And their souls, less kindly nurtured, chafed as sorely under wrong.
Grand old days of inspiration! Do we witness their return?
Does their deathless love of freedom in our hearts as fiercely burn?
With a faith that never falters, can we watch the ebb and flow
Of the battle-tides, as martyrs did a hundred years ago?

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20, 1861.

THE Memphis Appeal contains the following items of Texas news: In the Texas House of Representatives a resolution was adopted instructing the sergeant-at-arms to remove from the beak of the eagle, over the Speaker's chair, the United States motto,
"E Pluribus Unum." We notice since that the obnoxious motto is absent.

A joint resolution has been introduced, and will doubtless pass, approving of the promptness of the President in providing for retaliation, in case of the execution of the condemned privateers by the Lincoln Government.—Louisville Journal, Dec. 24.

RICHMOND, Dec. 19.—Hon. Charles James Faulkner and Honorable Alfred Ely—one a quasi prisoner and the other a real one—had a very pleasant interview yesterday at the Confederate States Military Prison, where Mr. Faulkner called to see Mr. Ely.
We are told that there was great rejoicing in the prison, but whether it was confined to the breast of Mr. Ely, or shared by his fellow-captives, we were not informed. The circumstances that induced the Lincoln Government to allow Mr. Faulkner, whom they had arrested without warrant of law and without a shadow of pretext to justify so flagrant a breach of individual right, to come here, are known. The condition exacted was that he should procure the liberation of Mr. Ely in exchange for his own, or return and submit himself to the rigors of a captivity as hard as it is unjust. So far as Mr. Ely is individually concerned, he has proved himself a man of kindly disposition and amiable impulses since here, and on his own account we could find no objection to his being returned to the "bosom of his family," if he would stay there, and not attempt to influence the minds of the fanatics of the North by his harangues.
His own assurances have been given that he will not,
but the question is, will Old Abe and his sable crowd allow him to keep so commendable a resolution?
We think not.—Fredericksburg Recorder, Dec. 23.

INCIDENTS OF GUYANDOTTE.—That citizens, in the late "massacre," fired from their houses upon our men, seems to be well attested—at least from J. W.
Hite's, (now prisoner at Columbus;) and our men say that the Scott women fired upon them! E. A.
Smith (prisoner) is reported seen in the streets with a revolver, firing on our men. John S. Everett, who lives below the Guyandotte River, on that side, with his gun in his hand, was active in shooting men as they came to the shore in swimming across. Capt.
Wm. Turner, an old and respectable citizen of Wayne County, a very candid man apparently, was in the fight, and escaped by mounting his horse and dashing through their lines, but was obliged to abandon his horse at the bank of the river; was for a long time lying in the mud at the water's edge and in the water, with a part of his face out in the shade of a tree, while they were searching for him. He heard them shout across: "John, O John Everett, shoot them d—d devils coming out of the water there," and two guns went off. "There's another just out behind the tree there." "Oh, I've sunk that d—d Yankee." Another was shot while crawling in the mud, near where Turner lay concealed in the water, and there was a yell, "I've got one of the d—d dad's scalps, and a first-rate Enfield rifle." Turner afterward swam the river, and gives us some of these items:

A reliable citizen of Cabell County reports that he heard the rebels boast, on the return to Barboursville, that they had thrown eight or nine wounded men off the bridge into the river.

When the rebel cavalry left Guyandotte, twenty-one secession women, all with their secession aprons on, paraded and cheered the victors.

They captured at Guyandotte, 98 Enfield rifles and 32 horses; but themselves lost in the fight 19 horses.

Of their men, they lost 11 killed, about 18 wounded, 2 of them since dead. Capt. Huddleston, Kanawha Rangers, was the captain killed and buried at Ceredo. The captain of the Rockbridge Rangers was mortally wounded, and in a dying condition on Tuesday night.

On leaving Guyandotte, Col. Jenkins remarked to a reliable citizen there, "We did not make much by coming; the losses are about equal!" He made the same remark again in the hearing of Col. Whaley, before he escaped.

Henry Clay Pate, of Kansas notoriety, was there as a captain, and it was he and his men that captured Col. Whaley.—Ironton Register.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Troy Times, in describing the recent skirmish near Newmarket Bridge, Dec. 22, says: "The most singular thing connected with this skirmish, was the appearance of a woman mounted upon a beautiful horse, riding fearlessly in the thickest part of the fight, and report says that she rode far in advance of the rebel cavalry, and dashing up to the captain of Company G, Twentieth regiment, discharged a pistol at him; when he turned around, she smiled, and rode off. The captain says he could easily have ended her life had he felt disposed, but he was too much of a gentleman to shoot a woman. But the most provoking of all was the appearance of a company of niggers among the rebel infantry, and three of those wounded, from the Twentieth regiment, were shot by these black rascals. We can fight men, and even niggers, but we can't fight women, though I think if this rebel horsewoman, or any more female cavalry, make their appearance in another fight, they had better keep out of range of our rifles."

A LETTER from Richmond, Va., dated Dec. 12, says: "The object of the Nashville's visit to Europe appears to puzzle Lincoln and his friends to a considerable degree. Certainly there must be something intended of importance, something to damage them, or the undertaking to run the blockade and proceed across the Atlantic would not have been adventured.

The taking out of Confederate naval officers, wherewith to supply commanders for first-class frigates to be purchased in Europe, does not seem a perfectly satisfactory explanation. Those who know Captain Pegram would not be surprised to hear of any brilliant achievement being performed by him, of which the Nashville is capable, before he reports himself again to the Navy Department in this city. If the good people of some New England seaport town should wake up one of these fine mornings, and find their homes in flames, they may console themselves with reading of the exploits of one John Paul Jones of the long, long ago.

"It is now Thursday evening. Last week at the same time I felt very well assured that before set of sun to-day great events would have happened all around and very near us. Yet every thing is quiet as before at the critical points on the border. Not a word more of the 40,000 Yankees that landed at Newport News. Nothing farther of the advance upon Winchester. All serene at Centreville. Some artillery practice at transports attempting to go by the batteries at Evansport—reported sensationally as 'heavy firing'—only this, and nothing more.

"Very funny stories came across the lines to us of the horsemanship of the Federal cavalry. A day or two ago a prisoner was brought into Centreville who was strapped to his saddle to keep him from falling off, although the saddle was of the McClellan pattern, invented expressly for bad riders. At a cavalry review a fortnight ago, near the Federal capital, a sham charge was ordered, in which not less than thirty-five knights came to the ground. Their mounted troops are said to be splendidly armed and equipped, and furnished with fine horses, (rather lean and shaky just now, in consequence of a want of forage;) indeed, in all respects they challenge admiration as a magnificent body of dragoons, except the comparatively unimportant circumstance that they can't ride."

A SINGULAR INCIDENT.—The Lynchburg Republican of the 26th of November publishes the following incident, remarkable alike for its singularity as well as for its melancholy fulfilment to the brother of one of the parties concerned:

Just before the war broke out, and before Lincoln's proclamation was issued, a young Virginian named Summerfield was visiting the city of New York, where he made the acquaintance of two Misses Holmes, from Waterbury, Vt. He became somewhat intimate with the young ladies, and the intercourse seemed to be mutually agreeable. The proclamation was issued, and the whole North thrown into a blaze of excitement. Upon visiting the ladies one evening, and at the hour of parting, they remarked to Summerfield that their present meeting would probably be the last; they must hurry home to aid in making up the overcoats and clothing for the volunteers from their town. Summerfield expressed his regret that they must leave, but at the same time especially requesting them to see that the overcoats were well made, as it was his intention, if he ever met the Vermont regiment in battle, to kill one of them and take his coat. Now for the sequel. Virginia seceded. The 2d Vermont regiment, a portion of which was from the town of Waterbury, was sent to Virginia. The battle of Manassas was fought, in which they were engaged, and so was Summerfield. During the battle S. marked his man, not knowing to what State he belonged; the fatal ball was sped on its errand of death; the victim fell at the flash of the gun, and upon rushing up to secure the dead man's arms, Summerfield observed that he had a fine new overcoat strapped to his back, which he determined to appropriate to his own use. The fight was over, and Summerfield had time to examine his prize, when, remarkable as it may appear, the coat was marked in the lining with the name of Thomas Holmes, and in the pockets were found letters, signed with the name of the sister, whom Summerfield had known in New York, and to whom he had made the remark we have quoted, in which the dead man was addressed as brother. The evidence was conclusive—he had killed the brother of his friend, and the remark which he had made in jest had a melancholy fulfilment. We are assured this narrative is literally true. Summerfield now wears the coat, and, our informant states, is not a little impressed with the singularity of the coincidence.

SCHOOL-GIRLS' AID TO THE SOLDIERS.—The following correspondence explains itself:

THE SCHOOL-GIRLS' AID TO THE SOLDIERS.

W. F. COLLEGE, Nov. 19.

H. V. U. BOYNTON, Maj. 35th Regt. O. V. M.:

DEAR SIR: Please find, accompanying this note, one thousand pairs of woollen socks. They are the gift of the pupils and teachers of Wesleyan Female College, Cincinnati, and are designed for the men of the Thirty-fifth regiment O. V. M., to the needy among whom you will please present them. The manufacture of these stockings has occupied the leisure moments of the past months, in which manufacture all our pupils, from the youngest to the oldest, have participated.

We experience therefore the pleasure known only to the cheerful giver, as we now deliver our offering into your hands.

Assure your brave men that gratitude to them mingles with our desire to serve our country; and also, that it is our earnest wish that they may find strength and courage as well as warmth in the school-girls' gift.

In behalf of Soldiers' Aid Society of W. F. College, ALICE S. WOOD, Secretary.

RACHEL L. BODLEY, Pres't.

THE SOLDIER'S REPLY.

CAMP BOONBON, KY., Nov. 24.

Miss Alice S. Wood, Secretary Soldiers' Aid Society, Wesleyan Female College:

DEAR MISS: Allow me, through you, to express my thanks to the ladies of your Society, for the very serviceable and acceptable present received from them last evening. The stockings arrived most opportunely, and were distributed this morning, when a driving snow-storm made such a gift seem more valuable. The brave men who received them, expressed their thanks in various ways; grateful above all that the cause for which they are fighting enlists the sympathies of loyal women. The gift, in itself considered, has great intrinsic worth, but the circumstances connected with it impart a new value, which words can hardly express.

We think of your labors in our behalf—your days of self-sacrificing effort, and feelings such as brothers cherish toward sisters swell our hearts with thankfulness. Such tokens of interest in our welfare encourage our hearts and strengthen our hands, nerv- ing us for the stern conflict in which we are engaged; and in the hour of battle the memory of those who have befriended us will urge us onward in the path of duty.

Your prayers may ascend in common with ours for the cause which we each in our several spheres are laboring to support; our prayers, besides, shall go up for you, that the institution with which you are connected may be richly blessed, and that Heaven's choicest gifts, which fall as the gentle dew upon the flowers, may fill your hearts to overflowing. May we in common soon look upon our country, reunited, entering upon a new and nobler life, protected by the old flag our fathers fought for, while the mothers and sisters of that olden age supported them, as you are aiding us.

With a soldier's well-wishes, I remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. V. W. BOYNTON, Maj. 35th Reg. O. V.

THE LAME, THE HALT, AND THE BLIND, TO BEAR ARMS.—The following advertisement appeared in a late Richmond paper:

WANTED—For local purposes, a company of a hundred men, who are not capable of performing service in the field, yet are able to perform duty in the city. None need apply who are capable of field service, and good references will be required as to character. Apply at the office, corner of Broad and Ninth streets.
JNO. H. WINDER, Brigadier-General.
—N. Y. Herald, Dec. 17.

DOG-HAIR STOCKINGS.—We have seen a curious specimen of knitting, wrought by a lady of Norfolk, and sent to the President, with the following note:

"I send to President Davis a pair of socks, knit entirely of the curls taken from my little pet, a lap-dog. I do not send them for their beauty, or for the use of them; but only as a slight evidence of Southern independence and home manufacture, both of which every Southern heart should endeavor to obtain and encourage. With every wish for your future health and happiness, I remain, very respectfully, yours,
MISS S. C. PANNELL."

The ingenuity of the work is remarkable; and although the socks may not be quite so soft as silk, they nevertheless possess the advantages of durability and warmth. The ladies of the South are showing a praiseworthy determination to turn every thing to account. We notice that one in Tennessee has produced a very superior article of cloth, woven from cotton and cow's hair, spun together, which the papers pronounce a very good substitute for wool. It gives us pleasure to notice these evidences of what the people are doing to thwart the inconveniences of the blockade.—Richmond Dispatch.

LEATHER.—The Tallahassee Floridian has seen a specimen of kip leather, tanned in twenty days with dog-fennel preparation, and which the shoemakers there pronounce equal to the best French leather. The leather was prepared by Isaac Bierfield, of Newberry, S. C., who has a patent for the process, but asks very high prices for the privilege of using his discovery—three hundred dollars for an individual right, seven hundred dollars for a county, and ten thousand dollars for a State. The Floridian recommends planters in Florida, where dog-fennel grows abundantly, to gather and cure the weed, which is found to possess so valuable a property.—New Orleans Picayune, Nov. 27.

CAPT. BUCHANAN'S RESIGNATION.—Captain Frank Buchanan, who is the author of the annexed letters, is in command of one of the rebel batteries on the Potomac. We commend the third epistle to his Southern friends:

NAVY YARD, WASHINGTON, April 22, 1861.

His Excellency, the President:

SIR: I respectfully resign my commission as a Captain in the United States Navy.

Respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

FRANK BUCHANAN.

COMMANDANT'S OFFICE, NAVY YARD,
WASHINGTON, April 22, 1861.

SIR: As I have this day resigned my commission as a Captain in the Navy, and consider myself only temporarily in command here, you will carry out all the instructions you have received in preparing the steamers for war service, as directed by my order to you this morning, and superintend the defence of the Yard, when necessary.

I shall not take any part in the defence of this Yard from this date

Respectfully, &c.,

F. BUCHANAN.

Com. J. A. DAHLGREN, &c., &c.

"THE REST," NEAR EASTON, MD., May 4, 1861.

SIR: If his Excellency, the President, has not accepted my resignation as a Captain in the Navy of the United States, I respectfully ask to recall it. The circumstances which induced me, very reluctantly, to tender my resignation, no longer exist, and I cannot voluntarily withdraw from a service in which I have passed nearly forty-seven years of my life, in the faithful performance of duty—as the records of the Navy Department will prove. I am ready for service.

Respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

FRANKLIN BUCHANAN.

The Hon. GIDEON WELLES, Secretary of the Navy,
Washington, D. C.

—New York, Nov. 1861.

A GALLANT EXPLOIT.—Lieut.-Col. Spears, of Bird's 1st Tennessee regiment, now stationed near Somerset, is in our city. He brought as prisoners John L. Smith, his two sons, Joseph M. and Calvin, and two other active secessionists, who were arrested by a refugee Tennessean named John Smith, who is now in the patriot ranks of our State. John Smith, when called upon to decide between the Union and the Confederacy, lived in or near Huntsville, and loyally determined to adhere to the Stars and Stripes. Jeff. Davis' proclamation warning all to leave the Confederacy who did not sympathize with the rebellion, induced him to sell his property preparatory to leaving, and he converted the proceeds into gold. But about the same time came the blockade order of Gov. Harris, forbidding any one to quit the State. John Smith was then seized by the five men who are here as prisoners, aided by some secession cavalry, and scourged and abused in various demoniac ways, until he revealed where his money was concealed. Upon telling where it was, his trunk was broken open and robbed of its contents, and a parcel of counterfeit bank bills inserted in the place. He was then sent on to Knoxville, where he was charged with treason and passing counterfeit money. After being imprisoned some time, he was tried before a military court, with no forms of law, and as they could make out no case against him, he was discharged, minus a valuable mare and all his money. After incredible difficulty the unswerving patriot reached our army, and joined one of the Tennessee regiments. He obtained permission from his commanding officer to take twenty mounted volunteers, who went as far as the State line. Upon reaching there they resolved to penetrate into Tennessee, and knowing the country well, by unfrequented paths they went to Huntsville, which is about 60 miles from our camp, whence they started. Pushing boldly into the town, John Smith and his comrades succeeded in capturing the five prisoners, and immediately commenced their retreat; rescue was threatened and attempted, but the pursuers were never able to overtake the captors until they returned into our lines with some of the wretches who had acted so inhumanly. The secession robbers were transferred to this city, and John Smith has gone into Tennessee again with a squad of Union soldiers, where he hopes to make more captures. He has all the elements of a successful partisan, and his feats of desultory warfare are noble episodes in our Southern campaigns.—Louisville Journal.

A SENSIBLE OPINION.—A Washington correspondent says that there are various opinions at the capital respecting the length of the present session of Congress. Judge Collamer, of Vermont, who is one of the shrewdest men in Congress, advises an early adjournment. He says: "War is not a business Congress can engineer. It is properly Executive business, and the moment Congress passes beyond the line of providing for the wants of the Government, and deciding the purposes of the war, to say how it shall be conducted, the whole thing will prove a failure."

VERY scandalous reports are rife concerning Col. Scott, nephew and secretary of the old General. It is boldly asserted that he is the traitor who has done so much mischief by revealing cabinet secrets and the plans of the Commander-in-Chief to the enemy. The failure of the scheme against the rebel camp at Munson's Hill, which was known only to Gen. Scott, Gen. McClellan, and Col. Scott, is attributed to the latter. It is intimated that the suspicions against Col. Scott were so strong, that his friends advised him to quit the country, and that this had something to do with the sudden resignation of Gen. Scott and his departure with his nephew and others for Europe. It is probable that these rumors and suspicions have been exaggerated.—Buffalo Courier, Dec. 6.

A WOMAN FOR THE TIMES.—A lad of less than sixteen, named Darling, from Pittsfield, Mass., recently enlisted in Captain Cromwell's company, in the Northern Black Horse Cavalry. On learning that he had a sick mother at home, who was sadly afflicted by his departure, the captain discharged the youngster and sent him home, as the brave lad supposed, on a furlough. He has received the following acknowledgment of his kindness from the sister of the "bold soldier boy." It is good:

PITTSFIELD, MASS., Oct. 20.

CAPTAIN CROMWELL—DEAR SIR: My brother, David H. Darling, a lad of sixteen, left home and joined your command without the consent or even knowledge of our parents. I went from school to see him last Thursday, and stated these facts to your second lieutenant. Our young soldier returned home Friday, on furlough, as he supposed, and seeing the effect of his conduct upon my mother and a sick sister, gave his consent to remain. But he is very much afraid you will not think that he did not promise to return in good faith, or, to use his own term, that he has "backed out," so he made me promise, before I returned, that I would explain it to you.

This, then, "is to certify," gentlemen, that the young Darling aforesaid has not abated his desire in the least degree to serve his country under your especial guidance, although he has consented to devote himself in the more humble capacity of staying at home and minding his mother. Having reached the advanced age of sixteen, he possesses the strength of Hercules, and sagacity of Tacinaque, Agulier's bravery, and the patriotism of Washington, whom you have probably heard mentioned before. Would that he could add to these a few of Methuselah's superfluous years, for youth, though no crime, is very inconvenient in his case. Of course, the advancement of the Black Horse Cavalry is materially retarded, and its glory dimmed for a season; but wherever you are at the end of two years, he is determined to join you. If thou wouldst take me in his place, I would be very happy to go. I believe not only in this war, but fighting in general, and think that if women were permitted to use "knock-down argument," it would civilize not only their mutual relations, but also their treatment of your much-abused sex.

Meantime, awaiting thy orders, I am respectfully thine,
JENNIE DARLING.

P. S.—If you are married, please hand this over to your Second Lieutenant.
J. D.
—Cincinnati Press, Dec. 2.

A REBEL HEROINE.—The Richmond correspondent of the Nashville Union tells the following: Not long ago I told you of the sufferings of Miss Converse on her trip from Philadelphia. I have now to record another instance of female heroism. A young lady of Maryland, as gentle and genuine a woman as the South contains, but withal a true heroine, has, after braving many hardships, recently arrived here.

Reaching the Potomac, she found a boat and a negro to row it, but the negro refused to attempt to cross, for fear, as he said, the Yankees would shoot him. Drawing a pistol from her pocket, our heroine told him coolly she would shoot him herself if he didn't cross. The negro quailed, rowed her over to the Virginia shore, and thus, utterly alone, she came to her friends in Richmond, with her petticoats quilted with quinine, her satchel full of letters, many of them containing money, and with no end of spool-thread, needles, pins, and other little conveniences now so hard to get in the blockaded South. The name of this heroine ought not to be withheld from the historian. It is Miss Nannie Webster.—Baltimore American, Dec. 27.

AN OLD OFFENDER.—Wm. H. Ross, a well-known colored man of Richmond, Va., was hailed by the night watch, and responded by running off. He was caught, however, and the Mayor ordered him thirty-nine, and to be confined. The negro in question is called "an old offender" by the police, and has, through their instrumentality, been ordered 1,000 lashes in the course of a not very extended life.—Richmond Dispatch, Dec. 23.

NOBLE CONDUCT OF MRS. CAPTAIN RICKETTS.—The heroic conduct of Mrs. Ricketts, the wife of Captain James B. Ricketts, who was severely wounded at Bull Run, is the theme of much praise. Mrs. Ricketts pushed through the enemy's lines alone when she heard her husband was captured, and took her place with him in the hospital, from which she never emerged until this week. When she arrived in Richmond, General Stuart asked her to sign a parole of honor. She refused. He persisted in writing it, and handed her the document. She tore it up instantly, and carried the fragments to her husband. When Captain Ricketts was carried to Richmond, crowds flocked to see the commander of "Sherman's Battery," as they insisted on calling it.

COL. SOL. MEREDITH.—A pleasant story is told by a correspondent of Col. Sol. Meredith, of Wayne County, Indiana, commanding the 19th Indiana, on the Potomac.

At the Lewinsville skirmish, the colonel was at the head of his men, as they were formed in line of battle, under the fire of the enemy. As the shells exploded over them, his boys would involuntarily duck their heads. The colonel saw their motions, and in a pleasant way exhorted them, as he rode along the line, to hold up their heads and act like men. He turned to speak to one of his officers, and at that moment an 18-pounder shell burst within a few yards of him, scattering the fragments in all directions. Instinctively he jerked his head almost to the saddle bow, while his horse squatted with fear. "Boys," said he, as he raised up and reined his steed, "you may dodge the large ones!" A laugh ran along the line at his expense, and after that no more was said about the impropriety of dodging shells.—Galesburg Democrat, Oct. 17.

THE TONE OF BULLETS.—A soldier writing from one of the camps on the Potomac thus alludes to the peculiar music made by bullets passing through the air: It is a very good place to exercise the mind, with the enemy's picket rattling close at hand. A musical ear can study the different tones of the bullets as they skim through the air. I caught the pitch of a large-sized Minié yesterday—it was a swell from E flat to F, and as it passed into the distance and lost its velocity, receded to D—a very pretty change. One of the most startling sounds is that produced by the Hotchkiss shell. It comes like the shriek of a demon, and the bravest old soldiers feel like ducking when they hear it. It is no more destructive than some other missiles, but there is a great deal in mere sound to work upon men's fears.

The tremendous scream is caused by a ragged edge of lead, which is left on the shell. In favorable positions of light, the phenomena can sometimes be seen, as you stand directly behind a gun, of the clinging of the air to the ball. The ball seems to gather up the atmosphere and carry it along, as the earth carries its atmosphere through space. Men are frequently killed by the wind of a cannon-shot. There is a law which causes the atmosphere to cling to the earth, or which presses upon it with a force, at the surface, of fifteen pounds to the square inch; does the same law, or a modification, pertain to cannon-balls in flight? I do not remember of meeting with a discussion of the subject in any published work. It is certainly an interesting philosophic question.

PROPOSED SOUTHERN NAVY.—We are glad to see that this subject engages the earnest attention of our New Orleans contemporaries, and that they strongly urge the construction of vessels of war at that place.

The South is rich in all the materials of ship-building, and we wonder that we have not already at least the beginning of a navy. We cannot afford to wait for foreign countries to open our ports. We ought to be able to open them ourselves. The world is always ready to help those who do not need its help. We have naval officers who deserve to be employed upon their own element, and who could render efficient service to the country if we could only put them afloat. It is intolerable that we should longer permit the Federal navy and Yankee pirates to vapor and bully along the whole extent of our coast, and completely isolate us from the rest of mankind.

If, at the beginning of the war, a few millions had been expended for iron-plated frigates, we could by this time have sunk the whole Yankee navy, and opened our ports to the commerce of the world. It is not yet too late. By energetic efforts we can get a fleet ready by spring, which will save us from a humiliating reliance upon the intervention of foreign powers. Every effort should at once be made for the relief of the country from the Yankee blockade. We trust that the Executive and Congress will bestow their earliest attention upon this most important subject. Our naval officers, among the most accomplished and heroic in the old service, are panting for an opportunity of distinction and usefulness upon the ocean, and we hope they will not be disappointed. We know of no expenditure which would yield as rich returns as the construction of a few ships of war.—Richmond Dispatch, Nov. 12.

THE NORTH CAROLINA LEGISLATURE.—It will be remembered that the first Southern papers received here after the capture of Fort Hatteras spoke of the disgraceful behavior of the North Carolina Legislature, and refused to report it. The Daily Times of this morning has information from Raleigh stating that the Legislature was in session when the capture was announced, and that the Union men rose in their places, and cheered and swung their hats, and were so noisy in their rejoicings that all business was for the time suspended. The same feeling, to a considerable extent, pervaded the people of that city.

No wonder that the secessionist papers were unwilling to chronicle such behavior.—Albany Journal, Oct. 8.

RICHMOND, Oct. 5.—Rev. A. E. Dickinson, general superintendent of the Baptist Colportage Board in Virginia, writes as follows: "The Baptist Colportage Board, located in Richmond, has published upward of seven hundred thousand pages of religious tracts addressed to soldiers, and have arranged for the publication of twelve thousand pocket Testaments, two thousand of which we expect to receive next week.

LOUISVILLE, Oct. 8.—Col. McKee, late editor of the Louisville Courier, will take command of a regiment under Gen. Buckner.—The Citizens' Bank of New Orleans are circulating "fives" cut in two, each piece to represent two and a half dollars.—Thirteen hundred Indian warriors crossed the Arkansas River, near Plymouth, on the 15th of September, en route for Ben McCulloch's army.—N. Y. Commercial, Oct. 9.

A PATRIOTIC FAMILY.—Mr. Europe Houghton, of Newton, Mass., has a family of five sons and two daughters. Three of his sons are in the Massachusetts First regiment, and two were members of the skirmishing company selected from the regiment some time since. The whole three were in the first Bull Run battle. Another son is in the Massachusetts Sixteenth, and the last of the five has just joined Col. Wilson's regiment, and all will fight bravely in defence of liberty and good government. One of the girls is in the employ of the United States at the Watertown Arsenal, making six out of seven in the service of the Government.—Boston Journal, Nov. 10.

FLOYD'S DEFEAT BY ROSECRANS.

A double thief and traitor he,
Whose heart is so unlike a man's,
As first to rob the Treasury,
Then steal away from Rosecrans!

—RICHARD COE, Philadelphia Bulletin.

ST. LAWRENCE COUNTY, N. Y., AND THE WAR.—A person in Potsdam, St. Lawrence County, writes us: "So far as St. Lawrence County is concerned, this is a mistake. The larger portion of the Sixteenth regiment is from this county. Two companies and the lieutenant-colonel went from this little village. Some fifteen of the young men in the academy enlisted at the first call, and quite a number were rejected by the over-scrupulous inspecting officer. A portion of the Eighteenth regiment is from this county. Between fifty and one hundred have enlisted in the engineer regiment mustered at Elmira, while over five hundred are now encamped at Ogdensburg, with the prospect of filling up a complete regiment before the week is out. Several of as good young men as our county contains have already offered up their lives for their country. In all no less than fifteen hundred are now in arms, and we hope that two thousand will be serving their country before the month is out.

"Please give us credit for having raised a little more than a 'corporal's guard.' We ought to do more, and we are trying to do it."—N. Y. World, Sept. 28.

A BRAVE BOY AND A GALLANT SAILOR.—One of the powder-boys on the Bienville, Wm. Henry Steele by name, deserves particular attention. He is only fourteen years old, a bright, active fellow, and performed his duties with signal bravery. It was his duty to hand cartridges to one of the gunners. While the Bienville was in the thickest of the engagement, the balls whistled fiercely over the deck and splashed about in the water, but he never wavered. A large rifled shot struck the water some distance from the steamer, bounded upward, and, crashing through the beam, tore through the bodies of two men standing near him at his gun, and wounded two others. He hatted his cartridge to the gunner, and, stepping over the bodies, brought a fresh supply of ammunition, with which he continued his labors.

After the fight, Captain Steedman, in thanking his men for their noble conduct, especially commended the bravery of young Steele. During a part of the time the Bienville was the mark for almost the entire fire of both rebel batteries, and her crew displayed the greatest heroism. The first shot fired at her struck, and was one of the most serious. Her guns were in such constant use that they became hot, and almost leaped from the deck at each discharge. It is really wonderful that her damage is so very immaterial. Beyond a hole between decks, another through the beam, just at the lower part of the gunwale, a cut shroud and a battered stove-pipe, (not smoke-stack,) she is unharmed.

The Wabash also came in for a large share of the fight. A cannon-shot passed along her deck and struck Thomas Jackson, the coxswain. The ball nearly carried away one of his legs, leaving it so that it hung only by shreds of flesh and skin. Leaning against a gun, he drew out his sheath-knife and tried to cut it off entirely. The knife was too dull, and his shipmates hastened to him and carried him below. He kept continually asking how the fight progressed, saying, "I hope we'll win; I hope we'll beat them." He died in two hours, his last words expressing happiness that he had done something for his country.—Phila. Press, Nov. 16.

HYMN FOR OUR COUNTRY.

BY ELIZABETH OAKES SMITH.

Inscribed to President Lincoln.

God bless our Country!—look afar
Behold, on every side,
From solar belt to Northern star,
She standeth like a bride.
Upheld by God's almighty hand,
How fair thou art, O Native Land!

Our meadows teem with goodly herds,
Our garners overflow;
Our hills resound with singing birds,
And bloom our vales below.
Upheld by God's all-bounteous hand,
Thy cup is full, O favored Land.

God bless our Councils!—make us wise
To worship and obey;
Let Justice reign, and Truth arise
To guide our steps away.
Upheld by His almighty hand,
God bless the rulers of our Land.

God bless our Banner evermore!
Beneath whatever sky,
By seas unknown, on desert shore,
We fling it broad and high.
Uphold it by Thy mighty hand!
God bless the Banner of our Land!

THE VOLUNTEER'S WIFE.

I knew by the light in his deep, dark eye,
When he heard the beat of the mustering drum,
That he never would fold his arm and sigh
Over the state of ills that would come;
I knew that the blood of a patriot sire
Coursed through his veins like a stream of fire;
So I took his hand,
And bade him go,
But he never dreamed
That it grieved me so.

Two fair-haired children he left with me,
Who lisp his name at the eventide—
The very hour when upon his knee
He used to fondle his pet and pride.
Alas! they may never again be blessed
By a father's care in the old home nest;

And he never again
May hear the tones,
Or kiss the lips
Of his little ones.

I know that he has answered his country's call,
That his breast is bared at a high command;
But my heart will break, I know, if he fall
In the battle-front by a traitor's hand;
Yet I murmur not, though my tear-wet eyes
Attest the worth of the sacrifice;
'Tis a wife's free gift,
Two lives in one,
In the name of God,
And of Washington.

Perhaps, when the maple trees are red,
And the golden glories of harvest come,
I shall wake some morning to hear his tread,
And give him a warm heart's welcome home;
To kneel with him in a fervent prayer,
Thanking our God for his watchful care
In shielding his heart
From the rebel's brand,
Who honored the flag
Of the cherished land.

MAJ.-GEN. PRICE'S PROCLAMATION.

BY CLERICUS.

Missourians, a word or two!
The undersigned, last June,
Was called to head the Spartan few
Who sword from scabbard sternly drew,
To drive away the craven crew,
Bound by black vows to snatch from you
Your freedom's priceless boon!

The Governor distinctly asked
For Fifty Thousand Men;
You heard him ask—you must have heard
I know your patriot pulses stirred,
Your patriot impulses concurred
In fierce resolves to hound the herd
Back to their Northern den!

Your hearts were right—your purpose set
To rise up there and then;
You felt the flame of holy hate,
You longed in blood your swords to sate,
Your eagerness for fight was great,
You found it difficult to wait—
You Fifty Thousand Men!

But, notwithstanding this desire
The enemy to drive—
This strong war-fever for the fray,
This burning for the battle-day,
Most all the fifty stayed away;
The actual figure, strange to say,
Was only about five.

Out of two hundred thousand males,
A match for any foes—
Strong arms, brave hearts, and flashing eyes,
Hands raised defiant to the skies,
Spirit that conquers or that dies,—
Out of the host that burned to rise,
But five in fifty rose!

Nearly six months, you are aware,
Have come and gone since then ;
You've farmed the field and mowed the hay,
Your winter stock is stowed away,
You're ready 'gainst the rainy day ;
Are you not coming now, I say,
Ye Fifty Thousand Men ?

The foe has not as yet retired,—
'Tis singular, but true !
So far from that, I'm forced to say,
From what I see, he means to stay,
Most probably till swept away ;
In view of which, ye heroes, pray,
What do you mean to do ?

Suppose the facts were otherwise,
My Fifty Thousand Men !
That, starting when the summons rose,
You'd leaped to feet to face the foes,—
Dealt Fifty Thousand deathly blows—
It's not the case—but just suppose—
How would the thing be then ?

Suppose, for every man we've got,
We had as much as ten ;
Suppose we'd made th' invader flee,
And struck the tyrant to the knee ;
That I'd chased him, and not he me,
It's clear as daylight—don't you see ?—
Ye Fifty Thousand Men !

Missourians ! Missourians !
To come to facts again,
Where is the old Missouri fire,
Courage passed down to son from sire,
Motto, "Still onward, upward higher" ?
Died out ? If not, where, I inquire,
The Fifty Thousand Men ?

Look at us ! we—we've done the work
Of Fifty Thousand Men !
We formed, and fought, and bled—we few—
No bed, no coverlid, no shoe—
Waded through mud and mire for you ;
Will you not come and do it too ?
And, if so, mention when.

Numbers give strength—five's more than one !
And still it's less than ten !
Numbers, increased, do greater grow !
Numbers intimidate the foe !
Numbers lay lesser numbers low !
Missourians, I'll prove it so,
With Fifty Thousand Men !

The fact is, fellow-citizens,
—No "if," nor "why," nor "when,"—
I will have help—I cannot wait !
Somebody's got to save the State,
And do it quick, before too late !
You must turn out, at any rate,
You Fifty Thousand Men !

Turn out ! turn out, then ! now's the time—
The crisis of our fate !
Mechanics, stop your wheels and saws !
Lawyers, lay down the book of laws !
Ye aspirants for office, pause !
Ye teamsters, hush your "Gee, whoa, haws,"
And rush to save the State.

Come on ! come on, brave spirits all !
No others need apply ;
Over the arm the musket fling ;
Wear all your clothes, your bedding bring,
Your extra sheets, and every thing.
Come on ! and let the war-cry ring,
"To conquer or to die !"

Let but your struggles free the land,
The State your pay will fix ;
Meantime, don't think about the pay ;
Take higher ground—look far away ;
Glory's the thing for which I pray—
That, or a place wherein I may Bury my six-foot-six.

I'm sure you mean to come, you know—
Oh, perfectly—but, then,
As yet I find no flashing eyes ;
I hear no shouts that shake the skies.
If it's a fact you mean to rise,
Why don't you, now—why don't you rise,
You Fifty Thousand Men ?

Hark ! up along the mountain-side !
Hark ! down the distant glen !
What sound is this that surges past ?
A war-whoop ?—footsteps gathering fast ?
The echoes of the bugle blast ?
Perhaps—it may be that—at last.
Ho ! Fifty Thousand Men !

THE TRUE HEROINE.

What was she like ? I cannot tell ;
I only know God loved her well ;
Two noble sons her gray hairs blest—
And he, their sire, was now at rest.

And why her children loved her so,
And called her blessed, all shall know ;
She never had a selfish thought,
Nor valued what her hand had wrought.

She could be just in spite of love ;
And cherished hates she dwelt above ;
In sick-rooms, they that had her care,
Said she was wondrous gentle there.

It was a fearful trust, she knew,
To guide her young immortals through ;
But Love and Truth explained the way,
And Piety made perfect day.

She taught them to be pure and true,
And brave, and strong, and courteous, too ;
She made them reverence silver hairs,
And feel the poor man's biting cares.

She won them ever to her side ;
Home was their treasure and their pride ;
Its food, drink, shelter, pleased them best,
And there they found the sweetest rest.

And often, as the shadows fell,
And twilight had attuned them well,

She sang of many a noble deed,
And marked with joy their eager heed.

And most she marked their kindling eyes,
When telling of the victories
That made the Stars and Stripes a name,
Their country rich in honest fame.

It was a noble land, she said—
Its poorest children lacked not bread ;
It was so broad, so rich, so free,
They sang its praise beyond the sea.

And thousands sought its kindly shore,
And none were poor and friendless more ;
All blessed the name of Washington,
And loved the Union, every one.

She made them feel that they were part
Of the great nation's living heart—
So they grew up, true patriot boys,
And knew not all their mother's joys.

Sad was the hour when murmurs loud
From a great black advancing cloud
Made millions feel the coming breath
Of maddened whirlwinds, full of death !

She prayed the skies might soon be bright,
And made her sons prepare for fight ;
Brave youths !—their zeal proved clearly then,
In such an hour youths can be men !

By day she went from door to door—
Men caught her soul, unfelt before ;
By night she prayed, and planned, and dreamed,
Till morn's red light war's lightning seemed.

The cry went forth ; forth stepped her sons,
In martial blaze of gleaming guns ;
Still striding on to perils dire,
They turned to catch her glance of fire.

No fears, no fond regrets she knew,
But proudly watched them fade from view ;
" Lord, keep them so ! " she said, and turned
To where her lonely hearth-fire burned.

THE HAPPY LAND OF CANAAN.

A New Version, Dedicated to the Third Iowa Boys.

If you listen to my song,
I'll not detain you long,
And will give you no cause for complaining ;
You may join me in a shout,
When I've told you about
The doings in our happy land of Canaan.

CHORUS—Hip ! hip ! hip !
Hurrah ! hurrah ! hurrah !
Our colors are well worth sustaining ;
From them we'll never fly,
But we'll conquer or we'll die,
In defence of our happy land of Canaan.

The greatest peril yet,
By which our country's been beset,
In this civil war which now is reigning ;

The.e's but one thing left to do,
We must whip the rebel crew,
And drive them from the happy land of Canaan.

Way down in old Missouri,
There's where General Lyon fell,
And died where the bullets were a-raining ;
He left his gallant band,
With brave Sigel in command,
Now he's happy in a better land of Canaan.

Col. Mulligan's brigade,
They were never yet afraid,
Fought at Lexington five days without complaining ;
Fed the rebels shell and shot,
Till they out of water got,
Then surrendered up their happy land of Canaan.

There's the " Dutch Company,"
Who are fighting for the free,
When in battle every nerve they are straining ;
When it comes to run away,
They will tell you, " Nix furstay ! "
They're an honor to our happy land of Canaan.

I will tell you in my song,
How our boys get along,
Who under Colonel Williams are a-training ;
They are all brave and true,
And they stick like " Spaulding's Glue,"
When fighting for our happy land of Canaan.

When our gallant little band
Once arrives in " Dixie's land,"
The traitor's cause, you'll see, will soon be waning ;
Our boys with basswood swords,
They would fight the rebel hordes,
And drive them from our happy land of Canaan.

Now my song is nearly done,
But I'll tell you every one,
You've a cause that is well worth maintaining ;
Just tell the rebel horde,
You're the up-and-ready Third,
From Iowa in the happy land of Canaan.

ON GUARD.

Dedicated to G. W. Hyde, Major Maine Seventh.

'Tis night, and the sentinel paces his round,
With an eye for each object—an ear for each sound ;
But his thoughts are roving long, long miles away,
They speed from him swiftly, like children to play.

Again he's at home in a fond wife's embrace,
And tear chases tear down his sun-beaten face ;
His children now greet him—now call him by name ;
He heeds not the night-watch—his home is the same.

Still green is the vine that encircles the door,
The path is the same as in blest days of yore ;
Aye, every loved object stands clear to his view ;
God's angels have blessed him—inspired him anew.

" O blessed be home," now springs from his heart,
" And blest be the ties that earth's power cannot part ;
And blessed be memory, that spark from God's throne,
That star for earth's mariner, wandering alone."

"And blessed be our country—our flag of the free !
Though dimmed be thy light, thou art sacred to me ;
Soon, soon may'st thou cast off thy fetters, and rise,
As the sun scatters clouds in his course through the skies."

The sentinel's pacing his dull, weary round ;
His soul now is free, though his body be bound ;
But hark ! through the darkness some sound strikes
his ear ;
He stops, as some object doth dimly appear.

"Halt !" cries he ; "who comes ?" speaks the sentinel now ;
"A friend with the countersign," 's answered him
low ;
"Advance with the countersign !"—now it is given—
His home is now earth, but before it was heaven.

The bright dream has vanished—his home's far away ;
The night-breeze is speaking that round him doth
play ;
It tells of a country that's dearer than life,
And his arm feels the stronger for freedom's own strife.

It tells of a foe that would pluck the bright stars
From a flag so triumphant in peace or in wars ;
That would make it a by-word—an object of shame,
And he says, "I will die for its glory and faue."

And blessed is a country with stout hearts like these ;
The tramp of her army is swelling the breeze ;
They rush to her rescue—their lives freely give—
'Twere better to die, than in bondage to live.

God bless thee, O Sentinel, pacing thy round !
Safe may'st thou return with the victor's wreath bound ;
When the dark clouds of war shall have passed from
the skies,
And rebellion is hurled down—never to rise.

—Boston Advertiser, Dec. 11.

On the 9th of December, the Confederate States
Court at Richmond, Va., decided in the case of Elken & Bros., of Mobile, that no change of citizenship after the commencement of hostilities can protect the property of an alien enemy from sequestration.—
Buffalo Courier, Dec. 19.

GENERAL HEINTZELMAN has a peculiar way of dealing with slave-owners who come into his camp in search of fugitives. He not only refuses to let the slaves return with their masters, but he will not allow the masters to return to their homes.—Idem, Dec. 20.

A PAIR of stockings, sent by the ladies' committee for the use of some gallant volunteer, was accompanied by the following verse :

Brave sentry, on your lonely beat,
May these blue stockings warm your feet ;
And when from war and camps you part,
May some fair knitter warm your heart.

THERE is a petticoat at Washington, taken from a she secesh, that weighs fifty pounds. The garment is apparently a quilted one, but instead of the usual filling, it is thickly wadded with the finest quality of sewing silk of assorted colors, the skeins being carefully arranged in layers. It is provided with straps by which the weight may be supported by the shoulders. Sewing silk is one of the articles most needed, next to quinine, in the South. This is the second attempt at smuggling the article into Dixie by women that has been discovered.—Cincinnati Gazette, Dec.

20.

Mrs. DOUGLAS.—Very few people indeed have been placed in a more trying position and sacrificed more for the sake of the Union than has Mrs. Douglas. She has persistently refused to entertain the proposition forwarded to her by a special messenger under a flag of truce from the Governor of North Carolina, asking that the two sons of the late Senator
Douglas be sent South to save their extensive estates in Mississippi from confiscation. If she refused, a large property would be taken from the children, and, in her present reduced circumstances, they may thereby eventually be placed in straitened circumstances. Here, then, was an appeal made directly to her tender regard for them, which, if she should refuse, would work disastrously against them in after years. But her answer was worthy of herself and of her late distinguished husband. If the rebels wish to make war upon defenceless children, and take away the all of little orphan boys, it must be so ; but she could not for an instant think of surrendering them to the enemies of their country and of their father. His last words were, "Tell them to obey the Constitution and the laws of the country," and Mrs. Douglas will not make herself the instrument of disobeying his dying injunction. The children, she says, belong to Illinois, and must remain in the North. Illinois and the North, we take it, will see to it that they are not sufferers by the devotiveness and patriotism of their mother.—*Louisville
Journal*, Dec. 20.

THE IRISH WIT ALWAYS READY.—It is now known that the surrender of Lexington was rendered a necessity by the want of ammunition, as well as by the want of water. A few of the companies had one or two rounds left, but the majority had fired their last bullet. After the surrender, an officer was detailed by Price to collect the ammunition and place it in safe charge. The officer, addressing Adjutant Cosgrove, asked him to have the ammunition surrendered. Cosgrove called up a dozen men, one after the other, and exhibiting the empty cartridge-boxes, said to the astonished rebel officer, "I believe, sir, we gave you all the ammunition we had before we had stopped fighting. Had there been any more, upon my word, you should have had it, sir. But I will inquire, and if by accident there is a cartridge left, I will let you know." The rebel officer turned away, reflecting upon the glorious victory of having captured men who had fired their last shot.

An Irishman from Battle Creek, Michigan, was at Bull Run battle, and was somewhat startled when the head of his companion on the left hand was knocked off by a cannon-ball. A few moments after, however, a spent ball broke the fingers of his comrade on the other side. The latter threw down his gun and yelled with pain, when the Irishman rushed to him, exclaiming, "Blasht your soul, you owld woman, shtop cryin' ; you make more noise about it than the man that losht his head !" —Chicago Post.

A CONNECTICUT soldier writes home that the commissary at Annapolis has given the boys so much mule meat, that the ears of the whole regiment have grown  $3\frac{1}{2}$  inches since their arrival at the Maryland capital.—Boston Traveller, Dec. 14.

THE HAGGAI PROPHECY.

LA GRANGE, KY., Dec. 9, 1861.

In one of the Cincinnati papers of a recent date I find the following:

A REMARKABLE PROPHECY.—One of the most striking instances of the fulfilment of prophecy, says the Boston Christian Advocate, was pointed out to us lately by an eminent Baptist divine. It occurs in the 8th, 10th, and 21st verses of Haggai ch. iv.:

"Behold, there shall be rebellion in the South, a rebellion of strong men and archers, of chariots and bright shields; and the blast of the trumpet shall awaken the land, and the nations shall be astonished thereat.

"And lo, behold, because of the sin of the South, her mighty men shall be as babes, her gates shall be destroyed utterly, saith the Lord; yea, utterly destroyed shall be her gates, and her rice fields shall be wasted, and her slaves set free.

"And behold, great ships from the North shall devour her pride, and a storm from the West shall lay waste her habitations. Yea, saith the Lord, and her dominion will be broken."*

Now if that Divine can find Chapter IV., or any such prophecy as the above in Haggai, his Bible must be a new edition. It will not do for these eminent Divines to know so much. TRUTH.

—Louisville Journal, Dec. 12.

PRECAUTIONS ON THE SOUTHERN COAST.—The following letter, explaining the necessity for keeping the Parish Guards in South Carolina at home, was found in the rebel camp at Port Royal:

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, HEAD- }
QUARTERS, May 24, 1861. }

TO CAPT. STEPHEN ELLIOTT, JR.—DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of the 17th to the Governor, I am directed to say that the reason why the Sea Coast and Parish companies have not been called into service here, has been because it was distinctly understood to be the desire of the Parishes that their companies should remain to guard and protect their coast, and to keep up a strict police where the negroes were so numerous; for this purpose sabres were given to them—the cavalry—and not given to the up-country companies. Your local companies were required for immediate protection. The Governor begs me to assure you most positively and distinctly, that that was the only reason the Parish companies were not called into service here, and as a matter of course you will at once see the justice of the reasons. The Governor would have most readily called upon you, had this not been the case. Respectfully yours,

F. J. MOSES, JR.,
Aide-de-Camp and Private Secretary.

AN ANGEL OF MERCY.—Amid the desolation and sadness of war, there is a beautiful angel of mercy which spreads her healing wings above the most desolate scene. Before this angel, the iron tramp of serried hosts breathes a softer music, and the unrelenting heart of vengeance and hate beats slower and calmer. This angel is gentle woman. Although not wanting in true patriotism, not backward in making sacrifices for her country's honor and welfare, yet is her ear ever opened to the call of distress, and her heart quick to bleed at the aspect of suffering humanity. These remarks have been called forth by facts just presented us in regard to the last hours of our young friend Mr. A. C. Lane, member of the Thirty-eighth regiment Indiana Volunteers, whose death we announced as having taken place in Louisville, Ky., last week, and whose parents reside in Lockport. Mr. Lane was taken very sick with malignant fever, and was sent immediately to the hospital in Louisville, where he would have remained and died, perhaps, without the knowledge of his friends, had it not been for an angel of mercy, in the person of a young lady. This young lady was in the habit of visiting the hospital to administer to the wants of the sick soldiers. The condition of young Lane attracted her attention, and she ordered him removed to her own father's house, where the most assiduous care and the kindest attention were paid him until the hour of his death. We wish we could write the name of this young lady. She was the daughter of loyal parents, whose hearts beat for the Union and humanity. Such touching incidents as these must serve to strengthen the cords of tenderness and sympathy which bind the Northern patriot's heart to those loyal spirits in the South who are still true to the Stars and Stripes.—Lockport (N. Y.) Journal.

CONTRABAND RECRUITS.

'Tis argued that "slaves," if made speedily free, And provided with proper equipments, might be Put to use, in the soldier's vocation!

And, egad! if you'll make them all serve, I propose That they march to the field, armed with shovels and hoes,

As an "army of occupation!"

THE SPIRIT OF '76.—While the Senate of Maryland were in session in the State House at Annapolis, a number of soldiers entered the ante-room and inquired if the Senate Chamber was not the place where Gen. Washington once stood? An employee of the House answered that it was, and showed one of them as near as he could the spot where Washington stood when he resigned his commission. The young man reverently approached the spot, and standing for several minutes apparently fixed to the place, hastily turned and left the chamber, exclaiming that he could stand it no longer, for he "felt his Fourth of July rising too fast."—Baltimore American, Dec. 12.

A REBEL OPINION OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S MESSAGE OF DEC. 3.—This document, which we spread before our readers on Saturday, came as near perfection, we conceive, as possible, in the art of deception. The Message was doubtless drawn up by Seward, (the cunning old fox,) who uses the English language to conceal his thoughts. We think our readers have, ere this, come to the conclusion that they gained as little insight into the affairs of the Yankee nation by perusing that document, as they would have gained by reading a proclamation from the King of the Fejee Islands. Six mortal columns to conceal from the world that the boasting Yankee dynasty has been whipped in every battle they have undertaken, and would like to back out of the scrape if a decent pretext were to offer, is not such a bad production in these war times, with cotton at thirty cents a pound, and anarchy and starvation staring them in the face, and the almost certainty of having their own ports blockaded by an English fleet during the winter.—Norfolk Day-Book, Dec. 9.

JENNISON'S PRACTICE.—Jennison is administering rather severe doses to the traitors down in Jackson Co., Mo. He shows them no mercy. He had a member of the Legislature sawing wood for him, and a Judge husking corn for his horses. He says that they do very well, and that he means hereafter to have secessionists and "contrabands" do all his camp drudgery. As a general thing, we like Jennison's "style," and think rough practice is needed with the traitors; but from all accounts, his operations too frequently partake of the cruel and heartless. He may have good and sufficient reasons for some of his transactions, with which the public are acquainted; otherwise, they will not add any to his reputation.—Kansas Chief.

A MODEL BODY GUARD.—"Brick" Pomeroy, of the La Crosse (Wis.) Democrat, on being invited to assist in forming a body guard for President Lincoln, after due consideration decided to "go in," provided the following basis could be adopted and rigidly adhered to throughout the war:

The company shall be entirely composed of colonels, who shall draw pay and rations in advance.

Every man shall have a commission, two servants, and white kids.

Each man shall be mounted in a covered buggy, drawn by two white stallions.

Under the seat of each buggy shall be a cupboard, containing cold chicken, pounded ice, and champagne, a la members of Congress and military officers at Bull Run.

Each man shall have plenty of cards and red clips to play poker with.

The only side-arms to be opera-glasses, champagne-glasses, and gold-headed canes.

The duty of the company shall be to take observations of battle, and on no account shall it be allowed to approach nearer than ten miles to the seat of war.

Behind each buggy shall be an ambulance, so arranged as to be converted into a first-class boarding-house in the day time, and a sumptuous sleeping and dressing room at night.

The regimental band must be composed of pianos and guitars, played by young ladies, who shall never play a quickstep except in case of retreat.

Reveille shall not be sounded till late breakfast time, and not then if any one of the regiment has a headache.

In case of a forced march into an enemy's country, two miles a week shall be the maximum, and no marches shall be made except the country abound in game, or if any member of the regiment object.

Kid gloves, gold toothpicks, cologne, hair-dressing, silk underclothes, cosmetics, and all other rations, to be furnished by the Government.

Each member of the regiment shall be allowed a reporter for some New York paper, who shall draw a salary of two hundred dollars a week, for puffs, from the incidental fund.

Every member shall be in command, and when one is promoted all are to be.

Commissions never to be revoked.

THE NORFOLK DAY BOOK of the 12th Nov. says:—Fifty or sixty of the Federal prisoners confined at New Orleans have taken the oath and joined the Confederate army for the war. There were five hundred in all.

GEN. FREMONT attended service at Henry Ward Beecher's church, and the congregation rose en masse as the General and Mrs. Fremont entered. Mr. Beecher's discourse was on "Greatness." After the service, the people made a rush for the General's pew, and detained him half an hour with hand-shaking; and when he was seated in his carriage, at the church-door, they crowded the street and gave him three cheers.

CAIRO, Dec. 5.—A special despatch to the Memphis papers of the 2d December, gives an account of a great battle at Morristown, in East Tennessee, between the Federal forces, under Parson Brownlow, and a rebel force sent in pursuit of him. The battle was fought on the 1st of December, in which Parson Brownlow was completely victorious. The rebel despatch calls it the first Union victory of the war. Brownlow had three thousand men. The rebel force was not ascertained, but their rout is admitted to have been total.

ONE OF THE JAPANESE SWORDS RECOVERED.—It is well recollected that, whilst the Japanese Embassy was stopping at the Gilmore House, two of their swords were stolen. Colonel Kane offered a reward for their recovery, and the police made a diligent search for them, but were unable to find them. A few days since Deputy Marshal McPhail, acting upon some information imparted to him, sent a posse of officers to the house of a citizen, which was searched in the hope of finding the weapons, but it was unsuccessful. Receiving additional information, however, he sent for a young man who was said to have one of the swords in his possession. The party appeared and afterward produced the sword which was taken from the well-remembered Tommy. It seems that a member of the Maryland Guard was in company with Tommy on the night of the arrival of the Embassy, and, after both had drunk to excess, he carried off the weapons. There is no doubt that the sword recovered is one that was stolen; and if there be any curious to know the name of the party who committed the theft, they can apply at the Marshal's office. The young man is now enlisted in the Confederate ranks. The sword will be returned to Japan through the State Department. There is a great desire felt for the return of the other, and it is hoped that it will be returned forthwith.—Baltimore American, Dec. 6.

YANKEE INGENUITY.—We have seen a curious and ingenious specimen of handiwork, executed by William Henry Baldwin, Jr., a prisoner of war, who was wounded in the battle of Manassas. It is a pipe, made of mahogany, and richly carved with imitations of leaves and flowers, while the mouth-piece and mountings are wrought of beef-bones, polished like ivory. The only instruments used in this extraordinary specimen of carving were old steel pens, which the prisoner managed to pick up. He has presented it to Dr. Higinbotham, surgeon of the post, as a token of gratitude for kindness shown him during a long period of suffering.—Richmond Dispatch, Nov. 28.

BUCHANAN NO MORE.—A town named Buchanan, in La Crosse County, Wis., recently petitioned to have its name changed to Washington, on account of the disgrace attached to the name of Buchanan, and their petition was unanimously granted.—Cincinnati Gazette, Dec. 11.

A YANKEE PROPOSITION.—Messrs. Ellis, Britton, and Eaton, of Springfield, Vt., make the following proposition to the Administration:

1. If they will confiscate the estates of rebels near Port Royal, to the extent of ten thousand acres, we will lease the land from them, and take five thousand contrabands as apprentices to work it, on the following terms:

1. To the Government we will give, for the use of the land, one-fourth part of each crop, or its market value in specie.

2. To the negroes we will give three months' attendance at school each year for all those over five and under thirty years of age, with good teachers and a sufficient supply of books, both for school and "for reading during their leisure hours," and will provide them with comfortable dwellings, food, clothing, furniture, and care during sickness, for themselves and families, and at the expiration of their apprenticeship will give them each a new suit of clothes and twenty-five dollars in money. The term of apprenticeship to be ten years for all those over fifteen years of age, and until twenty-two years of age for all those under fifteen.

The Government shall guaranty us protection against armed bodies of rebels, and lease the land for a term of ten years, and we will give good and sufficient sureties for the faithful performance of our part of the contract.

THE NEW ORLEANS FLOATING BATTERY.—We do not affect much knowledge of things nautical, and confess to a full-developed skepticism regarding all extraordinary invention by way of destructive experiment—nevertheless we think we are safe in aver-ring that if the floating battery now moored at our levee be only half as good as Capt. James O'Hara and his command, Company 2, Pelican Guards, in the fighting line, Commander Hollins will have no reason to be ashamed of its performance. Speaking of naval operations reminds us of the disappearance from that arm of Capt. Higgins, and his translation to some other service, where his versatile talents are no doubt in active requisition. He is the kind of blue jacket we want about this river—the sailor man who, in conjunction with the ever-ready Colonel J. K. Duncan, will give the Yankee boys a belly full of hard knocks should they try the Port Royal operations about the mouth of Old Muddy. The Pelican lads are, too, the kind of stuff such leaders as their own captain and those we have named will be worthy and proud of. Hurrah for the floating battery!—N. O. True Delta, Nov. 17.

A REBEL ARRESTED BY TWO YOUNG LADIES.—A Cynthiana (Ky.) correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial says that the daughter and niece of Colonel H—, concluded, recently, they would have a little fun, and to carry out their plan, dressed themselves in men's apparel, procured an old shot gun, and proceeded to the field where the Colonel was at work. One of the girls, shot gun in hand, took her position a few paces off, while the other stepped up and laid her hand on him and said: "By the authority and in the name of the United States Army, I arrest you as guilty of treason." The Colonel submitted without resistance, but said: "Gentlemen, in the name of God, what have I done?" The reply was that he would learn that, and have all things satisfactorily explained at Camp Chase, which caused the Colonel to turn very white; and they all walked to the house, where the children were all posted in the matter, and got into a titter, which caused a loud burst of laughter from all hands except the Colonel, who was very belligerent when he found that he had actually been arrested by two small young ladies, his daughter and niece.—Louisville Journal, Dec. 7.

"SKADADDLE" AND "SKIOUTE."

FORT SKADADDLE, VA., October 23d, 1861.

To the Editors of the Evening Post:

I see by your paper that the name of "Skadaddle" given to one of the rebel forts near Munson's Hill, is attributed to some German soldiers. This is not the case. Captain W. N. Angle, Company B, Thirty-fifth Regiment New York State Volunteers, gave it the name.

Captain Angle still occupies the place, which has been strengthened by our folks by digging a line of rifle pits of eighty to one hundred rods, and the building of field works to mount five guns. The name was given on account of the rebels leaving before they even saw a Union soldier or heard the click of a lock.

That the terms used by soldiers may be better understood, I will give you two words much used by them: "Skioute," to go ahead, pitch in, &c.; "Skadaddle," to run away, vamoose, slope, &c. The rebels skadaddled out and we skiouted in!

Respectfully yours,

Sergeant J. C. OTIS,
Co. B, Thirty-fifth Regiment N. Y. V.

SONGS OF THE REBELS.

DEATH OF THE LINCOLN DESPOTISM.

AIR—"Root, Hog, or Die."

The following stanzas were written soon after the arrest of Messrs. Mason & Slidell, but from reasons unavoidable their publication has been delayed:

'Twas out upon mid-ocean that the San Jacinto hailed An English neutral vessel, while on her course she sailed;

Then sent her traitor Fairfax, to board her with his crew,
And beard the "British lion" with his "Yankee Doodle-doo."

The Yankees took her passengers, and put them on their ship,
And swore that base secession could not give them
the slip;

But England says she'll have them, if Washington must fall,
So Lincoln and his "nigger craft" must certainly "feel small."

Of all the "Yankee notions" that ever had their birth,
The one of searching neutrals affords the greatest mirth—

To the Southrons; but the Yankees will ever hate
the fame
Which gave to Wilkes and Fairfax their never-dying name.

Throughout the North their Captain Wilkes received his need of praise,
For doing—in these civilized—the deeds of darker days;
But England's guns will thunder along the Yankee coast,
And show the abolitionists too soon they made their boast.

Then while Old England's cannon are booming on the sea,
Our Johnston, Smith, and Beauregard, dear Maryland will free,

And Johnston in Kentucky will whip the Yankees too,
And start them to the lively tune of "Yankee Doodle-doo."

Then down at Pensacola, where the game is always
"Bragg,"

The "Stars and Stripes" will be pulled down, and in the dust be dragged;
Fort Pickens can't withstand us, when Braxton is the cry,
And there you'll see the Yankees, with their usual speed will fly.

On the coast of Dixie's kingdom there are batteries made by Lee,
And covered up with cotton, which the Yankees want to see;
But when they go to take it, they'll find it will not do,
And start upon the "double-quick" to "Yankee Doodle-doo."

Then Evans and his cavalry will follow in their track,
And drive them in the Atlantic, or safely bring them back,
And hold them till Abe Lincoln and all his Northern scum
Shall own our independence of "Yankee Doodledom."

WHAT THE SPIRITS OF THE FATHERS OF THE FIRST REVOLUTION SAY TO THEIR SONS, NOW ENGAGED IN THE SECOND.

BY HENRY LOMAS.

We are watching that land where liberty woke!
Like beams of the morning, through darkness
broke;
Then up from the mountain the bold eagle sprung,
And wide to the breeze his broad pinions flung!
Rise! Rise, ye sons of the South, and be free!

The mighty have fallen, yet death cannot chill
Those noble emotions the soul ever thrill;
The grave hath no confines the spirit to hold,
While back to its kindred it flies to unfold Truth! Truth! safeguard of the South and the free.

Shall Washington rest, while a wail of discord
Reminds him the North is forgetting the Lord?
Will hero and statesman, the country's bright light,
Look down without pity from yonder far height
On this Land of Hope for the brave and the free?

That same noble spirit now watches above,
With thousands of others, to guide and guard you with love;
For here, true, earnest, and brave men are found,
With hearts uncorrupted, to their native land bound.
Awake! Awake, O ye sons of the South, and be free!

Down with the hireling that seeks now to rend
The homes which your ancestors fought to defend;
Rekindle the beacon ere the last spark is fled,
And light up the camp-fires round Liberty's bed!
Ye sons of the sunny South, strike to be free!

Fear not the Northern despot, nor his feeble frown,
Who seeks through his minions the South to put down;
Look to your God, from whence comes all power,
And seek His aid and protection in each darkened hour.
Strike again and again, O ye sons of the free!

Carolina's sons to this platform have come:
Protection to Liberty, to fireside and home,
Their watchword to-day, as their fathers' of old;
Truth, justice, and freedom, before Northern gold.
Ye are sons of the fathers who bled to be free.

Then loud ring the anvil, the hammer, and bell;
The South her new anthem, say, what does it tell?
Cotton, Grain, and Sugar, have proved threefold cord—
Columbia, the envied, the blest of the Lord.
Sun of the sunny land, shine still o'er the free!

On heaven's fair arches see graven the names
Of patriot and soldier, who drained life's pure veins;
Then down with the Northern Despot, let him hide
his head,
Who by heartless oppression would sever one thread
Of this Southern Confederacy, the hope of the free.

Once again at the altar, brothers, gather and kneel;
One pledge the South—one family, in woe or in weal;
One God and one Country, in peace or in war!
The South Free, United, and Truth the pole star
Of this sunny land which for ye must be.

SOUTHERN SONG.

TUNE—"Wait for the Wagon."

Come, all ye sons of freedom,
And join our Southern band;
We are going to fight the Yankees,
And drive them from our land.
Justice is our motto,
And Providence our guide;
So jump into the wagon,
And we'll all take a ride.

CHORUS.

So wait for the wagon—the dissolution wagon.
The South is the wagon, and we'll all take a ride.

Secession is our watchword;
Our rights we all demand;
To defend our homes and firesides,
We pledge our hearts and hands.
Jeff. Davis is our President,
With Stephens by his side;
Great Beauregard our General—
He joins us in our ride.

CHORUS—Wait for the wagon, &c.

Our wagon is the very best;
The running gear is good—
Stuffed round the sides with cotton,
And made of Southern wood.
Carolina is the driver,
With Georgia by her side;
Virginia holds the flag up,
While we all take a ride.

CHORUS—Wait for the wagon, &c.

The invading tribe called Yankees,
With Lincoln for their guide,
Tried to keep Kentucky
From joining in the ride;
But she heeded not their entreaties—
She has come into the ring;
She wouldn't fight for a Government
Where Cotton wasn't king.

CHORUS—So wait for the wagon, &c.

Old Lincoln and his Congressmen,
With Seward by his side,
Put old Scott in the wagon,
Just for to take a ride.
McDowell was the driver;
To cross Bull Run he tried,
But there he left the wagon,
For Beauregard to ride.

CHORUS—Wait for the wagon, &c.

Manassas was the battle-ground;
The field was fair and wide;
The Yankees thought they'd whip us out,
And on to Richmond ride;
But when they met our "Dixie" boys,
Their danger they espied;
They wheeled about for Washington,
And didn't wait to ride.

CHORUS—So wait for the wagon, &c.

Brave Beauregard—God bless him!—
Led legions in his stead,
While Johnson seized the colors,
And waved them o'er his head.
To rising generations,
With pleasure we will tell
How bravely our Fisher
And gallant Johnson fell.

CHORUS—So wait for the wagon, &c.

MCCLELLAN'S SOLILOQUY.

BY A DAUGHTER OF GEORGIA.

Advance, or not advance; that is the question!
Whether 'tis better in the mind to suffer
The jeers and howlings of outrageous Congressmen;
Or to take up arms against a host of rebels,
And, by opposing, beat them?—To fight—to win—
No more: and by a victory, to say we end
This war, and all the thousand dreadful shocks
The flesh's exposed to—'tis a consummation
Devoutly to be wished. To fight, to win,
To heat! perchance be beaten;—ay, there's the rub;
After a great defeat, what would ensue!
When we have shuffled off the battle-field,
Must give us pause; there's the respect
That makes calamity a great defeat.
But shall I bear the scorn of all the North,
The "outward" pressure, and old Abe's reviling,
The pangs of being scoffed at for this long delay,
The turning out of office—(ay, perchance,
When I myself might now my greatness make
With a great battle?) I'd not longer bear
To drill and practice troops behind entrenchments,
But that the fear of meeting with the foe
On dread Manassas, from whose plains
Few of us would return—puzzles my will,
And makes me rather bear the ills I have,
Than fly to others which are greater far.
These Southerners make cowards of us all.

THE DEVIL'S VISIT TO "OLD ABE."

BY REV. E. P. BIRCH, OF LA GRANGE, GA.

Written on the occasion of Lincoln's proclamation for prayer and fasting after the battle of Manassas. Revised and improved by the author.

Old Abe was sitting in his chair of state,
With one foot on the mantel, and one on the grate,
Now smoking his pipe, and then scratching his pate;
For he had heard some disastrous news of late,
As fearful as death, and as cruel as fate.
In an old earthen jug, on a table near by,
Was a gallon of "Buckeye," or "choice old rye,"
To cheer up his hopes, which were ready to die,
Under whose potent charms old Abe would be able
To lay all his griefs, like a bill, "on the table;"
Or, shut up his woe, like a horse, in a stable.

He sat in his chair,
With a woe-begone air,
Gazing at nothing with a meaningless stare,
And looked like a wild beast just "skeered" in his lair.

His cheek-bones were high, and his visage was rough,
Like a middling of bacon, all wrinkled and tough;
His nose was as long, and as ugly and big,
As the snout of a half-starved Illinois pig;
He was long in the legs, and long in the face,
A Longfellow born of a long-legged race,
Yet longing through grace for a much longer space,
Till he'd finished his political wild-goose chase—
Bringing wreck on his country, and endless disgrace
On the blockheads who'd placed him in "the very wrong place."

The news had just reached him of rout and defeat,
Of his "Grand Army" broken—of disastrous retreat;

His best men were slain on the field of the fight;
His legions were scattered with panic and flight;
And his plans had all met with a ruinous blight;
His treasury was bankrupt, his finances smashed;
His credit was gone, and his bills were uncashed;
His country with terrible foes still begirt,
Was tumbling to ruin like a fabric of dirt;
"I'm afraid," said Old Abe, "there's somebody hurt."

Thus sitting and thinking—
Twixt smoking and drinking—
His head on his bosom was gradually sinking,
When a sound met his ear,
So sharp and so clear,

That he sprang to his feet—standing breathless to hear,

With his mind full of dread, and his heart full of fear;
'Twas not like the roll of the hurricane's thunder,
Nor the earthquake that cleaves the tall mountains
asunder;

'Twas not like the storms which tumultuously sweep
O'er the lone bending woods and the dark rolling deep;

But a sharp, angry crashing,
A confusion and clashing,
Like things in general, promiscuously smashing.
"It's the Devil!" thought Abe, in the sorest of frights,

Or a rebel "masked battery" on "Arlington Heights."
On the wings of the midnight winds it flew,
And nearer it came, and louder it grew,
Till Washington City seemed all in a stew.

It paused just before
The "White House" door,
And then died away with an explosive roar.

"It's the devil!" said Lincoln; and sure he's right,
For just at that moment there gleamed on his sight
The glare of a horrible sulphurous light, Encircling a form so ghastly and grim,
That his heart ceased to beat, and his eyes grew dim.
That form stood before him, majestic and dread,
With large cloven feet, and huge horns on his head.
Mr. Lincoln was seized with a terrible quaking,
And the bones in his skin were rattling and shaking,
Like the "dry bones" in the "Valley of Vision,"

With such a dreadful collision
As threatened to make a "long division"
Of his body and members, without "legal decision."
"How's your health, Mr. Lincoln?" said Old Nick, with a grin;

"I have only stepped in
To renew old acquaintance with your honor ag'in.
How are Seward, and Scott, and good Mrs. L.?
I hope all your friends are still hearty and well."
Thus saying, he seated himself in a chair,
And gazed at Old Abe with an impudent stare;
Took a drink of "hot lead" from a flaming skyrocket,

Which he drew from the depths of his overcoat
pocket;
Consulted his watch with a dandyish grace,
Said he'd make a quick trip through the regions of space,
On the train of a comet, in a journey sublime
Over millions of miles in a moment of time.

"You yourself," said the fiend, with a wink of his eye,
"Can travel 'like blazes,' when danger is nigh.
Your Grand Army, too, are distinguished for speed,
And run, 'like the devil,' in cases of need.

But all this aside—allow me to state,
I have come here on business momentously great,
Which deeply involves your political fate.
What means, Mr. Lincoln, this strange proclamation,
In which you've invited the whole Yankee nation
To fasting and prayer, and to humiliation?
It is strange how a thrashing has altered your notions,
And called into action your pious devotions;
It seems to me, sir, you're a whimsical set,
Ever twisting and turning, like an eel in a net.

You flounder and flout,
And turn in and turn out,
Till my wits are puzzled to know what you're about;
And now, in all candor, I must call your attention
To the truths which at present you'll allow me to mention:

You know, in the first place, you owe your election
To the aid and protection
Of a demagogue crew who own my direction.
I invented your platform, and gave it éclat,
About 'niggers,' and 'freedom,' and the great 'higher law;'

From the top of this platform—outstretching below,
I showed you the kingdoms which I would bestow,
If you and your party would only agree
To fall down in worship and homage to me;
Obey my directions, fulfil my commands,
Spread carnage and death over all these lands,
By a horrible warfare, such as would win
Success to my cause, and a triumph to sin.
To all of these terms you most promptly agreed,
And made them your grounds of political creed;
I gave you my subjects—the best I have got,
Such as Cameron, and Seward, and 'Old Granny
Scott;'

Assisted by Greeley, and Bennett, and Weed,
As miserable scoundrels as Tophet could breed,
To fix up a plan for 'preserving the Union,'
In the bonds of a happy fraternal communion,
By a terrible warfare of conquest and blood,
Such as never was known since the day of the flood.
I gave you my minions from the purlieus of hell,
The ranks of your fearful grand army to swell;
I stirred up the North with its vagabond crew,
And set witch-burning Yankeedom all in a stew,
With its isms and schisms—fanatical trappings—
Its free-loving humbugs, and spiritual rappings:

I called out its teachers,

(Hypocritical preachers,

And demagogue screechers,

To martial your leaders to conquest and fame;

But, alas! to your shame,

No victory came,

But reproach and disgrace on the whole
Yankee name.

Your armies went forth, but not to the battle—
They went forth to plunder the fields of their cattle;
To steal the young chickens, and capture the hens, (Like 'William Come-Trimble-Too,) and put 'em in pens.

In the pages of history, no loftier place
Can be claimed for your thieving and cowardly race,
Than to tell they were valiant in stealing a hen,
But ran in confusion from the presence of men.
When at last your Grand Army was forced to a fight,
They were routed, defeated, and driven in flight,
Overwhelmed with confusion, from the plains of Manassas,

Like a miserable pack of terrified asses.

Was't for this I labored with vigilant toil,

To sow tares of contention all over your soil?—

To build up your party with lying pretensions,

With demagogue tricks, and Chicago Conventions?

If this is the fruit of my labor and zeal,

I am sure I deserve the remorse that I feel,

For becoming the tool

Of a shallow-brained fool,

With the form of an ape, and the head of a calf;

It is sowing the whirlwind, and reaping the chaff."

"What say you to this?" cried Old Nick, waxing hot.

Quoth President Lincoln, "You must ask General
Scott."

"Old Scott's an old ass, and Seward to boot;

And as for yourself, you're a pitiful brute,

Too mean to let live, and too worthless to shoot.

"But to come to the point more directly in hand,
Allow me once more in good faith to demand
The grounds of this pitiful, vile proclamation,
For fasting and prayer by the whole Yankee nation.
Do you think that Jehovah will favor your cause,
While you murder, and steal, and violate laws?
Will your prayers be heard when you ask the Eternal
For help to accomplish your objects infernal?
No; this war, like yourself, is begotten in sin,
And lose it or win,
You must now begin
To fight with the spirit of 'Seventy-six,
And abandon your pitiful Yankee tricks."

Quoth "Honest Old Abe," "I'm in a very bad fix."
"You are right now, for once," said Old Nick, with a grin;

"But such are the fruits of transgression and sin.
Then where lies the blame? Not with me, I am sure;

You made the disease: you must seek for the cure.

And now, in conclusion, your attention I call
To a single fact more—'tis the saddest of all."

(As he spoke, the hot tears came flush to his eyes.)

"The Gospel has made me the 'father of lies';

And the record is true. From the very beginning

I have tutored the world in lying and sinning;

But it stirs up my soul with grief and vexation,

To see your abominable Yankee nation

Outstripping me far in the depths of its shame,

And heaping reproach on my kingdom and name.

I've one word to add; it's a terrible one!

The race of your treachery is almost run;

Your political sky looks dark and dun;

The fate-clouds are gathering o'er your setting sun;

You have ruined your nation—degraded its name,

And hurled on its people a heritage of shame;

You have murdered its glory and pride at a blow,

And filled its proud cities with wailing and woe.

The avenger is coming. O'er your dark future path

Is brooding a storm of terrible wrath.

The wrongs of oppression, the blood of the slain,

The pleadings of widows for their lost ones again,

The cries of the poor, all starving for bread,

The curse of the nation, overwhelming with dread,

Shall break like an avalanche full on your head.

"Then woe to the day when Beauregard comes

With his fiery legions from their Southern homes;

When the roar of their guns shall fill you with fright,

And the flash of their sabres shall gleam on your sight.

Ah! then shall you sink to a merciless tomb,

And the shouts of their triumph shall herald your doom.

Your fate is now writ by the 'hand on the wall:'

O'er your 'house on the sand' the bleak tempest shall fall,

And sweep you away in its ruins to hell;—

I have finished my mission. Farewell—farewell!"

Thus saying, he left in a moment of time,

And wound up his speech, where I wind up my rhyme;

He left General Scott in a passion and worry—

Old Abe in a fit, and his wife in a flurry.

SONG—LAND OF KING COTTON.

BY JO AUGUSTINE SIGNAIGO.

AIR—"Red, White, and Blue."

Oh! Dixie, the land of King Cotton,
The home of the brave and the free;
A nation by Freedom begotten,
The terror of despots to be;
Wherever thy banner is streaming,
Base tyranny quails at thy feet,
And Liberty's sunlight is beaming
In splendor of majesty sweet.

CHORUS.

Three cheers for our army so true!
Three cheers for Price, Johnston, and Lee,
Beauregard and our Davis forever!
The pride of the brave and the free!

When Liberty sounds her war-rattle,
Demanding her right and her due,
The first land who rallies to battle
Is Dixie, the shrine of the true;

Thick as leaves of the forest in summer,
Her brave sons will rise on each plain;
And then strike, until each vandal comer
Lies dead on the soil he would stain.

CHORUS—Three cheers for our army, &c.

May the names of the dead that we cherish,
Fill memory's cup to the brim;
May the laurels they've won never perish,
Nor "star of their glory grow dim;"
May the States of the South never sever,
But champions of freedom e'er be;
May they flourish, Confed'rate forever,
The boast of the brave and the free.

CHORUS—Three cheers for our army, &c.

COL. CROGHAN.—The death of Col. Croghan, who was killed by Gen. Benham's command, in the retreat of Floyd from Kanawha, is no small loss to the rebels. He was an excellent officer, a noble-looking man, and formerly in the regular service, a graduate of West Point, and a class-mate of Gen. Benham. He was a son of Gen. Croghan, the defender of Fort Stephenson, and was formerly quite wealthy, once owning the Mammoth Cave in Kentucky. On his death-bed he confessed that he had received only what he deserved—that he was wrong—and asked them to pray for him. He refused to allow any medical assistance, probably well aware his time was come. The meeting and recognition between him and Gen. Benham was painful to witness. Said the General:

"My God, Croghan! is this you?"

"Yes," said the dying man; "but for God's sake, Benham, do not reproach me—I know now I was in the wrong."

Hearing the cannonading, he remarked:

"General, you can do me no good, and you are wanted over there, are you not?"—Whelching Intelligencer.

INCIDENTS OF THE BATTLE OF BELMONT.—A correspondent of the St. Louis Democrat, giving an account of the burial of our dead upon the field of battle at Belmont, by a party which returned after the battle, with a flag of truce, relates the following incidents:

Our dead were mostly lying upon their backs, and every thing taken from their bodies that could be of value to the enemy. The countenances of the dead were mostly expressive of rage. One or two features were expressive of fear. One poor fellow, after he was wounded, bethought himself to take a smoke; he was found in a sitting position, against a tree, dead, with his pipe in one hand, his knife in the other, and his tobacco on his breast.

A young lad about sixteen was found lying across a log, just as he fell, grasping his musket in both hands.

A wounded man, with both legs nearly shot off, was found in the woods, singing the Star-Spangled Banner; but for this circumstance the surgeons say they would not have discovered him.

A captain of one of the regiments was looking at the prisoners we captured at Belmont, and recognized one as his own brother.

THE "CONFEDERATE" CONGRESS.—The first Congress of the Confederate States, under the permanent Constitution, will be composed of twenty-two Senators and eighty-seven Representatives.

The representation will be as follows, being in the ratio of one member for every ninety thousand of population, on the Federal basis, counting three-fifths for slaves.

We add, in a separate column, the electoral vote of each State in the Confederacy:

	Representation.	Votes.
Virginia .....	16	18
North Carolina.....	10	12
South Carolina.....	6	8
Georgia .....	10	12
Florida.....	2	4
Alabama .....	9	11
Louisiana.....	6	8
Texas.....	6	8
Arkansas .....	4	6
Mississippi.....	7	9
Tennessee.....	11	13
Total .....	87	109

The House, as constituted now, is composed, therefore, of eighty-seven members, and the whole electoral vote is one hundred and nine. The number of the House may be increased by the accession of new States before the meeting of Congress in February. There are some States which may be in the Confederacy then,—New Orleans Picayune.

NEW ORLEANS, Nov. 24.—Twenty-eight thousand troops were reviewed yesterday by Gov. Moore, Gen. Lovell, and Gen. Ruggles. The line was seven miles long. There was one regiment of fourteen hundred free colored men. The military display was grand. One company displayed a black flag.—Cincinnati Gazette, Dec. 4.

BY PRESSURE, NOT BY SLAUGHTER.—General McClellan, so writes a Washington correspondent, is using untiring industry in getting the army into the best possible condition, while it is more evident, every day, that he does not mean to use it to obtain military glory, but to carry out a plan similar to that of Scott—to quell this rebellion by a mighty pressure, and not by a mighty slaughter.

A PATRIOTIC NONAGERIAN.—Mrs. Nelly Applegate, (familiarily known as Aunt Nelly Applegate,) living in the upper part of Louisville, Ky., who, during the Revolutionary war, knit socks and made bandages for the soldiers, is now daily and nightly engaged in the same good work for the soldiers of the Union. Although in her ninety-first year, she is, mentally and physically, as sprightly as many of half her age.—Louisville Journal, Dec. 4.

HOW THIRTY-FIVE REBELS WERE CAPTURED.—We are indebted to a friend, who returned yesterday from Fort Wise, for the following facts relative to the capture of a company of thirty-five Secessionists, under one Chamberlain, on their way to join the Confederate forces:

"On the morning of the 20th of October, Capt. Long left Fort Wise, with a company of cavalry numbering some thirty-six, in search of any bands of hostile Indians that might be scouring over the country. When about forty miles south of Fort Wise, he came in sight of what he supposed to be a band of Indians, and he ordered his men to dismount. The sergeant of the company being afflicted with rheumatism, begged to be excused from dismounting, saying that he would ride up to the party and ascertain who they were. Capt. Long allowed him to proceed, and when within a short distance of the camp of the strange party, he was commanded to halt by one of their pickets, who presented a rifle at the sergeant. The sergeant told him not to shoot, as he had a company a short distance off that would kill the whole party if they harmed him. He was allowed to proceed to the camp, where he found all but two of the men asleep. One of them presented a gun at him, but did not shoot. After some conversation, the Sergeant was permitted to leave the camp. When safely outside of it, and as soon as he reached a hill, where he was in full view of his own company, he gave the signal by waving his handkerchief.

Capt. Long left the horses in charge of a few men, took the balance of the company, and surrounded the Secesh. Capt. Long commanded them to stack their arms and surrender. Chamberlain surrendered, but refused to stack arms, and threw his rifle into the fire. They were all taken and marched back to Fort Wise. Upon investigation, it was ascertained that the company had been raised in Denver, and was on its way to Arkansas, for the purpose of taking a part in the rebellion. They are confined at Fort Wise.—Leavenworth Times.

DISAPPOINTED.—We are reliably informed that a few evenings ago the family of Andrew Johnson felt so assured that he would make his appearance in Greenville at the head of a Lincoln force, that they made preparations for giving the distinguished traitor a splendid supper upon his arrival. What a delusion!—Nashville Banner, Nov. 20.

Galveston, Nov. 9, via New Orleans, Nov. 15.—At half-past three o'clock this morning the sentinels on the steamer Rusk, saw the steamer Royal Yacht, Capt. C. Heeble, abandoned and burning, off Bolivar, in the Bay. Boats were sent to her assistance. The fire was within a few feet of her magazine, which was saved and the fire quenched. The damage was light. There were indications of a stout resistance by her crew. The cutlasses were found below deck, but the other small arms were missing. Musket balls were found imbedded in her sides. It is supposed a frigate launch neared the Yacht before it was discovered. The attacking party evidently consisted of two hundred men. The Yacht's crew numbered fifteen. The Yacht was brought in. The enemy, evidently frightened, left in a hurry.—N. O. Crescent, Nov. 15.

A BOSTON correspondent of the Anti-Slavery Standard, writes that he is engaged in partial attendance upon two courses of lectures on "The Use of the Rifle" and "The Evidences of Christianity," and adds: "As opposite as lemon and sugar, are they not? Suppose the watery element to be supplied, (of which there is generally little stint,) and the result is a sort of moral lemonade; or, if a little spirit be smuggled in, behold an intellectual punch!"

A HAPPY COINCIDENCE.—As a large-hearted Union lady, resident in Covington, Ky., wife of a gentleman of the same character, was distributing a lot of fine apples, of which she had a half-bushel basket full, to the soldiers encamped back of that city, she gave an apple to one soldier of a group who exhibited peculiar emotion as she handed it to him, observing at the same time that it was a pleasant thing to receive gifts from a lady. At this she asked him whether he had a wife, and immediately his eyes filled with tears, which rolled down his cheeks as he replied, "Yes, madam, I have a wife and six children." Observing his emotion, her own eyes rapidly filling at the sight, she quickly remarked to him: "Well, keep up a good heart." "Good heart! yes, madam, that is my name; Goodheart is my name!" Upon the instant their tears were changed to smiles, and Goodheart, the lady, and the soldier's companions, broke into a hearty laugh.—Ohio Statesman, Dec. 4.

RETRIBUTION.—A letter from a private in the Seventy-ninth Highlanders, discloses an instance of just retribution which fell on an earnest traitor who should have been hung months ago. It will be remembered that in the early part of summer a man employed in the Washington navy yard was discovered filling shells with sand instead of the proper material. This man had received a medical education, and on his escape within the rebel lines resumed the practice of his profession. When the Seventy-ninth landed at Port Royal, the first sight which greeted them on entering the hospital was this man seated at a table, with a splendid case of surgical instruments before him, his left arm resting naturally upon the table and the position of his body indicating perfect ease, but upon a closer examination it was discovered that the entire upper portion of his head had been cut away, from the crown to the back of his neck, by a cannon ball.—N. Y. Commercial, Dec. 2.

BISHOP GENERAL POLK is falling into the habit of using strong expressions for a man who seceded from the clerical profession. A correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette, writing from Louisville, remarks as follows of this ministerial fighter: I think the Right Reverend Bishop General Polk, if some one has not slandered him, sent a flag of truce to the devil, when he laid aside the sword of the spirit and took up the carnal weapons of Jeff. Davis, and has since fallen into the habit of the army in Flanders. It is stated on the authority of a gentleman who was present, that when a note of inquiry was sent down to Columbus by Gen. Grant, after the fight at Belmont, in which the action was mentioned as a "skirmish," the Bishop General, on reading it, exclaimed, "Skirmish! hell and damnation! I'd like to know what he calls a battle."—Boston Evening Transcript, Dec. 6.

IMPROMPTU

ON a recent event. (Copyright in the Confederate States, secured.)

Old Mason proud, and sly Slidell
Away to Europe cut their lucky,
Or thought they had, till sweet to tell,
The pair were bagged by Wilkes the plucky.

Wilkes brought them safely into port,
Despite John Bull's protest and swearin',
They thought Diplomacy their forte,
They'll find their fort will be—Fort Warren.

—Burlington Free Press, Nov. 22.

ASTOR AND WADSWORTH.—John Jacob Astor is appointed to a position on Gen. McClellan's staff. It is a curious fact that while Lieutenant-Colonel Astor represents the largest capital in the United States, General Wadsworth is the wealthiest landholder and agriculturist in the Union.

A PATRIOTIC FAMILY.—At Camp Kenton, near Maysville, Ky., there are seven volunteers of the same immediate family, five of them brothers. Their names are respectively Lafayette Kidder, Charles Kidder, Orange Kidder, William Kidder, John Kidder, Alonzo Kidder, Henry Kidder. In this connection the Maysville Eagle says, that, though laggard at first, Mason county will soon have as large a proportion of her sons in the field as any other county in the State not exposed to immediate danger.—Louisville Journal, Nov. 21.

A REBEL FUNERAL.—The Washington Star says that on Monday afternoon a funeral procession, consisting of a hearse and attendants, attempted to pass the sentinels on Long Bridge, on the Anne Arundel shore of the Patapsco, and had gone by the first sentry, when the next took it upon himself to make an examination, finding, instead of a corpse, a coffin full of muskets and ammunition. The hearse and horses were captured, but the attendants escaped.—Rhode Island Journal, Sept. 20.

The Centerville, Va., correspondent of the Charleston Mercury of October 30th says of the famous shot-proof ironside at Norfolk: "I regret to learn that the iron sheeting for the Merrimac has proved, under trials made recently at Jamestown Island with columbiads, to be almost worthless."

MUNCHAUSENIANA.

RICHMOND, Nov. 4.—It is here currently reported that considerable commotion exists in Washington and in the free States from the rumored resignations of Generals Scott and McClellan, and of Secretaries Seward and Cameron, and of other prominent Federal officials. A general Kilkenny cat fight seems impending throughout Lincolnland.

A special despatch to the Richmond Dispatch, dated Manassas to-day, announces that "reliable" information from Washington says there are but fifteen regiments of infantry, one light battery of six guns, and one thousand servants on board the Lincoln fleet.

The Yankees have fallen back to their intrenchments.

Southern merchants in Alexandria are forced to close their stores. There are said to be no more than eighty thousand men in and around Washington.

A gentleman just arrived from Manassas says that the Baltimore Sun of Saturday reports the resignation of Seward, Blair, Cameron, Scott, and McClellan. The probable difficulty grew out of the attempt to force McClellan to attack the Confederate forces.—Charleston Mercury, Nov. 5.

A note from J. L. Shumate, of New Madrid, Mo., says that after the evacuation of Fredericktown by Jeff. Thompson, the Northern Goths and Vandals burned a portion of the town, pillaged the Catholic Church, arrested some of the ladies of the place, forcibly tore their ear-bobs from their ears and rings from their fingers, and offered them other indignities too hateful to mention.—Quotation from a Southern paper in the Cincinnati Times, Nov. 20.

A GALLANT FEAT.—A day or so since, a small squad of privates got leave of absence to see their families in Galloway County, some fifty miles from Camp General Smith. Their names are James Henderson, C. D. Gray, E. T. Manard, J. W. Parker, Henry Henderson, and T. B. Scully.

They went out home, near the Tennessee line. When it was rumored they were in the neighborhood, Capt. Bourland, who had made up a regular cavalry company, and had been sworn into the Confederate service, with nine of his men, started to capture Col. Williams' men; but these brave boys being on the alert, awaited until they arrived at Henderson's house, when they surrounded the rebels and captured the whole squad, nine, the Captain included, but the Captain afterwards made his escape in the bushes. The names of those men are Capt. J. N. Bourland, James Albrittain, John Linn, Josiah Ballance, J. R. McKnight, Wm. M. Duncan, J. M. Taylor, Gilbert Hart and, Arch. Bogard. All honor to these brave boys. The rebels from this part of the State had better stand from under, for Col. Williams is getting a formidable force of as brave boys as ever shouldered a musket, and being well acquainted with the geography of the country, and all the roads, neighborhoods, &c., will render incalculable service.

The richness of the joke, however, consists in nine men, with double barrel guns, making 18 shots, being captured by six men, with only single barrel guns, and only 6 shots.—Louisville Journal, Nov. 19.

THE BLACK FLAG AT CHARLESTON.—A Richmond correspondent of the Petersburg Express says: The spring of hope must now, with the Yankees, die upon the winter winds. Already has the black flag been hoisted upon the soil of South Carolina, and war to the knife, the knife to the hilt, and thence to the shoulder, been proclaimed by her noble sons as the only booty which Yankee hireling invaders shall receive at their hands. This is right—it is the only way to conquer a peace with a people so lost and degraded as those which compose the grand army of the Rump Government.

We look anxiously for news from the sunny South; hopefully, prayerfully; with no misgivings. Now that the rallying cry is "no quarter to the invaders of our soil," may we not believe that the course inaugurated by South Carolina will be followed up by our whole army, and thus end this war? "So mote it be."

MARYLAND, O MARYLAND!

The following song was written as a substitute for "Maryland, my Maryland":

The traitor's foot is on thy shore,
Maryland, O Maryland!
He whispers treason at thy door,
Maryland, O Maryland!
His minions crowd old Baltimore;
Her streets are stained with patriot gore;
Her Union banner waves no more,
Maryland, O Maryland!

Hast thou no noble hearts to feel?
Maryland, O Maryland!
No hands to wield the avenging steel?
Maryland, O Maryland!
Dost thou desert thy country's weal,
While rebel foes their plots reveal,
And bruise thee with the traitor's heel?
Maryland, O Maryland!

Are all thy loyal sires of old,
 Maryland, O Maryland !
 Who sleep beneath thy sacred mould,
 Maryland, O Maryland !
 Forgotten like a tale that's told,
 While their base sons have honor sold,
 And only treachery is bold ?
 Maryland, O Maryland !

Spurn from thy soul the shameful wrong,
 Maryland, O Maryland !
 Once more for liberty be strong,
 Maryland, O Maryland !
 Let thy old glorious banner-song,
 Its spirit-stirring strains prolong,
 While thousands to its standard throng,
 Maryland, O Maryland !

Virginia has forged her chain,
 Maryland, O Maryland !
 Hark, how it clanks o'er hill and plain,
 Maryland, O Maryland !
 Is that indeed "the proud refrain,"
 "Sic semper," to be heard again,
 Mingled with many a cherished strain,
 Maryland, O Maryland !

Well may the crimson stain thy cheek,
 Maryland, O Maryland !
 That thou shouldst be so basely meek,
 Maryland, O Maryland !
 When wounded Freedom sends a shriek,
 From plain to plain, from peak to peak,
 And all her clarion voices speak,
 Maryland, O Maryland !

Wake thee, and from the dust arise,
 Maryland, O Maryland !
 Look up ! look up, with eager eyes,
 Maryland, O Maryland !
 Where the "star-spangled banner" flies,
 Across the azure of the skies,
 And, ere thy day of doom, be wise,
 Maryland, O Maryland !

Gird on thy armor for the fight,
 Maryland, O Maryland !
 On for the Union and the right,
 Maryland, O Maryland !
 Be no more dead, or deaf, or dumb ;
 Rouse to the bugle and the drum ;
 "Huzza ! she breathes ! she burns ! she'll come !"
 Maryland, our Maryland !

THE PICKET GUARD.

"All quiet along the Potomac," they say,
 "Except now and then a stray picket
 Is shot, as he walks on his beat, to and fro,
 By a rifleman in the thicket.
 'Tis nothing—a private or two, now and then,
 Will not count in the news of the battle ;
 Not an officer lost—only one of the men,
 Moaning out, all alone, the death-rattle."

All quiet along the Potomac to-night,
 Where the soldiers lie peacefully dreaming ;
 Their tents, in the rays of the clear autumn moon,
 Or the light of the watch-fires are gleaming.

A tremulous sigh, as the gentle night wind
 Through the forest leaves softly is creeping ;
 While stars up above, with their glittering eyes,
 Keep guard—for the army is sleeping.

There's only the sound of the lone sentry's tread,
 As he tramps from the rock to the fountain,
 And thinks of the two in the low trundle-bed,
 Far away in the cot on the mountain.
 His musket falls slack—his face, dark and grim,
 Grows gentle with memories tender,
 As he mutters a prayer for the children asleep—
 For their mother—may Heaven defend her !

The moon seems to shine just as brightly as then,
 That night, when the love yet unspoken
 Leaped up to his lips—when low, murmured vows,
 Were pledged to be ever unbroken.
 Then drawing his sleeve roughly over his eyes,
 He dashes off tears that are welling,
 And gathers his gun closer up to its place,
 As if to keep down the heart-swelling.

He passes the fountain, the blasted pine tree—
 The footstep is lagging and weary ;
 Yet onward he goes, through the broad belt of light,
 Toward the shades of the forest so dreary.
 Hark ! was it the night-wind that rustled the leaves ?
 Was it moonlight so wondrously flashing ?
 It looked like a rifle—"Ha ! MARY, good-by !"
 And the life-blood is ebbing and plashing.

All quiet along the Potomac to-night—
 No sound save the rush of the river ;
 While soft falls the dew on the face of the dead—
 The picket's off duty forever.

"AT PORT ROYAL—1861."

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

The tent-lights glimmer on the land,
 The ship-lights on the sea ;
 The night-wind smooths with drifting sand
 Our track on lone Tybee.

At last our grating keels outside,
 Our good boats forward swing ;
 And while we ride the land-locked tide,
 Our negroes row and sing.

For dear the bondman holds his gifts
 Of music and of song :
 The gold that kindly Nature sifts
 Among his sands of wrong ;

The power to make his toiling days
 And poor home-comforts please ;
 The quaint relief of mirth that plays
 With sorrow's minor keys.

Another glow than sunset's fire
 Has filled the West with light,
 Where field and garner, barn and byre,
 Are blazing through the night.

The land is wild with fear and hate,
The rout runs mad and fast;
From hand to hand, from gate to gate,
The flaming brand is passed.

The lurid glow falls strong across
Dark faces broad with smiles;
Not theirs the terror, hate, and loss,
That fire yon blazing piles.

With oar-strokes timing to their song,
They weave in simple lays
The pathos of remembered wrong,
The hope of better days—

The triumph-note that Miriam sung,
The joy of uncaged birds;
Softening with Afric's mellow tongue
Their broken Saxon words.

[SONG OF THE NEGRO BOATMEN.]

Oh, praise an' tanks! De Lord he come
To set de people free;
An' massa tink it day ob doom,
An' we ob jubilee.
De Lord, dat heap de Red Sea waves,
He jus' as 'troug as den;
He say de word—we las' night slaves,
To-day de Lord's freemen.
De yam will grow, de cotton blow,
We'll hab de rice an' corn;
Oh, nebber you fear, if nebber you hear
De driver blow his horn!

Ole massa on he trabbles gone;
He leab de land behind;
De Lord's breff blow him funder on,
Like corn-shuck in de wind.
We own de hoe, we own de plow,
We own de hands dat hold;
We sell de pig, we sell de cow,
But nebber chile be sold.
De yam will grow, de cotton blow,
We'll hab de rice an' corn;
Oh, nebber you fear, if nebber you hear
De driver blow his horn!

We pray de Lord; he gib us signs
Dat some day we be free;
De Norf-wind tell it to de pines,
De wild duck to de sea;
We tink it when de church-bell ring,
We dream it in de dream;
De rice-bird mean it when he sing,
De eagle when he scream.

De yam will grow, de cotton blow,
We'll hab de rice an' corn;
Oh, nebber you fear, if nebber you hear
De driver blow his horn!

We know de promise nebber fail,
An' nebber lie de word;
So, like de 'postles in de jail,
We waited for de Lord;
An' now He open ebery door,
An' throw away de key;
He tink we lub Him so before,
We lub Him better free.

De yam will grow, de cotton blow,
He'll gib de rice an' corn;
So, nebber you fear, if nebber you hear
De driver blow his horn!

So sing our dusky gondoliers;
And with a secret pain,
And smiles that seem akin to tears,
We hear the wild refrain.

We dare not share the negro's trust,
Nor yet his hopes deny;
We only know that God is just,
And every wrong shall die.

Rude seems the song; each swarthy face,
Flame-lighted, ruder still:
We start, to think that hapless race
Must shape our good or ill;

That laws of changeless justice bind
Oppressor with oppressed;
And close as sin and suffering joined,
We march to fate abreast.

Sing on, poor hearts! your chants shall be
Our sign of blight or bloom—
The Vala-song of Liberty,
Or death-rune of our doom!

—Atlantic Monthly.

AN ELEGY ON THE DEATH OF A MAD DOG.

Good people all, of every sort,
Give ear unto my song;
And if you find it wondrous short,
It cannot hold you long.

In Washington there was a man,*
Of whom the world might say,
That still a godly race he ran
Whene'er he went to pay.†

A kind and gentle heart he had,
To comfort friends and foes;
The naked every day he clad—
When he put on his clothes.‡

And in that town a dog § was found—
As many dogs there be—
Both mongrel, puppy, whelp, and hound,
And curs of low degree.

This dog and man at first were friends,
But when a pique began,
The dog, to gain his private ends,
Went mad, and bit the man.¶

* This man is our dear old Uncle Sam, a good old fellow in the main.

† Variation—"Would always work and pay."

‡ Variation—"With cotton underclothes."

§ It is not known what dog is meant here: many think that President Buchanan is without doubt alluded to, but they forget the claim of Floyd. The question at this late day will have to be left in doubt. Had the author said old hound, no doubt would exist—"curs of low degree," however, would include all secession.

¶ The dog crept up and sneakingly bit Uncle Sam deep.

Around, from all the neighboring streets,*
The wondering neighbors ran,
And swore the dog had lost his wits,
To bite so good a man.

The wound, it seemed both sore and sad
To every Christian eye; †
And while they swore the dog was mad,
They swore the man would die.

But soon a wonder came to light,
That showed the rogues they lied—
The man recovered of the bite,
The dog it was that died.

BOMBARDMENT OF FORTS WALKER AND BEAUREGARD.

BY ISAAC M'CLELLAN.

PART I.—THE ARRIVAL.

I.

Six-and-sixty gallant ships, tempest-toss'd
By the angry seas assailed, well-nigh lost
Off hostile Carolina's sandy coast,
Spread the straining, daring sail;
They had come from Northern shores far away,
They had battled with old ocean's stormy spray,
But triumphant still their course southward lay
Through the equinoctial gale.

II.

Wild surges in mountainous billows rose,
Wild the gale its majestic trumpet blows,
Wild the night with intenser darkness grows,
As the buffeting, brave fleet,
Struggles on, staggers blindly through the gloom—
No light, save the lightning, to illumine,
To warn them where the tumbling breakers boom,
Where the eddy whirlpools beat;

III.

But the perils of the deep 'scap'd at last,
With torn and tattered canvas on each mast,
Behold the noble navy sailing fast
By the headlands of the shore!
Like a flock of white-wing'd owl, see! they come;
Like the sea-birds to their nests struggling home,
When the tempests out at sea lash the foam,
And the rullian surges roar.

IV.

When they anchored by those shores so serene,
What a bright—what a soft, delicious scene!
With hues of rose, and hues of living green,
Beamed upon the seamen's view!
Not a ripple, not a dimple crisp'd the deep;
So pellucid, that the coral groves that sleep
Far below, were disclosed in all their sweep,
Gay with every prismatic hue!

V.

Far along the curving shores gleam'd the sand;
High aloft the branching palms would expand,
And the orange and the lime o'er the land
Wav'd their globes of sparkling gold;

Like emeralds shine the grasses and the leaves;
The grape its fruit and foliage interweaves,
And the ripened Indian corn, with its sheaves,
Is in ruddy bloom unroll'd.

VI.

White as foam shone the cotton o'er the plain,
As if snows, and the sleety, icy rain,
Their flaky storm has showered forth amain
From winter's frosty urn;
Soft, soft the odorous land-breeze seaward blows,
Delicious with magnolia and the rose,
And the spicy air so sweet as it flows,
When flowers their incense burn.

PART II.—THE BATTLE.

VII.

'Twas a fair scene—a grand, enchanting view;
Yet o'er that land, from fort to fortress, flew
A traitor's banner, while a rebel crew
In arms each fortress holds.
Not there the brave, bright, starry flag might float,
Cast its broad shield o'er rampart and o'er moat,
Nor Freedom's battery, from its iron throat,
Salute the spangled folds.

VIII.

Fair glanced the day along Port Royal's tide,
Glanced o'er embattled forts on either side,
Where Hilton Head and Low Bay Point defied
The armada of the free;
A martial show, that vast, invading fleet!
When rose their flag, when mustering-drums were beat;
When rang the cheer that all the shores repeat,
Re-echoing o'er the sea!

IX.

Black men-of-war, their decks array'd for fight;
Vast transports, glittering with battalions bright;
Gunboats and steamships—'twas a gallant sight—
A panorama grand!
Each ship, like wrestler, stripped to dare the fray;
The guns, full-shotted, rang'd in long array;
The crews, impatient for the battle-day,
A stern and stalwart band.

X.

Then came the conflict. From Fort Walker's wall
Glanced the red fires, fast sped the hissing ball;
Thick smokes, volcanic, hover'd like a pall,
A dim, sulphurous veil;
The Bay Point batteries, like a furnace, cast
Their iron tempest in incessant blast;
How might survive the crews, the spar, the mast,
Before that fearful hail!

XI.

Yet all in vain! The star-flag still arose,
Nailed to each mast, a target for its foes;
The rough tars cheer, and on each frigate goes
In undismay'd career;
Stern Dupont leads his Wabash to the goal,
And Pawnee, Susquehanna, Seminole,
And stout Bienville their dread thunders roll,
'Mid shout and battle-cheer.

XII.

Stern Dupont, in that tempest's very midst,
Through lurid flames, and the artillery's mist,
Where crash'd the ball, and hurtling bullets hiss'd,
The noble frigate led.

* Evidently a misprint. It should be "states"; but we do not like to take liberties with the writing of others, and leave the line without alteration.

† Vide several different London Timeses, and other kind "friends in council."

For three long, bloody hours, he stubborn sto
 Environed by that fierce and fiery flood ;
 While blush'd his decks with bubbling, loyal blood,
 With scuppers chok'd and red.

XIII.

Three times that triple dance he fearless led ;
 Three times that circuit, that ellipse so dread ;
 Three times, 'mid splintering spar and falling dead,
 He led the merciless path ;
 Three times his frigates and his gunboats well
 Replied with hot-shot and with bursting shell, nfilading those walls, that quak'd and fell
 Beneath the scorching wrath !

XIV.

Thick flew the shell within each rampart's breath ;
 High rose the brown sand in that storm of death ;
 So o'er the desert doth Sirocco's breath
 The caravan betray ;
 For three long hours that hurricane of gore
 Through stony embrasure and rampart tore ;
 Guns were dismantled, men in many a score
 Were withering swept away.

XV.

In vain their toil ! In vain the rebel strife ;
 No human courage might withstand, with life,

That storm, when every moment was so rife
 With desolating scourge !
 They fled, they flew, their arms aside were thrown ;
 No guns were spiked, no standards were pluck'd
 down,
 But, wild with terror, o'er the country strewn,
 Their frantic race they urge !

XVI.

So ends the strife. The victor's guns are mute ;
 The shouting squadron their brave flag salute ;
 The veteran sailor and the raw recruit
 Their deafening cheerings pour ;
 Prone drops the flag from yonder rebel mast—
 Soon to the breeze the Union Stars are cast ;
 Avenged is Sumter's humbled flag at last,
 On Carolina's shore !

XVII.

Flag of our hearts, our symbol and our trust,
 Though treason trample thy bright folds in dust,
 Though dark rebellion, vile ambition's lust,
 Conspire to tear thee down ;
 Millions of loyal lips will thee caress ;
 Millions of loyal hearts thy stars will bless,
 Millions of loyal arms will round thee press,
 To guard thy old renown !

NEW YORK, November 22.
